

Henrie the fift, prince of Wales, sonne and heire to Henrie the fourth.

An. Reg. 1.

An. Reg. 1.

Henrie prince of Wales, sonne and heire to H. Henrie the fourth, borne in Wales at Monmouth on the riuer of Wye, after his father was departed toke vpon him the regiment of this realme of England, the twentieth of March, the morrow after proclaimed king, by the name of Henrie the fift, in the yeare of the world 5375, after the birth of our saviour, by our account 1413, the third of the emperor Sigismund: the thirde and thirtieth of Charles the first French king, and in the seventh yeare of gouernance in Scotland vnder Robert brother to him that (before entrance into his kingdome 1390) had John to name, which by deuse and order of the states was changed into Robert the third, who at Rossaie (a towne in the Island of Got, 1406) decessed by occasion thus. As vpon hope in this gouernor, to himselfe concluded how to come to the crowne, he at the castell of Falkland, latelie had famisht his cosine David the kings elder sonne and heire (a dissolute yong prince) yet to his fathers exceeding sorrow, at whose decess the father berie carefull, and casting for the safeguard of James his yonger son and heire, from Walle the rocke in a well appointed ship, vnder charge of Henrie Saintclere earle of Dykeneie, into France to his old friend king Charles for good education and safetie this yong prince he sent: who in the course, whether for tempest or tendernes of stomach, toke land in Fokeshire at Flamboyrow, that after by wisdome and good consideration of the king and his counsell was thought berie necessarie here to be retained. But by the sudden netwes of this staie, the father (at supper as he sat) so stroken at hart that well ne freight had he fallen doونه dead, yet bozne into his chamber, where for greefe and pine within thre daies next he decessed. The yong king James his sonne after an eightene peares staie, in which time he had bene well trained in princehood, at last with right honorable marriage at saint Marie Queries vnto Jane daughter to the earle of Summerset, consine vnto Henrie the first then king, and with manie other high gratuities here beside was sent and set in his rule and kingdome at home.

Such great hope, and good expectation was had of this mans fortunate successe to follow, that within thre daies after his fathers decess, diuerse noble men and honorable personages did to him homage, and swore to him due obedience, which had not bene sene done to any of his predecessors kings of this realme, till they had bene possessed of the crowne. He was crowned the ninth of Aprill being Passon sondaie, which was a fore, rugged, and tempestuous day, with wind, snow andleet, that men greatlie maruelled thereat, making diuerse interpretations what the same might signifie. But this king euen at first appointing with himselfe, to shew that in his person princelie honors should change publike manners, he determined to put on him the shap of a new man. For whereas aforetime he had made himselfe a companion vnto multuall mates of dissolute order and life, he now banished them all from his presence (but not vntowarded, or else vnpreferred) in his biting them vpon a great paine, not once to approach, lodge, or sojourne within ten miles of his court or presence: and in their places he chose men of grauitie, wit, and high policie, by whose wise counsell he might at all times rule to his honour and dignitie; calling to mind how once to his offense of the king his father, he had with his fist striken the chafe iustice for sending one of his minions (vpon desert) to prison, when the iustice stoutlie commanded himselfe also to streit to ward, & he (then prince) obeyed. The king after expelled him out of his princie counsell, banished him the court, and made the duke of Clarence (his yonger brother) president of counsell in his stead. This reformation in the new king Christ. O. K. hath reported, fullie consenting with this. For saith he,

Ille inter immunes paulo lasciuior ante, Defuncto genitore grauius constansq; repente, Moribus ablegat corruptis regis ab aula Assuetos socios, & nugatoribus acrem Penam (si quisquam sua tella reuaserit) addit, Atq; ita mutatus facit omnia principe digna, Ingemo magno post consultoribus usus, &c.

But now that the king was once placed in the royal seat of the realme, he vertuously considering in his mind, that all goodnesse cometh of God, determined to begin with some thing acceptable to his diuine maiestie, and therefore commanded the cleargie sincerelie and trulie to preach the word of God, and to line accordingly, that they might be the lanternes of light to the tempestualtie, as their profession required. The laie men he willed to serue God, and obeie their prince, prohibiting them aboue all things breach of matrimonie, custome in swearing; and namelie, will full perturie. Beside this, he elected the best learned men in the lawes of the realme, to the offices of iustice; and men of good liuing, he preferred to high degrees and authoritie. Immediatlie after Easter he called a parlement, in which diuerse good statutes, and wholesome ordinances, for the preservation and advancement of the common-wealth were deuised and established. On Trinitie sondaie were the solemn euequies done at Canturburie for his father, the king himselfe being present thereat.

About the same time, at the speciall instance of the king, in a conuocation of the cleargie holden at Paulies in London, it was ordeined, that saint Georges his daie should be celebrate and kept as a double feast. The archbishop of Canturburie meant to haue honored saint Dunstons daie with like reuerence, but it toke not effect. When the king had setled things much to his purpose, he caused the bodie of king Richard to be removed with all funerall dignitie convenient for his estate, from Langley to Westminster, where he was honorable interred with quene Anne his first wife, in a solemne tombe erected and set up at the charges of this king. ¶ Polychronicon faith, that after the bodie of the dead king was taken up out of the earth, this new king happily tendering the magnificence of a prince, and abhorring obscure buriall caused the same to be conveyed to Westminster in a roiall seat (or chaire of estate) covered all over with blacke velvet, & adorned with banners of divers armes round about. All the horses likewise (saith this author) were apparelled with blacke, and bare sundrie lutes of armes. Many other solemnities were had at his interment, according to the qualitie of the age wherein he lived and died.

Also in this first yere of this kings reigne, sir John Mordaunt, which by his wife was called lord Cobham, a valiant capteine and a hardie gentleman, was accused to the archbishop of Canturburie of certeine points of heresie, who knowing him to be highlie in the kings favour, declared to his highnesse the whole accusation. The king first having compassion of the noble man, required the prelates, that if he were a tirred sheepe, rather by gentleness than by rigor, to reduce him to the fold. And after this, he himselfe sent for him, and right earnestlie exhorted him, and lovinglie admonished him to reconcile himselfe to God and to his lawes. The lord Cobham not onelie thanked him for his most favourable clemencie, but also declared first to him by mouth, and afterwards by writing, the foundation of his faith, and the ground of his beleefe, affirming his grace to be his supreme head and competent iudge, and none other person, offering an hundred knights and esquiers to come to his purgation, or else to fight in open lists in defense of his iust cause.

The king understanding and persuaded by his counsell, that by order of the lawes of his realme, such accusations touching matters of faith ought to be tried by his spirituall prelates, sent him to the Tower of London, there to abide the determination of the clergie, according to the statutes in that case provided, after which time a solemne session was appointed in the cathedrall church of saint Paule, upon the three and twentieth day of September, and another the five and twentieth daie of the same month, in the hall of the Blacke friers at London, in which places the said lord was examined, apowed, and fully heard, and in conclusion by the archbishop of Canturburie denounced an heretike, & remitted againe to the Tower of London, from which place, either by helpe of friends, or favour of keepers, he privilie escaped and came unto Wales, where he remained for a season.

After this, the king keeping his Christmasse at his manor of Eltham, was advertised, that sir Roger Acton knight, a man of great wit and possessions, John Browne esquier, John Benerlie priest, and a great number of other were assembled in armour against the king, his brethren, the clergie and realme. These newes came to the king, on the twelfth daie in Christmasse, whereupon understanding that they were in a place called Ficket field beside London, on the backe side of saint Giles, he straight got him to his palace at Westminster, in as secret wise as he might, and there calling to him certeine bands of armed men, he repaired into saint Giles fields, nere to the said place (where he understood they should fullie meet about midnight) and so handled the matter, that he took some, and slew some, such as stood with his pleasure. The captives of them afore mentioned, being apprehended, were brought to the kings presence, and to him declared the causes of their commotion

The king used one policie, which much served to the discomfiting of the adversaries (as Thom. Walsingham faith) which was this: he gave order, that all the gates of London should be strictly kept and garded, so as none should come in or out, but such as were knownen to go to the king. Whereby came it to passe, that the chiefest succour appointed to come to the captives of the rebels, was by that means cut off, where otherwise fuerlie (had it not bene thus prevented and staied) there had issued forth of London to have joined with them, to the number (as it was thought) of fiftie thousand persons, one and other, servants, prentises, and citizens, confederate with them that were thus assembled in Ficket field. Divers also that came from sundrie parts of the realme, hasting towards the place, to be there at their appointed time, chanced to light among the kings men, who being taken and demanded whether they went with such speed, answered, they came to meet with their capteine the lord Cobham.

But whether he came thither at all, or made shift for himselfe to get awaye, it doth not appeare; for he could not be heard of at that time (as Thomas Walsingham confesseth) although the king by proclamation promised a thousand marks to him that could bring him forth, with great liberties to the cities or townes that would discover where he was. By this it maie appeare, how greatlie he was beloved, that there could not one be found, that for so great a reward would bring him to light. Among other that were taken was one William Purle, who dwelt in Dunsfable, a man of great wealth, and by his occupation a hewer, an earnest maintainer of the lord Cobhams opinions, and (as the brute ran) in hope to be highlie advanced by him if their purposed deuilse had taken place, apparant by this; that he had two horses trapped with guilt harness led after him, and in his bosome a paire of gilt spurs (as it was deemed) prepared for himselfe to weare, looking to be made knight by the lord Cobhams hands at that present time. But when he saw how their purpose quailed, he withdrew into the citie with great feare to hide himselfe; howbeit he was perceived, taken, and finally executed among others.

To conclude, so manie persons hereupon were apprehended, that all the prisons in and about London were full, the chiefe of them were condemned by the cleargie of heresie, and attainted of high treason in the Guildhall of London, and adjudged for that offense to be hawten and hanged, and for heresie to be consumed with fire, gallowses and all, which judgement was executed the same month, on the said sir Roger Acton, and eight and twentie others. ¶ Some saie, that the occasion of their death was onelie for the conveying of the lord Cobham out of prison. Others write, that it was both for treason and heresie, and so it appeareth by the record. Certeine affirme, that it was for feined causes furnished by the spiritualltie, more upon displeasure than truth, and that they were assembled to heare their preacher (the foresaid Benerlie) in that place there, out of the waie from resort of people, lest they might not come together openly about any such matter, without danger to be apprehended; as the manner is, and hath bene ever of the persecuted flocke, when they are prohibited publickly the exercise of their religion. But howsoever the matter went with these men, apprehended they were, and diverse of them executed (as before ye have heard) whether for rebellion or heresie, or for both (as the forme of the indictment importeth) I need not to spend manie wordes, with others have so largely treated thereof; and therefore I refer those that wish to be more fullie satisfied herein unto their reports.

Whilſt in the Lent ſeaſon the king laie at ſail-lingworth, there came to him from Charles Dolphin of France certeine ambadaours, that brought with them a barrell of Paris balles, which from their maſter they preſented to him for a token that was taken in verie ill part, as ſent in ſcoone, to ſignifie, that it was more meet for the king to paſſe the time with ſuch childiſh exerciſe, than to attempt any worthy exploit. Wherefore the k. wrote to him, that per-ought long, he would tolle him ſome London balles that perchance ſhould ſhake the walles of the beſt court in France. ¶ This yeare, Thom. Arundell archbiſhop of Canturburie departed this life, a ſtout prelat, and an earneſt mainteiner of the Romiſh religion: Henrie Chichele biſhop of ſaint Dauid ſucceeded the ſame Arundell in the ſee of Canturburie, and the kings confeſſor, Stephan Watrington a Carmelite frier was made biſhop of S. Dauid. Henrie Perſie then but a child, ſonne to the lord Henrie Perſie ſurnamed Hotſpur, after his fathers deceaſe, 20 that was ſaine at Shrewſburie field, was conueied into Scotland, and there left by his grandfather, where euer ſince he had remained: the king therefore pitied his caſe, and ſo procured for him, that he came home, and was reſtozed to all his lands and earledome of Northumberland, which lands beſore had bene giuen to the lord John, the kings brother.

A caſe verie ſtrange, and for manie cauſes alwaies right worthe of remembrance, in this yeare 1414, the ſecond of this kings reigne did befall, which concerning in it ſo manie matters for knowledge of Gods great power and iuſtice, of wiſſull breaking his diuine lawes, of the eaſie ſlip into ruine where his mercie doth not ſtaie vs, the buſie bogging of the di-uell alwaies, our weakeneſſe in combat with him, into what outrage and confuſion he haleth where he is not withſtood, with what tyrannie he tormenteth where he vanquiſheth, what the will and power of a ſouereigne ouer a ſubiect may force in caſes of iniquitie, where by vertue and grace he be not reſtrai-ned: the zeale of a parent, the pangs of a child, but cheſtic the verie plague of Gods wrath and indignation vpon wiſſull and obſtinate offenders, all which at thoſe daies though touched in payles, yet at all times and euerie where ſo well ſeruing for example and warning, it hath bene thought verie conuenient the ſame in our ſtores alſo here to be noted, which was thus. At this time newes were brought into France, how king Lancelot (the aduerſarie to Elwes king of Sicill) was departed, and in manner thus. It hapned that he fell in loue with a yong damoſell his owne phyſicians daughter (a perſon ve-rie beautifull) and he in hope to inioy hir the eaſilier, cauſed hir father for his conſent to be talked withall in the matter, which he vtterlie reſuſed to grant, and ſhewed forth manie reaſons for him; but at laſt all cauſes & excuſes reiected, ſith (though conſtrained) he muſt needs aſſent, ſeined himſelfe willing and content. And forcing talke with his daughter vpon his mind in the matter, cheſtic how meet it were he beſed his counſell how beſt with the king to keepe hir ſtill in grace, he gaue hir a little box of ointment, and inſtruction withall, that when the king ſhould come to haue his will, the ſhould aſore with that balme annoint all hir toombe; the damoſell on good obſervation did after (at oportunitie) as hir father taught hir. Wherevpon ſo pittifullie came it to paſſe, that the verie ſame night the king laie with hir, his bellie and hers were by and by ſet as it were all on a ſmoking fier, with toments of ſuch vquenchable ſcorching and burning euen into the verie en-trailes, that he of his kingdome, his life, his loue, and the of hir princelie promotion, thus ſome both together made a forrowfull end. After the plaie of this lamentable tragedie, the phyſician fled for his ſafetie, and ſtraight vpon the newes king Elwes gathered a great aſſembly, wherewith to paſſe towards Pa-ples, and ſent beſore a good companie vnder the lord Longue marſhall of France.

In the ſecond yeare of his reigne, king Henrie called his high court of parlement, the laſt daie of Au-gill in the towne of Leiſceſter, in which parlement manie profitable lawes were concluded, and manie petitions moued, were for that time deſerred. Amongſt which, one was, that a bill exhibited in the parlement holden at Weſtmiſter in the eleuenth yeare of king Henrie the fourth (which by reaſon the king was then troubled with ciuill diſcord, came to none effect) might now with good deliberation be pondered, and brought to ſome good concluſion. The effect of which ſupplication was, that the temporall lands deuoutlie giuen, and diſordinatlie ſpent by religious, and other ſpiritual persons, ſhould be ſeized into the kings hands, ſith the ſame might ſuffice to mainteine, to the honoz of the king, and deſenſe of the realme, ſixtene earles, ſixtene hundred knights, ſix thouſand and two hundred eſquiers, and a hundred almehſe-houſes, for reliefe onelie of the poore, impotent, and needie persons, and the king to haue cleere-lie to his coffers twenty thouſand pounds, with manie other prouiſions and values of religious houſes, which I paſſe ouer.

This bill was much noted, and more feared among the religious ſort, whom ſuerlie it touched verie nere, and therefore to find remedie againſt it, they determined to aſſaie all waies to put by and ouerthrow this bill: wherein they thought beſt to trie if they might moue the kings mood with ſome ſharpe in-uention, that he ſhould not regard the importunate petitions of the commons. Wherevpon, on a daie in the parlement, Henrie Chichele archbiſhop of Canturburie made a pithie oration, wherein he declared, how not onelie the duchies of Normandie and Agentaine, with the counties of Anion and Maine, and the countrie of Gaſcoigne, were by vndoubted title appertaining to the king, as to the lawfull and one-lie heire of the ſame; but alſo the whole realme of France, as heire to his great grandfather king Edward the third.

Herein did he much inuie againſt the ſurniſhed and falſe ſained lawe Salike, which the Frenchmen alledge euer againſt the kings of England in barre of their iuſt title to the crowne of France. The verie words of that ſuppoſed lawe are theſe, In terram Sali- cam mulieres ne ſuccedant, that is to ſaie, Into the Sa-like land let not women ſucceed. Which the French gloſſers expound to be the realme of France, and that this lawe was made by king Pharamond; whereas yet their owne authozs affirme, that the land Sa-like is in Germanie, betwene the riuers of Elbe and Sala; and that when Charles the great had ouer-come the Saxons, he placed there certeine Frenchmen, which hauing in diſdeine the diſhoneſt maners of the Germane women, made a law, that the females ſhould not ſucceed to any inheritance within that land, which at this daie is called Heſſen, ſo that if this be true, this lawe was not made for the realme of France, nor the Frenchmen poſſeſſed the land Sa-like, till foure hundred and one and twentieth yeares after the death of Pharamond, the ſuppoſed maker of this Salike lawe, for this Pharamond deceaſed in the yeare 426, and Charles the great ſubdued the Saxons, and placed the Frenchmen in thoſe parts beyond the riuier of Sala, in the yeare 805.

Moreouer, it appeareth by their owne writers, that king Pepine, which deſepoſed Childerike, claimed the crowne of France, as heire generall, for that he was deſcended of Blithild daughter to king Clothat the first: Hugh Capet also, who usurped the crowne upon Charles duke of Lozaine, the sole heire male of the line and stocke of Charles the great, to make his title seeme true, and appeare good, though in deed it was sharke naught, conueied himselfe as heire to the labie Lingard, daughter to king Charlemaine, sonne to Lewes the emperor, that was son to Charles the great. King Lewes also the tenth or thertwile called saint Lewes, being verie heire to the said usurper Hugh Capet, could neuer be satisfied in his conscience how he might iustlie kepe and possesse the crowne of France, till he was perswaded and fullie instructed, that quene Isabell his grandmother was lineallie descended of the labie Ermengard daughter and heire to the aboue named Charles duke of Lozaine, by the which marriage, the bloud and line of Charles the great was againe vnted and restored to the crowne & scepter of France, so that more clere than the sunne it openlie appeareth, that the title of king Depin, the claime of Hugh Capet, the possession of Lewes, yea and the French kings to this daie, are deriued and conueied from the heire female, though they would vnder the colour of such a fauned law, barre the kings and princes of this realme of England of their right and lawfull inheritance.

The archbishop further alleaged out of the booke of Numbers this saying: When a man dieth without a sonne, let the inheritance descend to his daughter. At length, hauing said sufficientlie for the prowe of the kings iust and lawfull title to the crowne of France, he exhorted him to aduance forth his banner to fight for his right, to conquer his inheritance, to spare neither blond, sword, nor fire, with his warre was iust, his cause good, and his claime true. And to the intent his louing chaplains and obedient subjects of the spirituallie might shew themselves willing and desirous to aid his maiestie for the recouerie of his ancient right and true inheritance, the archbishop declared that in their spirituall conuocation, they had granted to his highnesse such a summe of monie, as neuer by no spirituall persons was to any prince before those daies giuen or aduanced.

When the archbishop had ended his prepared tale, Raife Beuill earle of Westmerland, and as then lord Warden of the marches against Scotland, vnderstanding that the king vpon a courageous desire to recouer his right in France, would shortly take the wars in hand, thought good to moue the king to begin first with Scotland, and thereupon declared how easie a matter it should be to make a conquest there, and how greatlie the same should further his wished purpose for the subduing of the Frenchmen, concluding the summe of his tale with this old saying: that Who so will France win, must with Scotland first begin. Many matters he touched, as well to shew how necessarie the conquest of Scotland should be, as also to proue how iust a cause the king had to attempt it, trusting to perswade the king and all other to be of his opinion.

The duke of Excester his wife and pithie answer to the earle of Westmerlands saying.

A true saying.

But after he had made an end, the duke of Excester, uncle to the king, a man well learned and wise, who had bene sent into Italie by his father, intending that he should haue been a preack, replied against the earle of Westmerlands oration, affirming rather that he which would Scotland win, he with France must first begin. For if the king might once compass the conquest of France, Scotland could not long resist; so that conquer France, and Scotland would soon obeye. For where should the Scots learne policie and skill to defend themselves, if they had not their bringing by and training in France? If the French pensions maintained not the Scottish nobilitie, in what case should they be? Then take alwaie

France, and the Scots will soon be tamed; France being to Scotland the same that the sap is to the tree, which being taken awaie, the tree must needs die and wither.

To be brieue, the duke of Excester used such earnest and pithie perswasions, to induce the king and the whole assemblie of the parlement to credit his words, that immediatlie after he had made an end, all the companie began to crie; Warre, warre; France, France. Whereby the bill for dissolving of religious houses was clere set aside, and nothing thought on but onelie the recouering of France, according as the archbishop had moued. And vpon this point, after a few ads besides for the wealth of the realme established, the parlement was prorogued vnto Westminster. ¶ Some write, that in this parlement it was enacted, that Lollards and heretikes with their maintainers and fauourers should be holden aduindged guiltie of high treason: but in the statute made in the same parlement against Lollards, we find no such words: albeit by force of that statute it was ordeined, that persons so conuicted & executed, should lose their lands holden in fee simple, and all other their goods and cattels, as in cases of felonye.

During this parlement, there came to the king ambassadors, as well from the French king that was then in the hands of the Dauntiall faction, as also from the duke of Burgogny, for aid against that faction; promising more (as was said) than laie well in his power to performe. The king shortly after sent ambassadors to them both, as the bishop of Durham, and Porwich, with others. Porcouer at this parlement, John the kings brother was created duke of Bedford, and his brother Humphre duke of Gloucester. Also, Thomas Beaufort, marquisse Dorset, was created duke of Excester. Immediatlie after, the king sent ouer into France his uncle the duke of Excester, the lord Greie admerall of England, the archbishop of Dublin, and the bishop of Porwich, ambassadors vnto the French king, with five hundred horse, which were lodged in the temple house in Paris, keeping such triumphant chere in their lodging, and such a solemne estate in their riding through the citie, that the Parisiens and all the Frenchmen had no small meruell at their honorable port.

The French king receiued them verie honorable, and banketted them right sumptuouslie, shewing to them iusts and partiall pastimes, by the space of three daies together, in the which iusts the king himselfe, to shew his courage and actiuitie to the Englishmen, manfullie brake speares and lustilie tourneyed. When the triumph was ended, the English ambassadors, hauing a time appointed them to declare their message, admitted to the French kings presence, required of him to deliuer vnto the king of England the realme and crowne of France, with the entier duchies of Aquitaine, Normandie and Anjou, with the countries of Poitou and Maine. Many other requests they made: and this offered with all, that if the French king would without warre and effusion of christian blood, render to the king their maister his verie right & lawfull inheritance, that he would be content to take in marriage the lady Katharine, daughter to the French king, and to indow hir with all the duchies and countries before rehearsed: and if he would not so do, then the king of England did expresse and signifie to him, that with the aid of God, and helpe of his people, he would recouer his right and inheritance wrongfullie withheld from him, with mostall warre, and dint of sword. ¶ This in effect doth our English poet comprise in his report of the occasion, which Henric the

The Frenchmen being not a little abashed at these demands, thought not to make anie absolute answer in so weightie a cause, till they had further breatheth; and therefore praised the English ambassadors to sit to the king their maister, that they now having no opportunitie to conclude in so high a matter, would hostilely send ambassadors into England, which should certifie & declare to the king their whole mind, purpose, and intent. The English ambassadors returned with this answer, making relation of eue-rie thing that was said or done. King Henrie after the returne of his ambassadors, determined fullie to make warre in France, conceiuing a good and perfect hope to haue fortunate successe, sith victorie for the most part followeth where right leadeth, being advanced forward by iustice, and set forth by equi-tie.

And because manie Frenchmen were promoted to ecclesiasticall dignities, as some to benefices, and some to abbeyes and priories within the realme, and sent daileie innumerable summes of monie into France, for the reliefe of their naturall countreinmen and kinnsfolke, he therefore in fauour of the publike wealth of his realme and subiects, in a councell called at London, about Michaelmas, caused to be ordeined, that no stranger hereafter should be promoted to anie spirituall dignitie or degree within this realme, without his especiall licence, and roiall consent; and all they that should be admitted, should find sufficient surties, that not to disclose the secrets of this realme to anie foreyn person, nor to minister aid or succour to anie of them with monie, or by anie other means. This was confirmed in a conuocation called at the same time by the new archbishop of Canturburie.

Therefore, such as were to go vnto the generall counsell holden at Constance, were named and appointed to make them reade: for the king hauing knowlege from the emperoz Sigismund, of the assembling of that counsell, thought it not conuenient to sit still as an hearer, and no partaker in so high a cause, which touched the whole state of the christian common-wealth, as then troubled by reason of the schisme that yet continued. Therefore he sent thither Richard earle of Warwike, the bishops of Salisburie, Bath, and Hereford, the abbat of Westminster, and the prior of Worcester, with diuerse other bo-rtoys and learned men of the spiritualtie; besides knights and esquires. They were in number eight hundred horses, so well appointed and furnished, as well the men as horses, that all nations marvelled to see such an honorable companie come from a countreie so far distant.

Querle other things were concluded at that present: for the king had caused not onelie the lords of the spiritualtie, but also of the temporaltie to assemble here at London the same time, to treat specially of his iournie that he purposed to make shortly into France: and hereupon meanes was made for the gathering of monie; which was granted with so good a will both of the spiritualtie and temporaltie; that there was leuied the summe of three hundred thousand markes English: and herewith order was given to gather a great host of men, thorough all his dominions. And for the more increasing of his nauie, he sent into Holland, Zealand, and Friesland, to conduct and hire ships for the transporting and conveying over of his men and munitions of war, and finallye provided for armour, victuals, monie, artillery, carriage, boates to passe over rivers covered with leather, tents, and all other things requisite for so high an enterprise.

The Frenchmen hauing knowledge hereof, the Dolphin, who had the gouernance of the realme, because his father was fallen into his old disease of frensie, sent for the dukes of Berrie and Alanson, and all the other lordes of the counsell of France: by whose aduise it was determined, that they should not onelie prepare a sufficient armie to resist the king of England, when so euer he attined to inuade France, but also to trafficke and furnish the towncs on the frontiers and sea coasts with conuenient garri- sons of men: and further to send to the king of Eng- land a solemne ambassage, to make to him some of- fers according to the demands before rehearsed. The charge of this ambassage was committed to the earle of Wandoline, to maister William Bourcier archbishop of Burges, and to maister Peter Fre- mell bishop of Aiseur, to the lordes of Forcy and Baz- quemont, and to maister Gaultier Cole the kings secretaire, and diuerse others.

These ambassadoers accompanied with 350 horses, passed the sea at Calis, and landed at Douer, before whose arrivall the king was departed from Winchesore to Wincheser, intending to have gone to Hampton, there to have suerued his nenie: but hearing of the ambassadoers appochoing, he tarried still at Wincheser, where the said French lords shewed themselves verie honorable before the king and his nobilitie. At time prefixed, before the kings presence, sitting in his throne imperiall, the archbishop of Burges made an eloquent and a long oration, dissuading warre, and praising peace; offering to the king of England a great summe of monie, with diversel countries, being in verie deed but bafe and poore, as a dowrie with the ladie Catharine in marriage, so that he would dissolue his armie, and dismisse his soldiers, which he had gathered and put in a readinesse.

When his oration was ended, the king caused the ambassadors to be highlye feasted, and set them at his own table. And after a daie assigned in the foresaid hall, the archbishop of Canturburie to their oration made a notable answer, the effect whereof was, that if the French king would not glue with his daughter in marriage the duches of Aquitaine, Artois, and all other seignories and dominions sometimes appertaining to the noble progenitors of the king of England, he would in no wise retire his armie, nor breake his tournee; but would with all diligence enter into France, and destroye the people, waste the countrie, and subvert the townes with blood, sword, and fire, and neuer cease till he had recovered his ancient right and lawfull patrimonie. The king answered the archbishops saying, and in the word of a prince promised to performe it to the bittermost.

The archbishop of Burges much græued, that his ambassage was no more regarded, after certeine bzags bluffered out with impatience, as more presuming vpon his prelacie, than respecting his dutie of consideration to whom he spake and what became him to saie; he paid safe conduct to depart. Which the king gentlie granted, and added withall to this effect: A little esteeme your French bzags, & lesse set by your power and strength; I know perfectly my right to my region; which you usurpe; & except you denie the apparant truth, to do you selues also: if you neither doe nor will know it, yet God and the world knoweth it. Great preparation for French “ fance ye haue not yet taffed. If he haue louing subiects, I am (I thanke God) not diftored of the fame: and I faie this vnto you, that before one yeare paffe, I trust to make the highest crowne of your countrie to fcope, and the proudest miter to learne his humiliatedo. In the meane time tell this to the vſurper your maſter, that within thre moneths, I will enter into France, as into mine owne true and lawfull patrimonie, appointing to acquire the fame, not with bzag of words, but with dedes of men, and dint of ſword, by the aid of God, in whome is my whole truſt and confidence. Further matter at this preſent I impart not vnto you, ſauing that with warrant your mate depart ſuerlie and ſafelie into your countrie, where I truſt ſoner to viſit you, than you ſhall haue cauſe to bid me welcome. With this anſwer the ambaffadors ſoze diſpleaſed in their minds (although they were highlie interteined and liberallie rewarded) departed into their countrie, repoſting to the Dolphin how they had ſped.

After the French ambaffadors were departed, the king like a prouident prince, thought good to take order for the reſiſting of the Scots, if (according to their maner) they ſhould attempt aſie thing againſt his ſubiects in his abſence. For that point appointed he the earle of Weſtmerland, the lord Scrope, the baron of Greſſocke, ſir Robert Umfreuil, & diuerſe other valiant captaine to keepe the frontiers & marches of Scotland, which ſir Robert Umfreuil on the daie of Marie Magdalene fought with the Scots at the towne of Codering, hauing in his companie onelic thre hundred archers, and ſeuene ſcore ſpears, where he after long conflict ſlue of his enimies ſixtie and oddes, toke thre hundred and ſixtie priſoners, diſcomfited and put to flight one thouſand and more, whom he followed in chaſe aboute twelue miles, but their hands full of prizes and priſoners, retired homeward (not unhurt) to the caſtell of Rochefborough, of the which he was captaine.

When the king had all prouiſions readie, and ordered all things for the deſence of his realme, he leauing behind him for gouernour of the realme, the queene his mother in law, departed to Southampton, to take ſhip into France. And firſt princelie appointing to aduertise the French king of his coming, therefore diſpatched Antelope his purſeuant at armes with letters to him for reſtitution of that which he wrongfully withheld, contrary to the lawes of God and man: the king further declaring how ſoze he was that he ſhould be thus compelled for repeating of his right and iuſt title of inheritance, to make warre to the deſtruction of chriſtian people, but ſithens he had offered peace which could not be reſeued, now for fault of iuſtice, he was forced to take armes. Neuertheleſſe exhorted the French king in the bowels of Jeſu Chriſt, to render him that which was his owne, whereby effuſion of Chriſtian blood might be avoided. Theſe letters cheſtie to this effect and purpoſe, were written and dated from Hampton the fiſt of Auguſt. When the ſame were preſented to the French king, and by his counsell well peruſed, anſwer was made, that he would take aduiſe, and prouide therein as time and place ſhould be conuenient, ſo the meſſenger licenced to depart at his pleaſure.

When king Henrie had ſullie furniſhed his nauie with men, munition, & other prouiſions, perſeuing that his captiuitie miſliked nothing ſo much, as deſaie, determined his ſouldiers to go a ſhip-board and auaite. But ſee the hap, the night before the daie appointed for their departure, he was credible informed, that Richard earle of Cambridge brother to Edward duke of Poike, and Henrie lord Scrope of Spalham lord treaſurer, with Thomas Craie a knight of Northumberland, being confederat together, had conſpired his death: wherefore he cauſed them to be apprehended. The ſaid lord Scrope was in ſuch fauour with the king, that he admitted him ſometime to be his bedfellow, in whoſe fidelitie the king repoſed ſuch truſt, that when aſie priuat or publicke counsell was in hand, this lord had much in the determination of it. For he repreſented ſo great grauitie in his countenance, ſuch modeſtie in behauiour, and ſo vertuous zeale to all goodlineſſe in his talke, that whatſoeuer he ſaid was thought for the moſt part neceſſarie to be done and followed. Alſo the ſaid ſir Thomas Craie (as ſome write) was of the kings priuat counsell.

Theſe priſoners vpon their examination, confeſſed, that for a great ſumme of monie which they had receiued of the French king, they intended betwixt either to haue deliuered the king alieue into the hands of his enimies, or elſe to haue murdered him before he ſhould arrive in the duchie of Normandie. When king Henrie had heard all things opened, which he deſired to know, he cauſed all his nobilitie to come before his preſence, before whom he cauſed to be bzought the offendours alſo, and to them ſaid. Hauing thus conſpired the death and deſtruction of me, which am the head of the realme and gouernour of all this people, it maie be (no doubt) but that you likewiſe haue ſworne the confuſion of all that are here with me, and alſo the deſolation of your owne countrie. To what horrox Lord for any true Engliſh hart to conſider, that ſuch an execrable iniquitie ſhould ener ſo betwixt you, as for pleaſing of a foren enimie to imbrue your hands in your blood, and to ruine your owne native ſoile. Reuenge here in touching my perſon, though I ſeeke not; yet for the ſafeguard of you my deere friends, & for due preſeruation of all ſorts, I am by office to cauſe example to be ſhelued. Yet hence therefore ye poze miſerable wretches to the reſeining of your iuſt reward, wherein Gods maiſtie give you grace of his mercie and repentance of your heinous offeſes. And ſo immediatlie they were had to execution.

This done, the king calling his lords againe afore him, ſaid in words ſeu and with good grace. Of his enterpriſes he recounted the honor and glorie, where of they with him were to be partakers, the great confidence he had in their noble minds, which could not but remember them of the famous feats that their anceſſors aforetime in France had atchieued, whereof the due report for ener recorded remained yet in regiſter. The great mercie of God that had ſo gracionlie reuealed vnto him the treaſon at hand, whereby the true harts of thoſe afore him made ſo eminent & apparant in his eie, as they might be right ſure he would neuer forget it. The doubt of danger to be nothing in reſpect of the certaintie of honor that they ſhould acquire, wherein himſelfe (as they ſaw) in perſon would be lord and leader through Gods grace. To whoſe maiſtie as cheſtie was knowing the equitie of his demand: euen ſo to his mercie did he onelic recommend the ſucceſſe of his trauels. When the king had ſaid, all the noble men kneeled downe, & promiſed faithfullie to ſerue him, bulie to obey him, and rather to die than to ſuffer him to fall into the hands of his enimies.

This done, the king thought that ſuerlie all treaſon and conſpiracie had bene betterlie extind: not ſuſpecting the fire which was newlie kindled, and ceaſed not to increaſe, till at length it buſt out into ſuch a flame, that catching the beames of his houſe and familie, his line and ſtocke was cleane conſumed to aſhes. Diuerſe write that Richard earle of Cambridge did not conſpire with the lord Scrope & Thomas Craie for the murdering of king Henrie to pleaſe please the French king withall, but onelie to the intent to exalt to the crowne his brother in law Edmund earle of March as heire to Lionell duke of Clarence: after the death of which earle of March, for diuerse secret impediments, not able to haue issue, the earle of Cambridge was sure that the crowne should come to him by his wife, and to his children, of his begotten. And therefore (as was thought) he rather confessed himselfe for need of monie to be corrupted by the French king, than he would declare his inward mind, and open his verie intent and secret purpose, which if it were espyed, he saw plainlie that the earle of March should haue tasted of the same cuppe that he had drunken, and what should haue come to his owne children he much doubted. Therefore despitte of comfort & in despaire of life to saue his children, he feined that tale, desiring rather to saue his succession than himselfe, which he did in deed: for his sonne Richard duke of Yorke not plainlie but openlie claimed the crowne, and Edward his sonne both claimed it, & gained it, as after it shall appeare. Which thing if king Henrie had at this time either doubted, or foresene, had neuer bene like to haue come to passe, as Hall saith.

The effect of the earle of Cambridge's misdeement.

But what soeuer hath bene reported of the confession of the earle of Cambridge, certeine it is, that in deed he was by the name of Richard earle of Cambridge of Conneburgh in the countie of Yorke knight, and with him Thomas Craie of Heton in the countie of Northumberland knight; for that they the twentieth daie of Julie, in the third yeare of king Henrie the fifts reigne, at Southampton, and in diuerse other places within this realme, had conspired together with a pover of men to them associat, without the kings licence, to haue led awaie the lord Edmund earle of March into Wales, and then to haue procured him to take vpon him the supreme gouernment of the realme, in case that king Richard the second were dead: and herewith had purposed to set forth a proclamation there in Wales, in name of the said earle of March, as heire of the crowne against king Henrie, by the name of Henrie of Lancaster the usurper, to the end that by such meanes they might draw the more number of the kings liege people onto the said earle; and further to haue conueied a banner of the armes of England, and a certeine crowne of Spaine set vpon a pallet, and laid in gage to the said earle of Cambridge, by the king, together with the said earle of March into the parties of Wales aforesaid.

Alfred

Further, that the said earle of Cambridge, and sir Thomas Craie had appointed certeine of the kings liege people to repaire into Scotland, and to bying from thence one Thomas Trumpington; also another resembling in shape, fauour, and countenance king Richard, and Henrie Perie, together with a great multitude of people to fight with the king, and him to destroe in open field. Beside this, that they had meant to win certeine castels in Wales, and to keepe them against the king: and manie other treasons they had contriued, as by the indictment was specified, to the intent they might destroe the king and his brethren, the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, and other the great lords & peers of the realme. And Henrie Scrope of Spalham, of Harflet, in the countie of Yorke was likewise indicted, as consenting to the premises. So that it appeareth their purpose was well enough then perceiued, although hapilie not much bynt abroad, for considerations thought necessarie to haue it rather hysht and kept secret.

About the selfe same time the lord Cobham with his friends, whether as one of counsell in the conspi-racie with the earle of Cambridge or not, was determined to haue some attempt against the lord of Aburgauennie, who being aduertised thereof, got for his defense from Worcester, Hereford, Leakeburie, and other places thereabout, to the number of fise thousand archers, and other armed men, which came to him vnto his castell of Hancleie: whereof when the lord Cobham was aduertised, he withdrew againe to such secret places about Maluerne, as he had prouided for his suertie, to resort vnto: but a priest that belonged vnto him, was taken, and diuerse other, who disclosed to the lord Aburgauennie, one of the places where the said lord Cobham with his men vsed to keepe themselves close. Vnto that place the lord Aburgauennie went, where he found in deed monie and armor piled by betwixt two wals, handsonelie conueied and framed for the purpose; but the lord Cobham with his folkes were withdrawn into some other place, after they once heard, that the earle of Cambridge and the lord Scrope were executed.

But now to proceed with king Henries doings.

After this, when the wind came about prosperous to his purpose, he caused the mariners to woe by anchors, and hoise by sailes, and to set forward with a thousand ships, on the bigill of our ladie daie the Assumption, and toke land at Caer, commonlie called Aidcaur, where the riuer of Saine runneth into the sea, without resistance. At his first comming on land, he caused proclamation to be made, that no person should be so hardie on paine of death, either to take anie thing out of anie church that belonged to the same, or to hurt or doe anie violence either to priests, women, or anie such as should be found without weapon or armor, and not readie to make resistance: also that no man should renew anie quarell or strife, whereby anie fraie might arise to the disquieting of the armie.

proclamation.

Princelie and
wiselie.

The next daie after his landing, he marched toward the towne of Harflue, standing on the riuer of Saine betwene two hills; he besieged it on euerie side, raising bulwarks and a bastell, in which the two earles of Bent & Huntington were placed, with Cornwall, Craie, Steward, and Porter. On that side towards the sea, the king lodged with his field, and the duke of Clarence on the further side towards Hone. There were within the towne the lords de Monteuill and Caucourt, with diuerse other that beliantlie defended the siege, doing what damage they could to their aduersaries; and damming by the riuer that hath his course through the towne, the water rose so high betwixt the kings campe, and the duke of Clarence campe (diuided by the same riuer) that the Englishmen were constrained to withdraw their artillerie from one side, where they had planted the same.

Harding.

The French king being aduertised, that king Henrie was arrived on that coast, sent in all haste the lord de la Brette constable of France, the seneshall of France, the lord Boucquait marshall of France, the seneshall of Henault, the lord Lignie with other, which fortified townes with men, victuals, and artillerie on all those frontiers towards the sea. And hearing that Harflue was besieged, they came to the castell of Candebecke, being not farre from Harflue, to the intent they might succor their friends which were besieged, by some policie or meanes: but the Englishmen, notwithstanding all the damage that the Frenchmen could worke against them, for-raied the countrie, spoiled the villages, bringing manie a rich preie to the campe before Harflue. And daie-lie was the towne assaulted: for the duke of Gloucester, to whom the order of the siege was committed, made three mines vnder the ground, and appoching to the wals with his engins and ordinance, would not suffer them within to take anie rest.

The king besieged Har-flue.

Tius Linus.

For although they with their countermining somewhat disappointed the Englishmen, & came to fight with them hand to hand within the mines, so that they went no further forward with that tooke; yet they were so inclosed on each side, as well by water as land, that succour they saw could none come to them: for the king lieng with his battell on the hill side on the one partie, and the duke of Clarence beyond the river that passeth by the towne, and runneth into Saine on the other partie, beside other lords and captains that were lodged with their retinues for their most advantage: none could be suffered to go in, or come forth, without their licence: insomuch that such powder as was sent to haue bene conueied into the towne by water, was taken by the English ships that watched the river.

The captains within the towne, perceiuing that they were not able long to resist the continuall assaults of the Englishmen, knowing that their walls were undermined, and like to be ouerthrowne (as one of their bulwarks was alreadie, where the earles of Huntington and Kent had set up their banners) sent an officer at armes forth about midnight after the feast daie of saint Lambert, which fell that yeare upon the tuesday, to beseech the king of England to appoint some certeine persons as commissioners from him, with whome they within might treat about some agreement. The duke of Clarence, to whome this messenger first declared his errand, aduertised the king of their request, who granting thereunto, appointed the duke of Excester, with the lord Fitz Hugh, and sir Thomas Erpingham, to vnderstand their minds, who at the first requested a truce untill sundae next following the feast of saint Michaell, in which meane time if no succour came to remouue the siege, they would undertake to deliuer the towne into the kings hands, their liues and goods saued.

3 six daies
respit.

The king aduertised hereof, sent them word, that except they would surrender the towne to him the morow next ensuing, without any condition, they should spend no more time in talke about the matter. But yet at length through the earnest sute of the French lords, the king was contented to grant them truce untill nine of the clocke the next sundae, being the two and twentieth of September; with condition, that if in the meane time no rescue came, they should yeld the towne at that houre, with their bodies and goods to stand at the kings pleasure. And for assurance thereof, they deliuered into the kings hands thirtie of their best captains and merchants within that towne as pledges. But other witte, that it was couenanted, that they should deliuer but one lie thealue pledges, and that if the siege were not raised by the French kings power within six daies next following, then should they deliuer the towne into the king of England hands, and thirtie of the chiefeest personages within the same, to stand for life or death at his will and pleasure: and as for the residue of the men of warre and townermen, they should depart whether they would, without carieng forth either armour, weapon, or goods.

The king neuerthelesse was after content to grant a respit vpon certeine conditions, that the captains within might haue time to send to the French king for succour (as before ye haue heard) least he intending greater exploits, might lose time in such small matters. When this composition was agreed vpon, the lord Baquenuill was sent vnto the French king, to declare in what point the towne stood. To whome the Dolphin answered, that the kings power was not yet assembled, in such number as was conuenient to raise so great a siege. This answer being brought vnto the captains within the towne, they rendered it vnto the king of England, after that the third daie was expired, which was on the daie of saint Maurice being the seuen and thirtieth daie after the siege was first laid. The souldiours were ransomed, and the towne sacked, to the great gaine of the Englishmen. Some writing of this yelding vnto of Harfue, doe in like sort make mention of the distresse whereto the people, then expelled out of their habitations, were driuen: insomuch as parents with their children, yong maids and old folke went out of the towne gates with beaute harts (God wot) as put to their present shifts to seeke them a new abode. Besides that, king Henrie caused proclamation to be made within his owne dominions of England, that whosoever (either handicraftsman, merchantman, gentleman, or plowman) would inhabit in Harfue, should haue his dwelling giuen him gratis, and his heire after him also inioy the like grace and fauour: insomuch that great multitudes flocked to the sea coasts, waiting wind and weather for their transportage into Harfue, where being arrived, wonderfull it is to tell, within how short a time the towne was peopled. This doth Anglorum prelia report, saieing (not without good ground, I beleue) as followeth;

All this done, the king ordeined captaine to the towne his uncle the duke of Excester, who established his lieutenant there, one sir John Fastolfe, with fiftene hundred men, or (as some haue) two thousand and thirtie sir knights, whereof the baron of Carew, and sir Hugh Lutterell, were two counsellors. And because many of his nobles whilst this siege laie before Harfue, fell sicke of the sir and other diseases, diuerse also dead, amongst whom the earle of Stafford, the bishop of Norwich, the lords Spolins and Burnell were foure (beside others) the king licenced his brother the duke of Clarence, John earle Marshall, and John earle of Arundell, being infected with that disease, to returne into England.

King Henrie, after the winning of Harfue, determined to haue proceeded further in the winning of other townes and fortresses: but because the dead time of the winter approached, it was determined by aduise of his counsell, that he should in all conuenient speed set forward, and march through the countrie towards Calis by land, least his returne as then homewards should of slanderous tongues be made a running atwaite: and yet that iournie was aduised perillous, by reason that the number of his people was much diminished by the sir and other feuers, which fore vered and brought to death about fiftene hundred persons of the armie: and this was the cause that his returne was the sooner appointed and concluded.

But before his departing thence, he entred into the towne of Harfue, & went to the church of saint Martines, and there offered. All the men of warre which had not paid their ransoms, he sware them on the holie euangelists, to yeld themselves prisoners at Calis by the feast of saint Martine in November next. There were two strong towers standing on the haue side at Harfue, which looking for aid, did not yeld, till ten daies after the towne was rendered. When the king had repaired the walles, bulwarks and rampiers about the towne, and furnished it with vittels and artillerie, he remoued from Harfue toward Pontholfe, intending to passe the river of Some with his armie, before the bridges were either withdrawen or broken. Such vittels and other necessaries as were to be caried with the armie, he appointed appointed to be laid on hoſſes, leauing the carts and wagons behind for leſſe incombre.

The French king hearing that the towne of Har- flue was gotten, and that the king of England was marching forward into the bowels of the realme of France, ſent out proclamations, and aſſembled people on euerie ſide, committing the whole charge of his armie to his ſonne the Dolphin and duke of Aquitaine, who incontinentlie cauſed the bridges to be broken, and the paſſages to be kept. Alſo they cau- ſed all the corne and vittells to be conueied awaie, or deſtroyed in all places, where it was coniectured that the Engliſhmen would paſſe. The king of England nothing diſmaied hereunto, kept his iourne in ſpite of his enemies, conſtraining them within diuerſe townes and holdes to ſurniſh him with vittells: but yet as he paſſed by the towne of Cio, the garrifon of the towne iſſued forth, and gaue the Engliſhmen a ſcurmy, who beat them into the towne with loſſe, namelie of a right valiant man of armes, named Lancelot Piers. There were manie Engliſhmen hurt with quarrels ſhot off from the lops and wals, as they purſued the enemies unto the gates.

At length the king approached the river of Some, finding all the bridges broken, he came to the paſſage of Blanchetake, where his great grandfather king Edward the third a little before had ſtriken the bat- tle of Crecie: but the paſſage was now ſo impeached with ſtokes in the botome of the ſord, that he could not paſſe, his enemies beſides there awaie ſo ſwar- ming on all ſides. He therefore marched forwards to Arames, marching with his armie, and paſſing with his carriage in ſo martiall a manner, that he ap- peared ſo terrible to his enemies, as they durſt not offer him battell. And yet the lord Dalbreth conſtable of France, the marſhall Boncequault, the earle of Glendofne great maſter of France, the duke of A- lanſon, and the earle of Richmond, with all the puiſ- ſance of the Dolphin laie at Abulle, but cuer kept the paſſages, and coaſted aloſe, like a hauke though ea- ger yet not hardie on his piece. The king of England kept on his iourne till he came to the brdge of ſaint Marce, where he found aboue thirtie thouſand Frenchmen, and there pitched his field, looking ſuer- tie to be fought withall.

Wherefore to incourage his capteins the more, he dubbed certeine of his hardie and valiant gentle- men knights, as John lord Ferrers of Grobie, Re- ginals of Greiſtroke, Piers Tempeſt, Chriſtopher Poſſible, Thomas Diſcoring, William Huddeſton, John Hoſbalt, Henrie Portimer, Philip Hall, and William his brother, Jaques de Diamond, and di- uerſe other: but the French making no ſemblance to fight, he departed in good order of battell by the towne of Amiens, to another towne nere to a ca- ſtell called Wolves, and there laie two daies looking for their bidding of battell euerie houre. From thence he came nere to Corbie, where he was ſtayed that night, for that the common people and pe- zants mightie there aſſembled, hauing gotten them ſome head and hartening by means of their number that was great, and by truſt of a ſtrength then ioined vnto them) made of men at armes (manie tow tall and well appointed for fight) all of the garrifon of Cor- bie: a ſtrong towne well walled and warded. Here upon at a ſtreit (which they had preoccupied) they ſtoodle from our armie not onelie kept the paſſage, but alſo upon vs gaue a proud onſet: wherein fir Hugh Stafford knight lord Bourghchier, cheſtine of a wing to the king vnder his ſtandard of Guien, and as then next to the enimie, though far inferior in number, yet with readie and valiant encounter receiued them. The force and ſlaughter grew great both on the one ſide and the other, by the French in & ſpeciall at firſt right fiercelie purſued, in ſo much as with an hardie charge vpon our men, they had both beat downe the ſtandard, and alſo from vs quite worne it awaie, to their hie incouragement, and our incredible deſpite and diſmaie. Whereat one John Bromley of Bromley in Staffordſhire eſquier, a nere kinfman vnto the lord Bourghchier, was euen ſtreight ſo pearſed at hart, as he could not conteine him, but by and by ran eagerlie vpon the French, and with his ſouldiers (in whom worth and teene had al- readie inflamed ſurie and deſire of reuenge) did ſo fiercelie ſet vpon them, that they were not onlie bea- ten backe, but alſo forced to abandon the place. At this puſh the capteine cutting through the thickeſt, ſtrake downe the champion that bare the ſtandard, and ſo gloriouſlie recovered it againe, and after dur- ring the fight (where as manie of the French loſt their liues) couragiuſlie ouer his ſouldiers auanced it himſelfe. The reſt that fled awaie our people pur- ſued in chaſing & ſlaughter vnto Corbie verie gates. So in victorie, honor, and great ioy, with our ſmall loſſe (in comparifon) thanks vnto Gods maielte, the cheſtine brought his hoſt into his campe and order againe. The ſingular proues of this worthe capteine the noble man highlie regarding, in an ample teſti- monie thereof and vpon his owne honorable conſi- deration, by a faire ancient deed yet extant at theſe daies did giue him reward of fortie pounds annuite for his life. The monument ſo plainelie declaring the truth of the matter, with the maner and dignitie of the feat, as it was done, hath bene thought verie meet for the ſtorie in hand here now to place it as fol- loweth.

answer to the defiance.

For that by the armes in the scale it may the better be knowne of what stem this noble man sprang (a matter which this storie seemes iustlie to require) vnderstand yee thus were the same. In his shield, a cheuorne charged with a mullet; his crest, a swans head couped betwene two wings displayed all out of a crovne supported by two grethounds; about the shield ingrauen, Signa Eugenii de Stafford militis.
Whereby is gathered that he was a third brother of the duke of Buckingham house. This feat thus well done, the king the same date found a shallow, betwene Corbie and Peron, which neuer was espied before, at which he with his armie and carriages the night insluing, passed the water of Some without let or banger, and therewith determined to make haste towards Calis, and not to seke for battell, except he were thereto constrained, because that his armie by sickness was soze diminished, in so much that he had but onelie two thousand horsemen and thirtene thousand archers, bilmen, and of all sorts of other souldiers.

The Englishmen were brought into some distresse in this toinie, by reason of their vittels in maner spent, and no hope to get more: for the enimies had destroyed all the corne before they came. Next could they none take, for their enimies with alarimes did euer so infect them: daile it rained, and nightlie it fraised: of fuel there was great scarcitie, of flures plentie: monie mough, but waies for their reliefe to bestow it on, had they none. Yet in this great ne-cessitie, the poore people of the countrie were not spolied, nor anie thing taken of them without payment, nor anie outrage or offense done by the Englishmen, except one, which was, that a souldiour took a pitt out of a church, for which he was apprehended, & the king not once remoued till the boy was restored, and the offender strangled. The people of the countries thereabout, hearing of such zeale in him, to the maintenance of iustice, ministered to his armie victuals, and other necessities, although by open proclamation so to doe they were prohibited.

The French king being at Rone, and hearing that king Henrie was passed the river of Some, was much displeased therewith, and assembling his councell to the number of fife and thirtie, asked their advice what was to be done. There was amongst these fife and thirtie, his sonne the Dolphin, calling himselfe king of Sicill; the dukes of Berrie and Wytaine, the earle of Montien the kings yongest sonne, and other high estates. At length thirtie of them agreed, that the Englishmen should not depart but fought withall, and fife were of a contrarie opinion, but the greater number ruled the matter: and so Montien king at armes was sent to the king of England to desire him as the entrie of France, and to tell him that he should shortly haue battell. King Henrie answered: Mine intent is to doe as it pleaseth God, I will not seke your maister at this time; but if he or his seeke me, I will meet with them God willing. If anie of your nation attempt once to stop me in my iourne now towards Calis, at their ieopardie be it; and yet with I not anie of you so vnadvised, as to be the occasion that I die your tawne ground with your red blood.

When he had thus answered the herald, he gaue him a princelie reward, and licence to depart. Upon whose returne, with this answer, it was incontinent-lie on the French side proclaimed, that all men of warre should resort to the constable to fight with the king of England. Whereupon, all men apt for armes and desirous of honour, drey them toward the field.
The Dolphin soze desired to haue bene at the battell, but he was prohibited by his father: likewise Philip earle of Charolois would gladlie haue bene there, if his father the duke of Burgognie would haue suffered him: manie of his men scale aboate, and went to the Frenchmen. The king of England hearing that the Frenchmen approached, and that there was an other river for him to passe with his armie by a bidge, and doubting least if the same bidge should be broken, it would be greatlie to his hindrance, appointed certeine capteins with their bands, to go thither with all speed before him, and to take possession thereof, and so to keepe it, till his comming thirther.

Those that were sent, finding the Frenchmen busie to breake downe their bidge, assailed them so vigorouslie, that they discomfited them, and took and slue them; and so the bidge was preserved till the king came, and passed the river by the same with his whole armie. This was on the two and twentieth day of October. The duke of Poike that led the bound-gard (after the armie was passed the river) mounted up to the height of an hill with his people, and sent out scouts to discover the countrie, the which upon their returne aduertised him, that a great armie of Frenchmen was at hand, approaching towards them.
The duke declared to the king what he had heard, and the king thereupon, without all feare or trouble of mind, caused the battell which he led himselfe to scale, and incontinentlie rode forth to view his ad-uersaries, and that done, returned to his people, and with cheerefull countenance caused them to be put in order of battell, assigning to euerie capteine such roune and place, as he thought conuenient, and so kept them still in that order till night was come, and then determined to seke a place to incampe & lodge his armie in for that night.

There was not one amongst them that knew any certeine place whither to go, in that unknowne countrie: but by chance they happened upon a beaten waie, white in sight; by the which they were brought vnto a little village, where they were refreshed with meat and drinke somewhat more plentifullie than they had bene diuerse daies before. Order was taken by commandement from the king after the armie was first set in battell arraie, that no noise or clamor should be made in the host; so that in marching forth to this village, euerie man kept himselfe quiet: but at their comming into the village, siers were made to giue light on euerie side, as there likewise were in the French host, which was incam-ped not past two hundred and fiftie paces distant from the English. The chiefe leaders of the French host were these: the constable of France, the marshall, the admerall, the lord Ambures maister of the crossbowes, and other of the French nobilitie, which came and pitched downe their standards and banners in the countie of saint Paule, within the territoirie of Agincourt, hauing in their armie (as some write) to the number of threescore thousand horsemen, besides souldiers, wagoners and other.

They were lodged euen in the waie by the which the Englishmen must needs passe towards Calis, and all that night after their comming thither, made great cheare and were verie merie, pleasant, and full of game. The Englishmen also for their parts were of good comfort, and nothing abashed of the matter, and yet they were both hungrie, wearie, soze trauel-led, and bereed with manie cold diseases. Whobett reconciling themselves with God by hostell and chastite, requiring assistance at his hands that is the onelie giuer of victorie, they determined rather to die, than to yield, or flee. The date following was the fife and twentieth of October in the yeare 1415, being then fridaie, and the feast of Crispine and Crispina, a day faire and fortunate to the English, but most sorrowfull and unluckie to the French.

An. Reg. 3.

The order of the French
armie.

In the morning, the French capteins made three battels, in the vaward were eight thousand heales of knights and esquires, foure thousand archers, and fiftene hundred crossbowes which were guided by the lord de la Bzeth, constable of France, hauing with him the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the earles of Cwe and Richmond, the marshall Bouciquant, and the maister of the crossbowes, the lord Dampier admerall of France, and other capteins. The earle of Mandoline with fiftene hundred men of armes were ordered for a wing to that battell. And the other wing was guided by sir Guichard Dolphine, sir Clugnet of Wabant, and sir Lewes Bourdon, with eight hundred men of armes, of elect cholen persons. And to breake the shot of the Englishmen, were appointed sir Guiliam de Sauueuse, with Hector and Philip his brethren, Ferrie de Maille, and Alen de Gaspanes, with other eight hundred of armes.

the battell.

In the middle ward, were assigned as manie persons, or more, as were in the foremost battell, and the charge thereof was committed to the dukes of Bar and Anson, the earles of Peuers, Mandemont, Glamont, Salinges, Grant Prié, & of Ruffie. And in the rereward were all the other men of armes guided by the earles of Parle, Dampmartine, Faconberg, and the lord of Lourreie capteine of Arde, who had with him the men of the frontiers of Bolonois. Thus the Frenchmen being ordered under their standards and banners, made a great shew: for suchie they were esteemed in number six times as manie or more, than was the whole compaignie of the Englishmen, with wagoners, pages and all. They rested themselves, waiting for the bloudie blast of the terrible trumpet, till the houre betwene nine and ten of the clocke of the same daie, during which season, the constable made vnto the capteins and other men of warre a pithie oration, exhorting and incouraging them to do valiantlie, with manie comfortable words and sensible reasons. King Henrie also like a leader, and not as one led; like a soueraigne, and not an inferior, perceiving a plot of ground verie strong & meet for his purpose, which on the backe halfe was fenced with the village, wherein he had lodged the night before, and on both sides defended with hedges and bushes, thought good there to imbatte his host, and so ordered his men in the same place, as he saw occasion, and as stood for his most aduantage.

The order of the English
armie and archers.

First, he sent priuillie two hundred archers into a lowe meadow, which was nere to the bauntgard of his enemies; but separated with a great ditch, commanding them there to keepe themselves close till they had a token to them giuen, to let drue at their aduersaries: beside this, he appointed a balward, of the which he made capteine Edward duke of York, who of an hauntie courage had desired that office, and with him were the lords Beaumont, Willoughbie, and Fanhope, and this battell was all of archers. The middle ward was gouerned by the king himselfe, with his brother the duke of Gloucester, and the earles of Marhall, Drenford, and Suffolke, in the which were all the strong bilmen. The duke of Gloucester uncle to the king led the rereward, which was mixed both with bilmen and archers. The horsemen like wings went on euerie side of the battell.

The order of
armie.

Thus the king hauing ordered his battels, feared not the puissance of his enemies, but yet to provide that they should not with the multitude of horsemen breake the order of his archers, in whome the force of his armie consisted. For in those daies the people had their lims at libertie, with their hosen were then fastened with one point, and their iackes long and easie to shot in; so that they might draw bowes of great strenght, and shot arrowes of a yard long; beside the head he caused stakes bound with iron sharpe at both ends, of the length of five or six foot to be pitched before the archers, and of ech side the footmen like an hedge, to the intent that if the barded horses ran rashlie vpon them, they might shortly be gozed and destroyed. Certaine persons also were appointed to remove the stakes, as by the moueing of the archers occasion and time should require, so that the footmen were hedged about with stakes, and the horsemen stood like a bulwarke betwene them and their enemies, without the stakes. This device of fortifying an armie, was at this time first inuented: but since that time they haue deuised caltraps, harrowes, and other new engins against the force of horsemen; so that if the enemies run rashlie vpon the same, either are their horses wounded with the stakes, or their feet hurt with the other engins, so as thereby the beasts are gozed, or else made vnable to mainteine their course.

uention.

King Henrie, by reason of his small number of people to fill vp his battels, placed his bauntgard so on the right hand of the maine battell, which himselfe led, that the distance betwixt them might scarce be perceiued, and so in like case was the rereward joined on the left hand, that the one might the more readily succore an other in time of need. When he had thus ordered his battels, he left a small compaignie to keepe his campe and cariage, which remained still in the village, and then calling his capteins and soldiers about him, he made to them a right graue oration, mouing them to plaie the men, whereby to obtaine a glorious victorie, as there was hope certeinie they should, the rather if they would but remember the iust cause for which they fought, and whome they should encounter, such saint-barted people as their ancestors had so often overcome. To conclude, manie words of courage he vttered, to stirre them to do manfullie, assuring them that England should neuer be charged with his ransom, nor anie Frenchman triumph over him as a captiue; for either by famous death or glorious victorie would he (by Gods grace) win honour and fame.

Hall.

K. Henries oration to his men.

It is said, that as he heard one of the host utter his wish to another thus: I would to God there were with vs now so manie good soldiers as are at this houre within England! the king answered: I would not wish a man more here than I haue, we are indeed in comparison to the enemies but a few, but if God of his clemencie do fauour vs, and our just cause (as I trust he will) we shall spend well enough. But let no man ascribe victorie to our owne strength and might, but onelie to Gods assistance, to whome I haue no doubt we shall worthilie haue cause to giue thanks therefore. And if so be that for our offenses sakes we shall be deliuered into the hands of our enemies, the lesse number we be, the lesse damage shall the realme of England susteine: but if we should fight in trust of multitude of men, and so get the victorie (our minds being prone to pride) we should thereby peradventure ascribe the victorie not so much to the gift of God, as to our owne puissance, and thereby prouoke his high indignation and displeasure against vs; and if the enemy get the upper hand, then should our realme and countrie suffer more damage and stand in further danger. But be you of good comfort, and shew your selues valiant, God and our iust quarrell shall defend vs, and deliuer these our proud aduersaries with all the multitude of them which you see (or at the least the most of them) into our hands. Whilest the king was yet thus in speech, either armie so maligned the other, being as then in open fight, that euerie man cried; Forward, forward. The dukes of Clarence, Gloucester, and York, were of the and prince.

the same opinion, yet the king staied a while, least anie leoparlie were not forcelene, or anie hazard not prevented. The Frenchmen in the meane while, as though they had bene sure of victorie, made great triumph, for the capitains had determined before, how to diuide the spoile, and the soldiers the night before had plaid the Englishmen at dice. The noble men had deuised a chariot, wherein they might triumphantlie conuie the king captiue to the citie of Paris, crying to their soldiers; Hastie you to the spoile, glorie and honoz; little wotting (God wot) how soone their brags should be blowne awaie.

Hall.

Here we may not forget how the French thus in their iollitie, sent an herald to king Henrie, to inquire what ranfome he would offer. Whereunto he answered, that within two or three houres he hoped it would so happen, that the Frenchmen should be glad to common rather with the Englishmen for their ranfoms, than the English to take thought for their deliuerance, promising for his owne part, that his dead carcasse should rather be a prise to the Frenchmen, than that his liuing bodie should paie anie ranfome. When the messenger was come backe to the French host, the men of warre put on their helmets, and caused their trumpets to blow to the battell. They thought themselves so sure of victorie, that diuerse of the noble men made such hast towards the battell, that they left manie of their seruants and men of warre behind them, and some of them would not once staie for their standards: as amongst other the duke of Zabant, when his standard was not come, caused a banner to be taken from a trumpet and fastened to a speare, the which he commanded to be borne before him in stead of his standard.

But when both these armies comming within danger either of other, set in full order of battell on both sides, they stood still at the first, beholding either others demeanoz, being not distant in sunder past thre bow shots. And when they had on both parts thus staied a good while without doing anie thing, (except that certeine of the French horsemen aduancing forwards, betwixt both the hosts, were by the English archers constrained to retorne backe) aduise was taken amongst the Englishmen, what was best for them to do. Thereupon all things considered, it was determined, that sith the Frenchmen would not come forward, the king with his armie imbatelled (as ye haue hard) should march towards them, and so leauing their trusse and baggage in the billage where they lodged the night before, onelie with their weapons, armour, and stakes prepared for the purpose, as ye haue heard.

The two armies ioine battell.

These made somewhat forward, before whome there went an old knight sir Thomas Erpingham (a man of great experience in the warre) with a warder in his hand; and when he cast vp his warder, all the armie shouted, but that was a signe to the archers in the medow, which therewith shot wholie altogether at the vauward of the Frenchmen, who when they perceived the archers in the medow, and saw they could not come at them for a ditch that was betwixt them, with all hast set vpon the fore ward of king Henrie, but yet they could ioine, the archers in the forefront, and the archers on that side which stood in the medow, so wounded the footmen, galled the horses, and combed the men of armes, that the footmen durst not go forward, the horsemen ran together vpon plumps without order, some ouerthrew such as were next them, and the horses ouerthrew to their masters, and so at the first ioining, the Frenchmen were foulely discomforted, and the Englishmen highly encouraged.

When the French vauward was thus brought to confusion, the English archers cast awaie their bolues, & toke into their hands, ares, malle, swordes, bills, and other hand-weapons, and with the same slue the Frenchmen, untill they came to the middle ward. When approached the king, and so encouraged his people, that hostlie the second battell of the Frenchmen was ouerthrowne, and dispersed, not without great slaughter of men: howbeit, diuerse were released by their barlets, and conueied out of the field. The Englishmen were so busied in fighting, and taking of the prisoners at hand, that they followed not in chase of their enemies, nor would once breake out of their arraie of battell. Yet sundrie of the Frenchmen stronglie withstood the fiercenesse of the English, when they came to handle strokes, so that the fight sometime was doubtfull and perillous. Yet as part of the French horsemen set their course to haue entered vpon the kings battell, with the stakes ouerthrowne, they were either taken or slaine. Thus this battell continued thre long houres.

The king that daie shewed himselfe a valiant knight, albeit almost felled by the duke of Alanson; yet with plaine strength he slue two of the dukes companie, and felled the duke himselfe; whome when he would haue yelbed, the kings garb (contrarie to his mind) slue out of hand. In conclusion, the king minding to make an end of that daies forie, caused his horsemen to fetch a compasse about, and to ioine with him against the rereward of the Frenchmen, in the which was the greatest number of people. When the Frenchmen perceived his intent, they were suddenlie amayed and ran awaie like sheepe, without order or arraie. Which when the king perceived, he encouraged his men, and followed so quicklie vpon the enemies, that they ran hither and thither, casting awaie their armour: manie on their knees desired to haue their liues saued.

In the meane season, while the battell thus continued, and that the Englishmen had taken a great number of prisoners, certeine Frenchmen on horse backe, whereof were capitaine Robinet of Bornenill, Rikmart of Clamas, Flambert of Agincourt, and other men of armes, to the number of six hundred horsemen, which were the first that fled, bearing that the English tents & pavillions were a good waie distant from the armie, without anie sufficient gard to defend the same, either vpon a conetous meaning to gaine by the spoile, or vpon a desire to be reuenged, entred vpon the kings campe, and there spoiled the hails, robbed the tents, brake vp chests, and carried awaie caskets, and slue such seruants as they found to make anie resistance, for which treason and harkardie in thus leauing their campe at the verie point of fight, for winning of spoile where none to defend it, verie manie were after committed to prison, and had lost their liues, if the Dolphin had longer liued.

But when the outcrie of the lackies and boies, which ran awaie for feare of the Frenchmen thus spoiling the campe, came to the kings eares, he doubting least his enemies should gather together againe, and begin a new field; and mistrusting further that the prisoners would be an aid to his enemies, or the verie enemies to their takers in deed if they were suffered to liue, contrarie to his accustomed gentleness, commanded by sound of trumpet, that enerie man (vpon paine of death) should incontinentlie slae his prisoner. When this dolorous decree, and pitifull proclamation was pronounced, pitie it was to see how some Frenchmen were suddenlie stricken with daggers, some were brained with pollaxes, some slaine with malle, other had their throats cut, and some the bellies panned, so that in effect, hauing respect to the great number, few prisoners were saued.

Englishmen disposed themselves in order of battell, ready to abide a new field, and also to invade, and noblie set on their enemies, with great force they assailed the carles of Harle and Fauconbridge, and the lords of Louraie, and of Rhine, with six hundred men of armes, who had all that daie kept together, but now slaine and beaten downe out of hand. ¶ Some write, that the king perceining his enemies in one part to assemble together, as though they meant to giue a new battell for preservation of the prisoners, sent to them an herald, commanding them either to depart out of his sight, or else to come forward at once, and giue battell: promising herewith, that if they did offer to fight againe, not onlie those prisoners which his people already had taken; but also so manie of them as in this new conflict, which they thus attempted should fall into his hands, should die the death without redemption.

The Frenchmen fearing the sentence of so terrible a decree, without further delay parted out of the field. And so about foure of the clocke in the after none, the king when he saw no appearance of enemies, caused the retreat to be blowne; and gathering his armie together, gave thanks to almighty God for so happie a victorie, causing his prelates and chaplains to sing this psalme: In exitu Israel de Aegypto, and commanded euerie man to kneele downe on the ground at this verse: Non nobis Domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo da gloriam. Which done, he caused Te Deum, with certaine anthems to be song, giuing laud and praise to God, without boasting of his owne force or any humane power. What might he and his people toke rest, and refreshed themselves with such victuals as they found in the French campe, but lodged in the same village where he laie the night before.

In the morning, Montioie king at armes and foure other french heralds came to the k. to know the number of prisoners, and to desire buriall for the dead. Before he made them answer (to vnderstand what they would saie) he demanded of them whie they made to him that request, considering that he knew not whether the victorie was his or theirs. When Montioie by true and iust confession had cleared that doubt to the high praise of the king, he desired of Montioie to vnderstand the name of the castell nere adjoining: when they had told him that it was called Agincourt, he said, When shall this conflict be called the battell of Agincourt. He feasted the french officers of armes that daie, and granted them their request, which bulle fought through the field for such as were slaine. But the Englishmen suffered them not to go alone, for they feared with them, & found manie hurt but not in icopardie of their liues, whom they toke prisoners, and brought them to their tents. When the king of England had well refreshed himselfe, and his souldiers, that had taken the spoile of such as were slaine, he with his prisoners in good order returned to his towne of Calis.

When tidings of this great victorie, was blowne into England, solemne processions and other praises to almighty God with bounc-fires and toisfull triumphes, were ordeined in euerie towne, citie, and burrow, and the maior & citizens of London went the morow after the daie of saint Simon and Jude from the church of saint Paule to the church of saint Peter at Westminister in deuout manner, rendering to God hartie thanks for such fortunate lucke sent to the king and his armie. The same fundaie that the king removed from the campe at Agincourt towards Calis, diuerse frenchmen came to the field to view againe the dead bodies; and the peasants of the countie spoiled the carcases of all such apparell and other things as the Englishmen had left: who toke nothing but gold and siluer, iewels, rich apparell and coslie armour. But the plowmen and peasants left nothing behind, neither shirt nor clout: so that the bodies laie stark naked untill wednesdaie. On the which daie diuerse of the noble men were conueied into their countries, and the remnant were by Philip earle Charolois (sore lamenting the chance, and moued with pittie) at his costs & charges buried in a square plot of ground of sixtene hundred yards; in the which he caused to be made thre pits, wherein were buried by account fixe thousand and eight hundred persons, beside them that were caried awaie by their friends and seruants, and others, which being wounded died in hospitals and other places.

After this their dolorous iournie & pittifull slaughter, diuerse clearks of Paris made manie a lamentable verse, complaining that the king reigned by will, and that counsellors were parciall, affirming that the noble men fled against nature, and that the commons were destroyed by their prodigallitie, declaring also that the cleargie were dumbe, and durst not saie the truth, and that the humble commons durie obeyed, & yet euer suffered punishment, for which cause by diuine persecution the lesse number vanquished the greater: wherefore they concluded, that all things went out of order, and yet was there no man that studied to bring the vnrulie to frame. It was no maruell though this battell was lamentable to the French nation, for in it were taken and slaine the flower of all the nobilitie of France.

There were taken prisoners, Charles duke of Orleans neptue to the French king, John duke of Burbon, the lord Bouciquault one of the marshals of France (he after died in England) with a number of other lords, knights, and esquires, at the least sixtene hundred, besides the common people. There were slaine in all of the french part to the number of ten thousand men, whereof were princes and noble men bearing banners one hundred twentie and six; to these, of knights, esquires, and gentlemen, so manie as made by the number of eight thousand and foure hundred (of the which fixe hundred were dubbed knights the night before the battell) so as of the meaner sort, not past sixtene hundred. Amongst those of the nobilitie that were slaine, these were the chiefe, Charles lord de la Broch high constable of France, Jaques of Chatillon lord of Dampier admerall of France, the lord Rambures master of the crossebowes, sir Guilhard Dolphin great master of France, John duke of Alanson, Anthonie duke of Brabant brother to the duke of Burgognie, Edward duke of Bar, the earle of Ffleurs an other brother to the duke of Burgognie, with the erles of Harle, Claude mont, Bearmont, Grandpre, Roussie, Fauconberge, Foies and Lestrake, beside a great number of lords and barons of name.

Of Englishmen, there died at this battell, Edward duke Yorke, the earle of Suffolke, sir Richard Biskelie, and Dauid Samme esquier, and of all other not about fixe and twentie persons, as some doe report; but other writers of greater credit affirme, that there were slaine about fixe or six hundred persons. Titus Lilius saith, that there were slaine of Englishmen, beside the duke of Yorke, and the earle of Suffolke, an hundred persons at the first incounter. The duke of Gloucester the kings brother was sore wounded about the hips, and boane downe to the ground, so that he fell backwards, with his feet towards his enemies, whom the king bestrid, and like a brother valiantlie rescued from his enemies, & so sauing his life, caused him to be conueied out of the sight, into a place of more safetie. ¶ The which order of this conflict which cost manie a mans life, and procured great bloodshed before it was ended, is liuelie described in Anglorum praefig; where also, besides the manner of disposing

After that the king of England had refreshed himselfe, and his people at Calis, and that such prisoners as he had left at Harflue (as ye have heard) were come to Calis unto him, the first daie of November, he with all his prisoners toke shipping, and the same daie landed at Douer, having with him the dead bodies of the duke of Poike, and the earle of Suffolke, and caused the duke to be buried at his colledge of Fodinghey, and the earle at new Elme. In this passage, the seas were so rough and troublous, that two ships belonging to Sir John Cornetwall, lord Fanhope, were driven into Zeland; howbeit, nothing was lost, nor any person perished. The maior of London, and the aldermen, apparelled in orient grained scarlet, and foure hundred commoners clad in beautiful murrie, well mounted, and trimlie hoisted, with rich collars, & great chaines, met the king on Blackheath, rejoicing at his returne: and the clergie of London, with rich crosses, sumptuous copes, and massie censers, received him at Saint Thomas of Waterings with solemne procession.

Titus Livius.

The king like a grave and sober personage, and as one rememb'ring from whom all victories are sent, seemed little to regard such baive pompe and shewes as were in triumphant sort devised for his welcomming home from so prosperous a journie, in so much that he would not suffer his helmet to be caried with him, whereby might have appeared to the people the blowes and dints that were to be seene in the same; neither would he suffer any ditties to be made and sung by minstrels of his glorious victorie, for that he would wholie have the praise and thanks altogether given to God. The news of this bloudie battell being reported to the French king as then sojourning at Rone, filled the court full of sorrow. But to remedie such danger as was like to insue, it was decreed by counsell, to ordaine new officers in places of them that were slaine: and first, he elected his chiefe officer for the wars, called the constable, the earle of Arminacke, a wise and politike capteine, and an ancient enimie to the Englishmen, Sir John de Cozie was made maister of the crosse-bowes. Shortlie after, either for melancholie that he had for the losse at Agincourt, or by some sudden disease Lelues Dolphin of Viennois, hitherto apparant to the French king, departed this life without issue, which happened well for Robinet of Bourneuill, and his fellowes, as ye have heard before, for his death was their life, & his life would have bene their death.

Part of those that spoiled the English campe.

After the French king had created new officers, in hope to relieue the state of his realme and countrie, soe shaken by the late great overthrow, it chanced, that Thomas duke of Excester capteine of Harflue, accompanied with three thousand Englishmen, made a great roade into Normandie, almost to the citie of Rone, in which journie he got great abundance both of riches and prisoners: but in his returne, the earle of Arminacke newlie made constable of France, intending in his first enterprize to win the spurs, having with him about five thousand horsemen, incountred with the duke. The fight was handled on both parts verie hotlie, but because the Englishmen were not able to resist the force of the Frenchmen, the duke was constrained to retire with losse at the least of three hundred of his footmen.

Howbeit being withdraben into an orchard, which was strongly fenced and hedged about with thornes, the Frenchmen were not able to enter upon the Englishmen; but yet they toke from them all their horses and spoile, & assaulted them till it was night, and then retired backe to the towne, not far distant from the place where they fought, called Callemont: this was upon the 14 day of March. In the morning upon the breake of the daie, the Englishmen issued forth of the orchard, where they had kept themselves all the night, & drew towards Harflue, wherof the Frenchmen being aduertised, followed them, & overtoke them upon the sands nere to Chiese de Caur, & there set on them: but in the end, the Frenchmen were discomfited, and a great number of them slaine by the Englishmen, which afterwards returned without more adoe unto Harflue. The French writers blame the constable for this losse, because he kept on the high ground with a number of men of war, and would not come downe to aid his fellows.

In this fourth yeare of king Henries reigne, the emperor Sigmund, cosine germane to king Henrie, came into England, to the intent that he might make an attonement betwene king Henrie and the French king: with whom he had bene before, bringing with him the archbishop of Remes, as ambassador for the French king. At Calis he was honorably received by the earle of Marlike lord deputie there, and diuerse other lords sent thither of purpose to attend him. Whereouer, the king sent thither thirtie great ships to bring him and his traine oner. At Douer the duke of Gloucester, and diuerse other lords were ready to receive him, who at his approaching to land, entered the water with their swords in their hands drawn; and by the mouth of the said duke declared to him, that if he intended to enter the land as the kings friend, and as a mediator to intreat for peace, he should be suffered to arrive: but if he would enter as an emperor into a land claimed to be under his empire, then were they ready to resist him. This was thought necessarie to be done for saving of the kings prerogative, who hath full preheminnence within his owne realme, as an absolute emperor.

When the emperor hereupon answered that he was come as the kings friend, and as a mediator for peace, and not with any imperiall authoritie, he was of the duke and other his associates received with all such honor as might be devised. The king with all his nobilitie received him on Blackheath, the seventh day of Maie, and brought him through London to Westminster with great triumph. Shortlie after there came also into England Albert duke of Holand, who was likewise friendly interteined. Both these princes, the emperor and the duke of Holland were conueied to Windsoze to Saint Georges feast, and elected companions of the noble order of the garter, and had the collar and habit of the same to them deliuered, and sat in their skals all the solemnitie of the feast. Shortlie after that the feast was finished, the duke of Holland returned into his countrie; but the emperor tarried still, and assayed all manner of meanes to perswade the king to a peace with the Frenchmen.

But their euill hap, as they that were appointed by Gods providence to suffer more damage at the Englishmens hands, would not permit his persuasions to take place: for whereas peace was euen almost entering in at the gates, the king was suddenly stricken red to displeasure upon a new occasion, for he being advised of the loss of his men at the late conflict in the territory of Rone (as ye have heard) refused to have this word peace once named. The emperor like a wise prince passed over that time till another season, that some favourable aspect of the planets should serve to further his purpose. And when he thought the same was come, he trooped againe the bessell of concord and amitie, which he put in so faire a cup, and presented it with such effectuous words, that scarce the king had tasted it, if word had not been brought about the same time, that Harling was besieged of the French both by water and land, as it was in deed: for the constable of France encouraged by his last conflict (though the same was not much to his praise) assembled an armie, and upon a sudden laid siege to the towne. At the same instant John vi-count of Harbon the vice-admirall of France, brought the whole navie to the riuage and thore adjoining to the towne, in purpose to haue entered by the waterside; but the duke of Excester defeated his intent, and defended the towne verie manfully.

King Henrie advertised hereof, meant at the first to haue gone with his navie in person to the succors of his men; but the emperor dissuaded him from that purpose, advising him rather to send some one of his captains. The king following his loving and reasonable advertisement, appointed his brother the duke of Bedford accompanied with the earles of March, Arundell, Huntingdon, Warwicke, Arundell, Salisbury, Devonshire, and diuerse barons, with two hundred saile to passe into Normandie, for rescue of the towne of Harling, which being great diligence shipped at Aie, and after some hinderance by contrarie winds, at length came to the mouth of the riuier of Seine on the daie of the Assumption of our ladie. When the vicount of Harbon perceived the English navie to approach, he courageously set forward, and gat the possession of the mouth of the ha-rour. The duke of Bedford seeing his enemies thus fiercely to come forward, set before certaine strong ships, which at the first encounter banquished and take two French ships, the captains whereof were to rash and forward.

The duke followed with all his puissance, and set on his enemies. The fight was long, but not so long as perilous, nor so perilous as terrible (for battels on the sea are desperate) till at length the victorie fell on the Englishmen, so that almost all the whole navie of France, in the which were manie ships, hulkes, carikes, and other small vessels, to the number of five was sunke & taken. Amongst other vessels that were taken, the great carike of Genoa, a citie in Italie, were sent into England. In the same conflict were slaine of the Frenchmen no small number, as appeared by the dead bodies, which were scene euerie daie swimming about the English ships. After this, the duke of Bedford sailed by to Harling, & refreshed the towne both with vittels and monie; notwithstanding certeine other French galleies did what they could to haue letted that enterprise. When the erle of Arminacke heard that the puissant name of France was banquished, he raised his siege & returned to Paris.

After this discomfort and losse, the puissance of the Frenchmen began to decaye, for now the princes and nobles of the realme fell into diuision and discord among themselves, studying how to reuenge their old priuat injuries, & refused to take paine for succour of the publike weale and safegard of their countrie: whereupon their power began to warrener, their state brought into imminent danger of perpetuall bondage; which thing no doubt had fallen upon them if king Henrie had longer liued. For as upon one inconuenience suffered, manie do follow, so was it in France at that time: for the king was not of sound memorie, the warre that was toward both doubtfull and perillous: the princes vntristie and at discord: with a hundred things more (which might bring a realme to ruine) out of frame and order in France in those daies. After that the duke of Bedford was returned backe againe into England with great triumph and glorie, he was not so much thankd of the king his brother, as praised of the emperor Sigismund, being to him a stranger, which said openlie, that happie are those subjects which haue such a king, but more happy is the king that hath such subjects.

When the emperor perceived that it was in vaine to moue further for peace, he left off that treatie, and entered himselfe into a league with king Henrie, the contents of which league consisted chiefly in these articles, that both the said emperor and king, their heires, and successors, should be friends ech to other, as allies and confederats against all manner of persons, of what estate or degree so euer they were (the church of Rome, and the pope for that time being on-lie excepted) and that neither they, nor their heires, nor successors should be present in counsell or other place, where either of them, or his heires or successors might susteine damage, in lands, goods, honours, states, or persons: and that if anie of them should understand of losse or hinderance to be like to fall or happen to the others, they should impeach the same, or if that late not in their powers, they should advertise the others thereof with all conuenient speed: and that either of them, and their heires and successors should aduance the others honours and commoditie without fraud or deceit. Moreover, that neither of them, nor their heires and successors should permit their subjects to leaue warres against the others; and that it should be lawfull and free for ech of their subjects, to passe into the others countrie, and there to remaine and make merchandise, either by sea or land, paying the customes, gabels, and duties due and accustomed, according to the lawes and ordinances of the places and countries where they chanced to traffike.

Furthermore, that neither of the said princes, nor their heires nor successors should receiue any rebell, banished man, or traitor of the others wittinglie; but should cause euerie such person to avoid out of their countries, realmes, dominions, and iurisdic-tions. Again, that neither of the said princes, their heires, nor successors should begin any wars against any other person, other than such as they had warres with at that present, without consent of the other his confederate, except in defense of themselves, their countries and subjects, in case of inuasion made by on them. Also, that it should be lawfull for the king of England, to prosecute his warres against the Frenchmen for recouerie of his right, as should seeme to him expedient; and likewise to the emperor, for recouerie of any part of his right in France, so that neither of them did preiudice the others right in that behalfe. Lastlie, that either of them should assist other, in recouerie & conquest of their rights, lands, and dominions, occupied, with-holden, and kept from them, by him that called himselfe king of France, and other the princes and barons of France. This aliance, with other conditions, agreements, and articles, was concluded & established on the nineteenth daie of October, in the yeare of our Lord 2416. This done, the emperor returned homewards, to passe into Germanie; and the king partlie to shew him honour, and partlie because of his owne affaires, associated him to his towne of Calis.

During the time of their abode there, the duke of Burgonie offered to come to Calis, to speake with the emperor; and the king, because he had knowledge of the league that was concluded betwixt them: the king sent his brother the duke of Gloucester, and the earle of March to the water of Graueling, to be hostages for the duke of Burgognie: and also the earle of Warwick, with a noble company to conduct him to his presence. At Graueling found the dukes met; and after salutations done, the duke of Burgognie was conducted to Calis, where of the emperor and the king he was highlie welcomed and feasted. Here to be noted, that in June last, the king of England had sent the earle of Warwick, and other, unto the duke of Burgognie, as then remaining at Calis; where by the diligent trauell of those English ambassadors, a truce was concluded betwixt the king of England and the duke of Burgognie, touching onlie the countie of Flanders and Artheis; to inuere from the feast of saint John Baptist in that present yeare 1416, unto the feast of saint Michael, in the yeare next ensuing. Which truce at the dukes being now at Calis (when no further agreement could be concluded) was prolonged unto the feast of saint Michael, that should be in the yeare 1419. The duke of Gloucester was received at Graueling, by the earle Charolois, and by him honorable conducted to saint Omers, and there lodged that night.

The next day, the earle Charolois came with diverse noble men, to visit the duke of Gloucester in his lodging, and when he entered into the chamber, the dukes backe was towards him, talking with some one of his servants, and did not see nor welcome the earle at his first entrie; but after he said to him hostile without any great reverence, or comming towards him; You be welcome faire cousin, and so passed forth his tale with his servants. The earle Charolois for all his youth, was not well content therewith, but yet suffered for that time. When the duke of Burgognie had done all his business at Calis, after the ninth daie he returned to Graueling, where the duke of Gloucester and he met againe; and lovinglie departed, the one to Calis, and the other to saint Omers; for the which sojage the duke of Burgognie was suspected to be enemie to the crowne of France. After the dukes departing from Calis, the emperor was highlie feasted and rewarded; and at his pleasure sailed into Holland, & so rode towards Beame. The king likewise took ship, and returned into England on saint Lukes euen.

About the same time, the king sent new ambassadors unto the generall counsell, which still continued at Constance, whither the emperor Sigismund also returned, chiefelie for chafing awaie of that pestilent smoke of schisme then blasted up betwene John the third and twentieth, Gregorie the twelfth, and Benet the thirteenth (as they intituled themselves) the three peruerse prelates, that all at once with such eager malice stroue together for the sacred see of papasie Gods vicarage (that was) who to be highest here in earth. The infectious smother of this venomous vapour by the spirit of these holie men thus raised by thorough faction and parts taking, had bene readie to choke all christendome, had not by the wisdom and authoritie of the princes there, the same the sooner bene vented away. Here by the consent also of all nations it was ordeined in this counsell, that this realme should haue the name of the English nation, and be called and reputed for one of the five principall nations of the counsell, which to grant before that time, through enuie, other nations had utterly refused.

The thirtieth of October, the parlement that had bene broken up, by reason of the emperours coming, began againe at Westminster, and there the king made to them a short and pitche oration, declaring the injuries lately done and committed by the French nation, the wrong also the just and lawfull demand of his lordes & knights; furthermore, the great shold this shall be done which requires amongst the nobilitie of France, to be hearing these things, for the which it were necessarie to follow the warres now at hand against those parts that without delay they should be sent to the duke of Burgognie and to the king, that nothing should be wanting when they are sent: his request herein was granted; for the which was willing and glad to further that sojage, so that the king went into Burgognie, and the late duke of Burgognie, in his parliament at Calis, the king made governance of the king of France, to hold and create the emperor king as the king was decreed in the French parliament, and this parliament, the king gave the duke of Gloucester a thousand pounds by peace, to be paid out of his stone coffer; besides for the peace, which he was to receive of the duke of Gloucester, of the kings revenues there; and had the same grant confirmed by authority of the parlement; in which that same time, that in this parliament he was made duke of Gloucester, and not before.

The king kept his Christmas at Killingworth, and the next day after Christmas daie were certie writings cast abroad, in great mens houses, and almost in every one within the townes of St. Albons, Poynthampton, and Reading, containing sharpe reproches against all estates of the church, and it could not be knowne from whence those writings came, nor who was the author of them. The king berie earnestlie prosecuted all things to be made ready for the warre, meaning to passe the next summer over into France, to recover his right by force; which by no other meane he saw how to obtaine. In this meane while had the Frenchmen hired a great number of Genowaises and Italians, with certie riches and gallees well appointed, the which being joined with the French fleet, laid at the mouth of the river of Belne; and by with the same river, both to stop all succour by sea that should come to them within that time, and also to wast abroad, and do what damage they could unto the English, as occasion served.

The king therefore per he passed over himselfe, sent the earle of Huntingdon to search and see the seas. This little earle, called John Holland (sonne to the earle of Huntingdon; other wise called duke of Gloucester, beheaded at Calis, in the time of king Henric the fourth, and comline to the king) with a great naue of ships, searched the sea; from the one coast to the other, and in conclusion encountered with nine of those great cariekes of Genes (the which the lord Jaques the baron of Warbon had retained to serve the French king) and set on them sharplie. The conflict was great, and the fight long (continuing the more part of a summers daie) but in conclusion, the Frenchmen and Italians were overcome and dead. Three of the greatest cariekes with their patrons; and monsieur Jaques de Warbon their admiral were taken; with as much more as should have paid the soldiers of the whole fleet; gave a peace, and the other cariekes were botaged.

The earle returning backe with this good lucke, found the king at Hampton who received him with thankes; as he had well deserved. Shortly after, upon the thirteenth of July, the king took his ship at Portsmouth, accompanied with the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the earls of Huntingdon, Warshall, Warwick, Devonshire, Salisburie, Suffolke, and Shiltmerfel; the lords Rolle, Willoughbie, Fyfe, Hugh, Clinton, Serape, Watreners, Burghier, Ferrers of Grobie, and Ferrers of Chartre, Fanshope, Wate of Codmore, Sir Gilbert Amfresle, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and diverse other; and so having wind and weaſther to his deſire, the firſt daie of Auguſt he landed in Normandie, nere to a caſtell called Touque, where he conſulted with his capitaine, what waie was beſt for him to take concerning his high enterpriſe.

The number of the arme of the king of France
110000.

His armie contained the number of ſixtēe thouſand and foure hundred ſoldiers and men of warre of his owne purueſſance, beſide others. The duke of Clarence had in his retinue a hundred lances, and three hundred archers: and beſide him, there were three earles, which had two hundred and forty lances, and ſeauenteene hundred and twenty archers. The duke of Gloceſter foure hundred and ſeauentie lances, and ſouretēe hundred and ten archers. The earles of March, Warwicke, and Salisburie, each of them one hundred lances, and three hundred archers a peece. The earle of Huntingdon forty lances, and ſix ſcore archers. The earle of Suffolke thirty lances, and foureſcore and ten archers. Beſide theſe, there were thirtēe lords, as Aburgauennie, Gattreuer, Fitz Hugh, Clifford, Graie, Willoughbie, Calbot, Courtenie, Burchier, Roos, Louch, Ferrers of Chartie, and Harington, the which had in their retinue the number of ſixe hundred and ſix lances, and ſixtēe hundred and foureſcore archers. Alſo, there were in this armie threſcore and ſeauenteene knights, which had under them nine hundred and forty ſixe lances, and two thouſand eight hundred and ſittie two archers; ſo that in all, there were ſixe and twenty thouſand, ſixe hundred, and eight and twenty fighting men: of which number euerie fourth man was a lance. Beſide the ſoldiers and men of warre, there were a thouſand maſons, carpenters, and other labourers.

The Normans

The Normans hearing of the kings arriuall, were ſuddenly ſtricken with ſuch feare, that they fled out of their houſes, leauing the towne and villages, and with their wiues and children, bag and baggage, got them into the walled towne, preparing there to defend themſelues, & with all ſpeed ſent to the French king, requiring him to prouide for the deſenſe and preſeruation of his loving ſubiects. Whereupon, the men of war were appointed to reſort into the ſtrong towne, to lie within the ſame in gariſons, to reſiſt the power of the Engliſhmen, ſo that all the walled towne and caſtels in Normandie were furniſhed with men, munition, and vittells. The king of England, when he had reſolued with his counſell for his proceeding in his enterpriſes, laid ſiege vnto the caſtell of Touque. The duke of Gloceſter that led the ſore ward, had the charge of that ſiege, the which by force of aſſaults, and other warlike meanes, brought to that point, that they within yielded the place into his hands, the ninth daie of Auguſt. The earle of Salisburie, who led the battell, took the caſtell of Ambergilliers, the which was giuen to him by the king, and ſo this earle was the firſt that had anie territorie giuen him of the king in this new conqueſt. The king made at the winning of Touque eight and twenty knights, and left ſir Robert Kirkellie capitaine there.

After this, on deliberate aduiſe taken how to proceed, he ſet forth toward the towne of Caen in moſt warlike order, waſting the countrie on euerie ſide as he paſſed. Which towne ſtandeth in a plaine fertile countrie, no ſtronger walled, than deepe ditched, and as then well vittelled and replenished with people: for the citizens fearing the kings coming, had there prouided all things neceſſarie and defendible. But his maielte doubting leaſt the Frenchmen, vpon their underſtanding of his approach to the towne, would haue burned the ſuburbs and buildings without the walles, ſent the duke of Clarence with a thouſand men before him, to preuent that miſchæſe. The duke coming thither, found the ſuburbs already ſet on fire, but vſed ſuch diligence to quench the ſame, that the moſt part was ſaued. He alſo won the abbey church of ſaint Stephen, which the Frenchmen were in hand to haue ouerthrowne, by undermining the pillars; but the duke obtaining the place, filled vp the mines, and ſo preſerued the church. He alſo won a cell of nunnies, verie ſtronglie fenced, after the manner of warre.

Then came the king before the towne, who cauſed ſouthwith to be caſt a deepe trench, with an high mount, to keepe them within from iſſuing forth, and that done, began fiercelie to aſſault the towne: but they within ſtood manfullie to their deſenſe, ſo that there was ſore and cruell fight betwixt them, and their enimies. But when king Henrie perceived that he loſt more than he won by his daillie aſſaults, he left off anie more to aſſault it, and determined to ouerthrow the wals, with undermining. Wherefore with all diligence, the pioners caſt trenches, made mines, & brought timber; ſo that within a few daies, the wals ſtood onelie vpon poſts, ready to fall, when fire ſhould be put to them. The king meaning now to giue a generall aſſault, cauſed all the capitaine to aſſemble before him in counſell, vnto whome he declared his purpoſe, commanding them not before the next daie to utter it; till by ſound of trumpet they ſhould haue warning to ſet forth toward the wals, leaſt his determination being diſcloſed to the enimies, might cauſe them to prouide the better for their owne deſenſe. He alſo preſcribed vnto them, what order he would haue them to keepe, in giuing the aſſault, and that was this; that euerie capitaine deuiding his band into three ſeueral portions, they might be ready one to ſucceed in an others place, as thoſe which fought ſhould hapilie be diuen backe and repelled.

the aſſault.

In the morning next following, being the fourth of September, ſomewhat before the brake of the daie, he cauſed his people to approach the wals, and to ſhew countenance, as though they would giue a generall aſſault; and whileſt they were buſied in aſſailing and defending on both ſides, the Engliſhmen pearled and brake thorough the wals by diuerſe holes and ouertures made by the pioners, under the foundation: yet the king vpon diuerſe reſpects, offered them within pardon of life, if they would yield themſelues and the towne to his mercie; but they reſuſing that to do, the aſſault was newlie begun, and after ſore fight continued for the ſpace of an houre, the Engliſhmen prevailed, and ſue ſo manie as they found with weapon in hand, ready to reſiſt them.

The duke of Clarence was the firſt that entred with his people, and hauing got the one part of the towne, aſſailed them that kept the bzidge, & by force beating them backe, paſſed the ſame, and ſo came to the wals on the other ſide of the towne, where the fight was ſharpe and fierce betwixt the aſſailants and defendants; but the duke with his people ſetting on the Frenchmen behind, as they ſtood at deſenſe on the wals, eaſilie vanquiſhed them, ſo that the Engliſhmen entred at their pleaſure. Thus when the king was poſſeſſed of the towne, he incontinentlie commanded all armour & weapons of the vanquiſhed, to be brought into one place, which was immediatlie done.

where some for their wilfull stubboynesse were adjudged to die; other were fore fined and ransomed.
Then he calling together his souldiers and men of warre, not onelie gaue them great praisses and high commendations for their manlie doings, but also distributed to euerie man, according to his desert, the spoile and gaine gotten in the towne, chæstie bicause at the assault they had shewed god pzoofe of their manhood and balliant courages.

After that the towne was thus woone, the lord Montaigne, capitaine of the castell, would not yeld, but made semblance, as though he meant to defend the place, to the utterance: but after that he was sharplie called vpon by king Henrie, either to yeld it, or else that he should be assured to haue all mercie and sauour sequestred from him, he toke better ad-uise, and therevpon being in despaire of release, made this composition, that if he were not rescued of the French power by a certeine date, he should render the fortresse into the kings hands, with condition, that he and his souldiers should be suffered to depart with all their goods, the habiliments of warre onelie excepted. Herevpon twelue hostages were delivered to the king, and when the date came, being the twentith of September, they withyn rendred the castell into the kings hands; and thus, both the towne and castell of Caen became English.

Whilste the king was thus occupied about his warres in Normandie, the Scots in great number, entring England, wasted the countrie with fire and sword whersoener they came. The English lords that were left in trust with the keeping of those parties of the realme, raised the whole power of the countries, so that there came together the number of an hundred thousand men vpon Walw more, where the generall assemblie was made, and as it chanced, the duke of Excester, uncle to the king, who had latelie before mustered a certeine number of men to conueie them ouer to the king as a new supplie to his armie there, was the same time in the north parts on pilgrimage at Wadlington; and hearing of this inuasion made by the Scots, toke vpon him to be general of the armie prepared against them, and to giue them battell. Also, the archbishop of Yorke, although he was not able to sit on horsebacke by reason of his great age, caused himselfe to be carried forth in a charet in that iourne, the better to incourage other. But the Scots hearing that the Englishmen approached toward them with such a puissance, withdrew backe into their countrie, and durst not abide the bickering; either because they mistrusted an infortunat euent on their side, by reason of the English pzoofesse; or else for that they had learned by others ouerthrowes to auoid the like, wherein standeth a profitable point of wisdome, as the poet berie sententionlie saith,

Felicitas sapit qui in alieno periculo sapit.

The same time, the lord Cobham, sir John Oldca-stell, whilste he shifted from place to place to escape the hands of them, who he knew would be glad to laie hold on him, had conueied himselfe in secret wise into an husbandmans house, not farre from S.
Albons, within the precinct of a lordship belonging to the abbat of that towne. The abbats seruants getting knowledge hereof, came thither by night, but they missed their purpose, for he was gone; but they caught diuerse of his men, whome they carried streit to prison. The lord Cobham herewith was fore dismaied, for that some of them that were taken were such as he trusted most, being of counsell in all his deuises. In the same place, were found books written in English, and some of those books in times past had bene trimlie gilt, limned, and beautified with images, the heads whereof had bene scraped off, and in the Letanie they had blotted forth the name of our ladie, and of other saints, till they came to the verse Parce nobis Domine. Diuerse writings were found there also, in derogation of such honour as then was thought due to our ladie. The abbat of saint Albons sent the booke so disfigured with scrapings & blottings out, with other such writings as there were found, vnto the king; who sent the booke againe to the archbishop, to shew the same in his sermons at Pauls crosse in London, to the end that the citizens and other people of the realme might vnderstand the purposes of those that then were called Lollards, to bzing them further in discredit with the people.

In this meane time that the king of England was occupied about Caen, the Frenchmen had neither anie sufficient power to resist him, nor were able to assemble an host together in their necessitie, by reason of the dissention among themselves: for their king was so simple, that he was spoiled both of treasure and kingdome, so that euerie man spent and wasted he cared not what. Charles the Dolphin being of the age of sixteen or seauenteene yeares, betwaled the ruine and decaie of his countrie, he onlie studied the release of the common-wealth, and deuised how to resist his enemies; but hauing neither men nor mo-nie, was greatlie troubled and disquieted in mind.
In conclusion, by the aduise and counsell of the earle of Arminacke the constable of France, he found a meane to get all the treasure & riches which his mother queene Isabell had gotten and hoarded in diuerse secret places: and for the common defense and profit of his countrie he wiselie bestowed it in buying souldiers, and preparing of things necessarie for the warre.

The queene forgetting the great perill that the realme then stood in, remembzing onelie the displeasure to hir by this act done, vpon a womanish malice, set hir husband John duke of Bur-gognie in the highest authoritie about the king, giuing him the regiment and direction of the king and his realme, with all pzeheminentie & souereignitie. The duke of Burgognie hauing the sword in his hand, in reuenge of old iniuries, began to make warre on the Dolphin, determining, that when he had tamed this young un-bribeled gentleman, then would he go about to withstand, and beat backe the common enemies of the realme. The like reason moued the Dolphin, for he minded first to repelle the assaults of ciuill discord, before he would set vpon foreine enemies, and therefore prepared to subdue and destroie the duke of Burgognie, as the cheefe head of that mischæse, whereby the realme was vniquieted, decaied, and in manner brought to utter ruine. Thus was France afflicted, and in euerie part troubled with warre and dission, and no man to pzooude remedie, nor once put forth his finger for helpe or succour.

King Henrie in the meane time following blissie and his god successe, sent the duke of Clarence to the sea coast, where (with great difficultie) he got the towne of Basseur, whereof the lord Spatreuers was appointed capitaine. The duke of Gloucester also finding small resistance, toke the citie of Liscour, of which citie sir John Birkleie was ordeined capitaine.
King Henrie himselfe taried still at Caen, fortifying the towne and castell, and put out fiftene hundred women and impotent persons, replenishing the towne with English people. Where while the king sojourned, he kept a solempne feast, and made manie knights; beside that, he shewed there an example of great pittie and clemencie: for in fear-ching the castell, he found innumerable substance of plate and monie belonging to the citizens, whereof he would not suffer one penie to be touched, but restored the same to the owners; deliucting to euerie man that which was his owne.

When the same of his mercifull dealing herein, of his bountie to captiues, and of his fauourable be-sing of those that submitted themselves to his grace, was spread abroad, all the capitaine of the towne adjoining, came willingly to his presence, offering to him themselves, their townes, and their goods, wherupon he made proclamation, that all men, which had, or would become his subiects, and sweare to him allegiance, should enjoy their goods, and liberties, in as large or more ample manner, than they did before: which gentle interteining of the stubborne Por-mans, was the verie cause, why they were not onlie content, but also glad to remoue and turne from the French part, and become subiects to the crowne of England.

When the king had set Caen in good order, he left there for capitaine, the one of the towne, the other of the castle, sir Gilbert Amfrevill earle of Baine or Angus, & sir Gilbert Talbot, and made bailiffe there sir John Popham, and so departed from Caen the first of October, and comming to the castle of Coursie, within three daies had it rendered to him. From thence, the fourth of October, he came unto Argenton: they within that towne and castle offered, that if no rescue came by a daie limited, they would deli-uer both the towne and castle into the kings hands, so that such as would abide and become the kings faithfull subiects should be received, the other to depart with their goods and lues saved whither they would: the king accepted their offer. When the daie limited came, and no succours appeared, they yielded according to the covenants, and the king performed all that on his behalfe was promised. The lord Grate of Cobnor was appointed capitaine there. After this, he returned daile to the king, of the Por-mans, people of all sorts and degrees, to sweare to him fealtie and homage. The citie of Sees which was well inhabited, and wherein were two abbeyes of great strength, one of them yielded to the king, and so likewise did diuerse other townes in those parties, without stroke stricken.

The towne of Alanson above a siege for the space of eight daies, they within defending it right bali-antlie at the first; but in the end, considering with themselves, what small hope there was for any succours to come to remoue the siege, they grew to a composition, that if within a certaine daie they were not relieved, they should yield both the towne and castle into the kings hands, which was done: for no succours could be heard of. The king appointed captaine of this towne, the duke of Gloucester, and his lieutenant sir Ralph Lenthall. The duke of Britaine under safe conduct came to the king, as he was thus busie in the conquest of Normandie, and after sundrie points treated of betwixt them, a truce was taken, to indure from the seventh daie of November, unto the last of September, in the yeare next following, betwixt them, their souldiers, men of warre, and subiects. The like truce was granted unto the quene of Ierusalem and Sicill, & to hir sonne Lewis, for the duchie of Anjou, and the countie of Maine, the duke of Britaine being their deputie for concluding of the same truce.

About the same time also, at the suite of Charles the Dolphin, a treatie was in hand at Conque, for a small peace, but it came to none effect. From Alanson the king set forward towards the towne and castle of Falais, meaning to besiege the same, where the Frenchmen appointed to the keeping of it, had fortified the towne by all meanes possible, and prepared themselves to defende it to the vttermost. The earle of Montreuil was first sent thither before with certaine bands of souldiers to inclose the enemies within the towne, & to view the strength thereof. After him came the king with his whole armie, about the first of December, and then was the towne besieged on each side. The king lodged before the gate that leadeth to Caen, the duke of Clarence before the castle that standeth on a rocke, and the duke of Gloucester late on the kings right hand, and other lords & noble men were assigned to their places as was thought expedient. And to be sure from taking damage by any sudden inuasion of the enemies, there were great trenches and rampiers cast and made about their severall campe, for defense of the same.

The Frenchmen notwithstanding this siege, bali-antlie defended their wals, and sometimes made issues forth, but small to their gaine: and still the Englishmen with their guns and great ordinance made batterie to the wals and bulwarks. The winter season was verie cold, with sharpe frosts, & hard weather; but the Englishmen made such shift for provision of all things necessarie to serue their turns, that they were sufficientlie prouided, both against hunger and cold: so that in the end, the Frenchmen perceiving they could not long indure against them, offered to talke, and agreed to giue over the towne, if no rescue came by a certaine daie appointed. About the same season was sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham taken, in the countie of Powes land, in the borders of Wales, within a lordship belonging to the lord Powes, not without danger and hurts of some that were at the taking of him: for they could not take him, till he was wounded himselfe.

At the same time, the states of the realme were assembled at London, for the leuieng of monie, to furnish the kings great charges, which he was at about the maintenance of his wars in France: it was therefore determined, that the said sir John Oldcastle should be brought, and put to his trial, per the assemblee brake up. The lord Powes therefore was sent to fetch him, who brought him to London in a litter, wounded as he was: herewith being first laid fall in the Tower, shortly after he was brought before the duke of Bedford, regent of the realme, and the other estates, where in the end he was condemned; and finally was drawen from the Tower unto saint Giles field, and there hanged in a chaine by the middle, and after consumed with fire, the gallows and all.

When the daie was come, on the which it was covenanted that the towne of Falais should be deliue-red, to wit, the second of Januarie, because no succours appeared, the towne was yielded to the king: but the castle held out still, into the which the captaine and gouernour both of the towne and castle had withdrawn themselves, with all the souldiers; and being streialie besieged, the capitaine defended himselfe and the place right stoutlie, although he was sore laid to, untill at length, perceiving his people wearied with continuall assaults, and such approaches as were made to and within the verie wals, he was dyluen to compound with the king, that if he were not succoured by the first of February, then should he yield himselfe prisoner, and deliuer the castle; so that the souldiers should haue licence to depart, with their lues onelie saved. When the daie came, the covenants were performed, and the castle rendered to the kings hands, for no aid came to the rescue of them within. The capitaine named Oliuer de Spanie was kept as prisoner, till the castle was repaired at his costs and charges, because the same, through his obstinat wilfulnesse, was sore beaten and defaced, with underminings and batterie. Capitaine there, by the king, was appointed sir Henrie Fift. Dugh.

After this, king Henrie returned to Caen, and by reason of a proclamation which he had caused to be made for the people of Normandie, that had with-drawne themselves forth of the balliwicks of Caen and Falais, he granted alwaie to his owne people the lands of those that came not in upon that proclamation, and in speciall, he gave to the duke of Clarence, during his life, the vicounties of Auge, Debec, and Ponten de Per, with all the lands of those that were withdrawne forth of the same vicounties. This gift was made the sixteenth of Februarie, in this fift yeare of this kings reigne. All the Lent season, the king laie at Baiseur with part of his armie, but the resson were sent abroad, for the atchieving of certeine enterprises, because they should not lie idle.

In this yeare 1548, and in the first yeare of the reigne of this victorious king, Henrie the fift, on Easter daie in the after none (a time which required devotion) at a sermon in saint Dunstons in the east of London, a great fraie happened in the said church, where through manie people were sore wounded, and one Thomas Petwarden fishmonger that dwelt at Sprets keie was slaine outright; as they (upon a god intent) did what they could (to their owne perill as unfortunate it befell) to appease the turmoile, and to procure the keeping of the kings peace. Here upon the church was suspended, and the beginners of the boile, namelie the lord Strange and sir John Russell knight (betwene whom such coles of unkindnesse were kindled (at the instigation of their wives, gentlewomen of cruel disposition and at cursed hatred one with another) that their husbands went at their meeting in the said church to haue slaine one another) were committed to the counter in the Pultrie. Two wise gentlemen (I wisse) and well advised (no doubt) who without regard of day, place, people, preacher, or perill that might insue, were so forward to become the instruments of their mischievous wives malice; the fulfilling wherof they would haue forborne, if with discretion they had pondered the verdit of the poet concerning the said sex:

The archbishop of Canturburie, when he had intelligence given of this outrageous profanation of the church, caused the offenders to be excommunicat, as well at Paules, as in all other parish churches of London. Shortly after, to wit on the one and twentieth of Aprill, the said archbishop sat at saint Agnes, upon inquisition for the authors of the said disorder, and found the fault to consist speciallie in the lord Strange and his wife. So that upon the first daie of Maie next following in Paules church, before the said archbishop, the mayor of London, and others, the said offenders submitted themselves to doe penance, and swore to do it in such sort as to them it was intained; namelie, as followeth. That immediatlie all their servants should (in their shirts) go before the parson of saint Dunstons, from Paules to the said saint Dunstons church; and the lord Strange bare-headed, with his ladie barefooted; Reigbold Kentwood archdeacon of London following them. Also it was appointed them, that at the consecrating or hallowing of the said church (which they had profaned) the ladie should fill all the vessels with water, and offer likewise to the altar an ornament of ten pounds; and the lord his husband a peece of silver of five pounds. Which done by waie of a satisfactorie erpiation, it is likelie they were absolved: but the lord Strange had first made the wife of the said Petwarden slaine in the fraie, large amends: as Fabian saith, though in that sort he maketh no mention.]

Whilste the king of England was thus in Normanie, his name lost nothing on the sea, but so scoured the streames, that neither Frenchmen nor Britons durst once appeare: howbeit, on a daie there arose such a storme and hideous tempest, that if the earles of March and Huntingdon had not taken the haven of Southampton, the whole naue had perished; yet the safeguard was strange, for in the same haven, two balingers, and two great carrikes, laden with merchandize were drowned, and the broken mast of another carrike was blown over the wall of the towne. When the furie of this outrageous wind and weather was allwaged, and the sea was calmed, the earles of March and Huntingdon passed over with all their compaignie, and landing in Normandie, they marched through the countrie, destroying the French villages, and taking prizes on each hand, till they came to the king where he then was.

In the first yeare of king Henries reigne, he sent the earle of Warwick, and the lord Talbot, to besiege the strong castell of Dampfront. The duke of Clarence was also sent to besiege and subdue other townes, unto whom, at one time and other, we find, that these townes underwritten were yielded, where in he put capitains as followeth. In Courtton John Aubin, in Warney William Houghton, in Chambray James Speill, in Becheleuin the earle of March, in Harecourt Richard Woodvill esquier, in Fangeron John S. Albon, in Creuener sir John Kirbie to whom it was given, in Anuilliers Robert Hoznebie, in Bagles sir John Arthur, in Freinele vicont sir Robert Hynt.

The duke of Gloucester the same time, accompanied with the earle of March, the lord Greie of Codner, and other, was sent to subdue the townes in the Ile of Constantine, unto whom these townes hereafter mentioned were yielded, where he appointed capitains as followeth. At Carentine the lord Soetreux, at Saint Lo Reginald West, at Galignes Thomas Burgh, at Pont Done Marie Holwell, at the Haie de Pais sir John Aston, at saint Simeur le vicont sir John Koberst, at Ponton sir Robert Garraue, at Hamberie the earle of Suffolke lord of that place by gift, at Briqueuil the said earle also by gift, at Auranches sir Philip Hall balliffe of Alanfon, at Uire the lord Patreners, at S. James de Beumeron the same lord.

After that the duke had subdued to the kings domination, the most part of all the townes in that Ile of Constantine, Chierburgh erected, he returned to the king, and forthwith was sent thither againe to besiege that strong forresse, which was fortified with men, munition, vittels, and strong walles, towers, and turrets, in most defensible wise, by reason whereof it was holden against him the space of five moneths, although he used all waies and meanes possible to annoy them within, so that manie fierie assaults, skirmishes, issues, and other exploits of warre were atchieved, betwixt the Frenchmen within, and the Englishmen without: yet at length, the Frenchmen were so constrained by power of baterie, mines, and other forcible waies of approachings, that they were glad to compound to deliver the place, if no rescue came to raise the siege, either from the Dolphin, that then was retired into Aquitaine, or from the duke of Burgognie that then laie at Paris, within the terme of three score and two daies (for so long respite the duke granted) but they trusting further upon his lenitie and gentlenesse hoped to get a far longer terme.

Now were the Dolphin and the duke of Burgognie growen to a certeine agreement, by mediation of cardinals sent from the pope, so that the Englishmen shortly thought, that they would leaue a power, and come downe to rescue Chierburgh. The duke of Gloucester therefore raised his camps to be strongly intrenched, and manie defensible blockhouses of timber to be raised, like to small turrets, that the same might be a safeguard to his people, and to conclude, lest nothing unforeseen nor undone, that was available for the defense of his armie. The king doubting least some power should be sent downe, to the danger of his brother, and those that were with him at this siege, caused two thousand men to be imbarked in thirtie ships of the west countrie, by order sent unto certaine lordes there.

The Frenchmen within the towne, perceiuing those succors to approach nere to the towne, thought verelie that there had bene a power of Frenchmen coming to their aid: but when they saw them received as friends into the English campe, their comfort was some quailed: and so when the date appointed came, being the nineteenth of October, or rather about the later end of November (as the historie of the dukes of Normandie hath) they rendered up both the towne and castell, according to the covenants. The lord Greie of Codnor was made the kings lieutenant there, and after his deceasse, Sir Walter Hungerford. About the same time, or rather before, as Titus Livius writeth, to wit, the two and twentieth of June, the strong castell of Dampfront was yielded into the hands of the earle of Marwick, to the kings use. But the historie writen of the dukes of Normandie affirmeth, that it was surrendered the two and twentieth of September, after the siege had continued about it from April last. The king by honorable report of other, and of his owne speciall knowledge, so rightlie ascertained of the great valure that (for feats at armes and policie in warre) was alwaies found in the person of that John Bromley esquier (spoken of a little here before) for which his maiestie so sundrie waies roiallie rewarded him againe, some specialtie yet of the gentlemen's merits together with the foureignes bountie to him among other, seemes here (at mention of this Dampfront, whereof shortly after he was capteine) verie well to deserue a place: and to that purpose as the king in Julie went over againe, and this John Bromley in June the same yeare, with conduct of charge was sent afore, imploing himselfe still in venturous activitie with great annoie to the enimie: his highnesse for good liking of the same, and for hartening and example to other (in April next following) gave fourtie pounds land to him and his heires males by letters patents in words as followeth, and remaining yet of record in the Tower of London.

Yet hereat the noble prince not lacking his bountie, but rather regarding ever how iustlie new merits do deserue new dignities, and peradventure the more moved somewhat to reare up the degree of this esquire, toward the state of his brother, who a long time before had bene indued with knighthood, and also because that unto the duke of Buckingham he was of blood, which his behaviour alwaies had from staine so farre preserved, as rather brought to it some increase of glorie, did in the most worthe wise which to that order belongeth, dub him knight of warfare in field, made him also capteine generall of this strong castell of Dampfront, seneschall and great constable of Bossuile le Rossle, with other offices and titles of worship, as partlie may appeare by a deed, in which this knight taking patterne at his princes benignitie had given an annuite of thwentie pounds to his kinsman Walter Audeley.

Omnibus ad quos hoc presens scriptum pervenerit, Iohannes de Bromley miles, capitaneus generalis de Dampfront, seneschallus & magnus constabularius de Bossuile le Rossle & March ibidem, salutem. Scitis quod pro bono & fideli servitio quod dilectus consanguineus meus Gualterus de Audeley mihi fecerit, tam infra regnum Anglie quam extra, & precipue contra Francos: dedisse & concessisse, & hac presenti charta mea confirmasse eidem Gualtero unum annualem redditum viginti librarum, exeuntem de xpanerio meo de Bromley, & omnibus alijs terris & tenementis meis infra regnum Anglie, una cum herbagio pro quatuor equis habendo infra hoscos meos de Bromley & Willoughbridge, & octo carucatis feni capiendis infra prata mea de Shurlebrooke & Eoradmedo annuatim, durante tota vita predicti Gualteri, in festo sancti Iacobi apostoli. Et si contingat predictum annualem redditum, a retro fore in aliquo festo, durante termino predicto, tunc bene licebit eidem Gualtero, in manerio meo, & omnibus alijs terris meis predictis distringere, & distractiones inde capias penes se retinere, quousq. de redditu predicto, una cum arrearagijs (si que fuerint) plenarie fuerit persolutum & satisfactum. Et ulterius volo, quod predictus Gualterus habeat liberum egressum & regressum cum equis suis predictis, & ad asportandum fenum predictum, quando docuerit, voluerit, per omnes semitas & vias, sine aliqua aliqua contradictione mei predicti Iohannis, aut heredum meorum aliquali. Reddendo inde mihi ipsi Gualtero annuatim in festo sancti Georgij martiris, si tunc fuerim infra regnum Anglia, unum par calcarium deauratorum, pro omnibus. Et etiam volo & concedo quod predictus Gualterus liber sit, durante tota vita sua, ad volandum, venandum, piscandum, & alias commoditates percipiendum, tam infra manerium meum de Bromley quam in omnibus alijs manerijs, terris, & teneamentis meis infra regnum Anglia, sine aliqua contradictione vel impedimento mei prefati Iohannis de Bromley militis, heredum, aut assignatorum meorum aliquali. Et ut fidele testimonium presentibus habeatur, sigillum meum apposui: hijs testibus, Roberto de Bruyn milite, Iohanne de Holland, Gulielmo de Breton, Richardo le Grenill, Iohanne de Egerton, Richardo le Beſton, Thomaſe Creu, & alijs. Datum apud Damppfont predicto, 12 die mensis Augusti, anno regni regis Henrici quinti post conquestum sexto.

The old armes of the house of Bromley being quarterlie gules and or per fesse indented, had in the feale to this deed, an inscutchen charged with a griffin rampant; his creast, out of a crowne, a demilion supporting a standard charged with a lion passant gardant: about the shield was ingrauen, sigillum Iohannis de Bromley militis. That inscutchen and creast (as like is) given him in laudable remembrance for his valiant recouerie of the standard at the Harpe and bloodie skirmish by Cozbie. The earle of Warwike, and the lord Talbot, after the winning of this fortreſſe, made speed to come vnto the siege of Rone, where they were impleioed, as after shall appeare. And in like manner, the duke of Gloceſter, having once got the possession of Chierburgh, hastened towards the same siege: for the better furnishing of which enterprise, he had first caused an armie of fiftene thousand men to be brought ouer to him, vnder the leading of his vnckle the duke of Crecker, who imbarcking with the same, about the feast of the holye Trinitie, was appointed by the king to besiege the citie of Curreur, as the earle of Angus, otherwise called earle of Rime, was sent to win the castell of Millie Lucelche. These towneſes being deliuered to the kings vse, the duke ordeined capitaine of Curreur sir Gilbert Halsall knight.

The king now determining with all speed to besiege Rone, prepared all things necessarie for his purpose. Into this citie the Normans had conueied out of euerie part their monie, iewels, and household stuffe, as into the most sure and strongest place of the whole duchie. For since his arriual, they had not onlie walled that citie, and fortified it with rampiers and strong bulworks, but also furnished it with balliant captains, and hardie soldiers, to the number of foure thousand, beside such of the citizens as were appointed for the warre, according to their estates, of the which there were at the least fiftene thousand readie to serue in defense of the citie, as soldiers, and men of warre in all places where they should be assigned. King Henrie, to haue the countrie free, before he would besiege this citie, thought good first to win such towneſes as lay in his waie, and therefore departing from Caen (where he had kept the feast of saint George) the ninth daie of June, he marched straight vnto the towne of Louiers, and laid his siege about the same.

They within the towne, being well furnished of all things necessarie for the defending of a siege, manfully resisted the Englishmens inforcements, which spared not to deuiſe all waies and means how to approach the walles, and to batter the same with their great artillerie, till at length they brought the Frenchmen to that extremitie, that they were contented to yeld the towne on these conditions; that if by the thre and twentieth of June there came no succour from the French king to raise the siege, the towne should be deliuered into the kings hands, the soldiers of the garrison should serue vnder the king for a time, and the towneſmen should remaine in their dwellings as they did before, as subiects to the king: but the gunners that had discharged anie peece against the Englishmen should suffer death. When the daie came, and no aid appeared, the couenants were performed accordinglie. From thence went the king with all speed vnto Pont de Larch, standing vpon the riuier of Seine, eight miles aboue Rone towards Paris: he came thither about the seauen and twentieth of June.

When the Frenchmen which kept the passage there heard of the kings approach, they gathered together a great number of men of warre, minding to defend the passage against him, appointing an other band of men (if they failed) to keepe the further side of the bidge; and to watch, that neither by boate nor vessell he should come ouer the riuier by anie manner of meanes. At his conuening nere to the towne, he perceived that it was not possible to passe by the bidge without great losse of his people, and therefore he retired almost a mile backward, where, in a pleasant and commodious place by the riuier side he pitched his campe, and in the night season, what with boates and barges, and what with hogheads and pipes, he conueied ouer the broad riuier of Seine a great companie of his soldiers, without anie resistance made by his enemies. For they which were on the hither side of Seine, thinking that the Englishmen had gone to winne some other place, followed them not, but studied how to defend their towne, which was inough for them to do.

And to put the Frenchmen in doubt, least the Englishmen should take passage somewhere else, the king appointed certeine of the soldiers which had skill in swimming, to go to a place thre miles from the siege by the riuier side, and there to enter into the water, making great clamor and noise, as though they had meant to haue passed; but they had in commandement not to trauesse past halfe the riuier, so to procure the Frenchmen to make thitherwards, whilst the king in one place, and his brother the duke of Clarence in another, got ouer their men, and that in such number, before the Frenchmen had anie vnderstanding thereof, that when they made towards them, and perceived that they were not able to encounter them, they fled backe, and durst not abide the English footmen, which would faine haue bene doing with them.

When the king saw that his men were on the other side of the water, he (the next daie earlie) returned to the towne, & assaulted it on both sides. When the inhabitants therefore saw themselves compassed on both sides, contrarie to their expectation, with humble heart and small toy they rendered vp the towne vnto the kings hands. After this, the king having no let nor impediment, determined forthwith to besiege the citie of Rone, and first sent before him his vnckle the duke of Crecker, with a great companie of horsemen & archers to view the place, & there vpon with banner displayed came before the citie, and sent Windore an herauld at armes to the captains within, willing them to deliuer the citie vnto the king his maister, or else he would pursue them with fire and sword. To whome they proudly answered, that none they receiued of him, nor anie they would would deliuer him, except by fine force they were thereunto compelled: and herewith there issued out of the towne a great band of men of armes, and encountered hercelie with the Englishmen, the which receiuing them with like march, and great force, drave the frenchmen into the towne againe to their losse, for they left thirtie of their fellows behind prisoners and dead in the field.

The duke returned with this good speed and proud answer of the frenchmen vnto the king, who remained yet at Pont de Larch, and had giuen the towne of Louiers to his brother the duke of Clarence, which made there his departhe sir John Godard knight. After that the duke of Gloucester was returned to Pont Larch, the french captains within Rone set fire on the suburbs, beat downe churches, cut downe trees, shed the bushes, destroyed the vines round about the citie, to the intent that the Englishmen should haue no relasce nor comfort either of lodging or felwell. When the king heard of these despitefull doings, he with his whole armie remoued from Pont Larch, and the last daie of Iulie came before the citie of Rone, and compassed it round about with a strong siege. This citie was verie rich in gold, silver, and other precious things, in so much that when the same was taken and seized vpon by the English, the spoile was verie great and exceeding aduantageable: which the compiler of Anglorum prolia hath verie well noted, in a few lines, but pithie, saieing:

Plima Rothomagus restat, qua mercibus auro, Argentis, vasis pretiosis diues abundat: Rothomagus captus, iamq. Anglus adeptus opimas Prædæ, in patriam perpulchra trophæa remittit.

The king laie with a great puissance at the Charterhouse, on the east side of the citie, and the duke of Clarence lodged at St. Geruais before the port of Caen on the west part. The duke of Gloucester took his place on the north side: at port St. Denis, betwene the dukes of Gloucester and Clarence, was appointed the earle marshall, enen before the gate of the castle, to whom were ioined the earle of Desmond, and the lords Harington and Talbot, vpon his coming from Dampfront: and from the duke of Gloucester toward the king, were incamped the lords Ross, Willoughbie, Fitz Hugh, and sir William Porter, with a great band of northerne men, enen before the port of saint Hilarie. The earles of Portaigne and Salisburie were assigned to lodge about the abbie of saint Katharine. Sir John Greie was lodged direclie against the chapell called mount St. Michael: sir Philip Lech treasurer of the warres kept the hill next the abbete, and the baron of Carew kept the passage on the riuer of Seine, and to him was ioined that valiant esquier Xenico Darcots.

On the further side of the riuer were lodged the earles of Warren and Huntington, the lords Pell and Ferrers, sir Gilbert Umfreuile with a well furnished companie of warlike soldiers direclie before the gate called Port de Pont. And to the intent that no aid should passe by the riuer toward the citie, there was a great chaine of iron deuised at Pont Larch, set on piles from the one side of the water to the other: and beside that chaine, there was set by a new forced bridge, sufficient both for cartage and passage, to passe the riuer from one campe to another. The earle of Warwicke that had lachie wone Dampfront, was sent to bessege Caluodebecke, a towne standing on the riuer side, betwene the sea and the citie of Rone. A memorable feat in seruice nere to that place was done at that time by a well minded man then noted some after in writing: which matter unable to be better reported than by him that had so well marked it, no; like to be more trulie expressed than by the ancient simplicitie (and yet effectually) of the selfe same words wherein they were written, therefore thought meetest to haue them rehearsed as they were in order, thus.

The truth of the said memorable feat as it was reported in writing.

Memorandum, that my lord the earle of Warwicke did send out my cosin sir John Bromley and my cosin George Umfreuile with an hundred archers, and about two hundred soldiers a frett, to keepe at a little castle called the Strou nere to Caluodebecke where they wearen met with about eight hundred frenchmen & the fraie betwene them long pought, and the Englishmen in great dread and perill: till at length by the might of God and saint George, the field did fall to our Englishmen, & the frenchmen wearen put to flizt, and thear wearen yslaine about two hundred frenchmen, and as manie ytaken prisoners, and their capteine who was ycalled the lord of Estrifles was thear also yslaine, and thear wearen yslaine of our Englishmen my said cosin George Umfreuile and about twentie mo: on whose solles Iesus haue mercie, and thear wearen hurt in the face my said cosin sir John Bromley & my cosin Walter Audeley soze wounded and maimed in the right arme of his bodie, he then being but of the age of eightene yeares. But thankes be giuen to the blessed Trinitie, thear wearen manie noble victories ywon by the said noble erle of Warwicke and his folke, as in his officiall booke written by Maister John le Tucke then present with the said noble earle is ampie recorded. My said cosin Walter Audeley died at Warwicke the seauententh daie of Iulie anno Domini one thousand foure hundred and twentie, and was buried at Acton in Cheshire, nere the bodie of my said cosin sir John Bromley: on whose solles Iesus haue mercie. By me sir Richard Braie, chapleine to my ladie the old countesse of Warwicke; Iesus Maria, Amen, Pater noster, Ave Maria.

After this confid, this towne was so hardlie handled with fierce and continuall assaults, that the capteins within offered to suffer the English naue to passe by their towne without impeachment, by the citie of Rone. And also if Rone yelded, they promised to render the towne without delate. Wherevpon the English naue, to the number of an hundred sailles, passed by Caluodebecke, and came to Rone, and so besseged it on the water side. There came also to this siege the duke of Gloucester, with the earle of Suffolke, and the lord Aburgauenne, which had taken (as before yee haue heard) the towne of Eriburgh, & lodged before the port of St. Hilarie, nearer to their enemies by fortye rodes than any other person of the armie.

During this siege also, there arrived at Harline the lord of Bilmaine in Ireland, with a band of fixtene hundred Irishmen, in maille, with darts and stans after the maner of their countrie, all of them being tall, quicke, and nimble persons, which came without the citie were brought to such extremitie for want of vittels, that they were in danger all to haue starued. Whereupon being now full hope of reliefe, they determined to treat with the king of England, and so upon sheweaeres euenthere came to the walls such as they had choise amongst them for commissioners; which made a signe to the Englishmen lieng without the gate of the bridge, to speake with some gentleman, or other person of authority. The earle of Huntington, which kept that part, sent to them sir Gilbert Umfreuile; unto whom they declared, that if they might haue a safe conduct, they would gladlie come forth to speake with the king. Sir Gilbert repairting to the duke of Clarence, and other of the kings counsell, advertised them of this request.

Whereupon the duke of Clarence with the other counsellors resorted to the kings lodging, to informe him of the matter, and to know his pleasure therein; who after good aduiseement and deliberation taken, willed sir Gilbert to aduertise them, that he was content to heare twelue of them, which should be safely conueied into his presence. This answer being brought to the Frenchmen by the said sir Gilbert, on the next daie in the morning, foure knights, foure learned men, and foure sage burgeses, all clothed in blacke, came forth of the citie, and were received at the port saint Marie by sir Gilbert Umfreuile, accompanied with diuerse gentlemen and yeomen of the kings household, commonlie called yeomen of the crowne, by whome they were conueied to the kings lodging, whome they found at masse, which being ended, the king came out of his chamber, kneeling, and princelie beholding the French messengers, and passed by them into his chamber. And incontinentlie after he commanded that they should be brought in before his presence, to heare what they had to say.

One of them seene in the ciuill lawes, was appointed to declare the message in all their names, who shewing himselfe more rash than wise, more arrogant than learned, first toke upon him to shew wherein the glorie of victorie consisted, aduising the king not to shew his manhood in furnishing a multitude of poore, simple, and innocent people, but rather suffer such miserable wretches as laie betwixt the walls of the citie, and the trenches of his siege, to passe through the campe, that they might get their liuing in other places, and then if he durst manfullie assault the citie, and by force subdue it, he should win both worldlie fame, and merit great meed at the hands of almighty God, for hauing compassion of the poore, needie, and indigent people.

For kings advice to this great mistake.

When this orator had said, the king who no request lesse suspected, than that which was thus desired, began a while to muse; and after he had well considered the craftie cautell of his enemies, with a fierce countenance, and bold spirit he reprimoued them, both for their subtil dealing with him, and their malapert presumption, in that they should seeme to go about to teach him what belonged to the dutie of a conquerour. And therefore since it appeared that the same was unknowne vnto them, he declared that the goodnesse of battell called Bellona, had three handmaidens, euer of necessitie attending vpon hir, as blood, fire, and famine. And whereas it laie in his choise to vse them all three; yea, two, or one of them at his pleasure, he had appointed onelie the meekest maide of those three handmaids to punish them of that citie, till they were brought to reason.

And whereas the gaine of a capteine attained by any of the said three handmaidens, was both glorious, honourable, and worthy of triumph: yet of all the three, the youngest maide, which he meant to vse at that time was most profitable and commodious. And as for the poore people lieng in the ditches, if they died through famine, the fault was theirs, that like cruell tyrants had put them out of the towne, to the intent he should slay them; and yet had he saved their liues, so that if any lacke of charitie was, it rested in them, and not in him. But to their cloaked request, he meant not to gratifie them within so much, but they should keepe them still to helpe to spend their vittels. And as to assault the towne, he told them that he would they should know, he was both able and willing thereto, as he should haue occasion: but the choise was in his hand, to tame them either with blood, fire, or famine, or with them all, whereof he would take the choise at his pleasure, and not at theirs.

This answer put the French ambassadors in a great studie, musing much at his excellent wit and hardihood of courage. Now after they had dined (as his commandement was they should) with his officers, they vpon consultation had together, required once againe to haue access to his roiall presence, which being granted, they humbling themselves on their knees, besought him to take a truce for eight daies, during the which they might by their commissioners take some end and good conclusion with him and his counsell. The king like a mercifull prince granted to them their asking, with which answer they iostillie returned. After their departure were appointed and set vp three tents, the one for the lords of England, the second for the commissioners of the citie, and the third for both parties to assemble in, and to treat of the matter.

A truce for eight daies.

The commissioners for the English part were the earles of Marlike and Salisburie, the lord Fitz Hugh, sir Walter Hungerford, sir Gilbert Umfreuile, sir John Robbert, and John de Waques de Alameda. And for the French part were appointed, sir Guie de Butteler, and sir others. These commissioners met every daie, arguing and reasoning about a conclusion, but nothing was done the space of eight daies, nor so much as one article concluded: wherefore the Englishmen toke downe the tents, and the Frenchmen toke their leaue: but at their departing they remembering themselves, required the English lords (for the loue of God) that the truce might indure till the sunne rising the next daie, to the which the lords assented.

Commissioners
appointed.

When the French commissioners were returned into the citie without any conclusion of agreement, the poore people ran about the streets, crying, and calling the capteins and gouernors murderers and manquellers, saying that for their pride and stifte stomachs all this miserie was happened, threatening to sea them if they would not agree vnto the king of Englands demand. The magistrats herewith amazed, called all the townemen together to know their minds and opinions. The whole voice of the commons was, to yeeld rather than to sterue. When the Frenchmen in the euening came to the tent of sir John Robbert, requiring him of gentleness to moue the king, that the truce might be prolonged for foure daies. The king thereunto agreed, and appointed the archbishop of Canturburie, and the other seuen before named for his part, and the citizens appointed a like number for them.

The tents were againe set vp, and daillie they met together, and on the fourth daie they accorded on this wise, that the citie and castell of Rone should be deliuered vnto the king of England, at what time after the middell of the nineteenth daie of that present moneth of Januarie, the said king willed the same; and that all the capteins and other men whatsoeuer dwelling or being within the said citie and castell, should submit them in all things to the grace of the said king:

king: and further, that they should paie to the said king three hundred thousand scutes of gold, whereof of alwaies two should be worth an English noble, or in stead of euerie scute thirtie great blankes white, or sixtene grotes.

Howeuer it was accorded, that euerie soldier and stranger, being in the said citie and castell, should sweare on the euangelists before their departure, not to beare armour against the king of England, before the first daie of Januarie next to come. Also they within the towne should suffer all the poore people lying in ditches, or about the ditches of the citie, which for penurie were chased out, to enter the citie againe, and to find them sufficient food till the said nineteenth daie of Januarie. There were diuerse other articles, in all to the number of two and twentie agreed as well on the behalfe of the citizens, as of king Henrie, who granted, that all the souldiers, strangers, and other within the said citie and castell at that time, being not willing to become his lieges, should depart, after that the citie and castell was once yielded, freely without let, leauing to the said king all their armours, harnesses, goods, except the Normans, which if they should refuse to become lieges to him, were appointed to remaine as his prisoners, together with one Luca Italico, and certeine others.

When the daie of appointment came, which was the daie of saint Mollane, sir Guie de Buttiler, and the burgeses, deliue-red the keys of the citie and castell vnto the king of England, beseeching him of fauour and compassion. The king incontinentlie appointed the duke of Cresser, with a great companie to take possession of the citie, who like a valiant capteine mounted on a goodlie courser first entered into the citie, and after into the castell. The next daie being fridaie, the king in great triumph like a conquerour, accompanied with foure dukes, ten earles, eight bishops, sixtene barons, and a great multitude of knights, esquiers, and men of warre entered into Rome, where he was receiued by the cleargie, with two and fourtie crosses; and then met him the senat, and the burgeses of the towne, offering to him diuerse faire and costlie presents.

In this manner he passed through the citie to our ladie church, and there hauing said his orisons, he caused his chaplains to sing this anthem: Quis est tam magnus dominus: Who is so great a lord as our God. This done, he came to the castell, where he continued a good space after, receiuing homages and fealties of the burgeses and townesmen, and setting orders amongst them. He also redified diuerse fortresses, and townes, during which time he made proclamation, that all men which would become his subjects, should inioy their goods, lands & offices, which proclamation made manie townes to yield, and manie men to become English the same season.

The duke of Britaine, understanding that if the king of England should continue in possession of Normandie, his countie could not but be in great danger, if he prouided not to haue him his friend, by on safe conduct obtained for him & his retinue, came to Rome with five hundred horses, and being honourable receiued of the king, after conference had betwixt them of diuerse things, at length they agreed vpon a league on this wise, that neither of them should make warre vnto the other, nor to any of the others people or subjects, except he that meant to make war denounced the same six moneths before. Thus this league being concluded, the duke toke leaue of the king, and so returned into Britaine.

About the same time, at the sute of certeine bishops and abbats of Normandie, the king confirmed vnto them their ancient priuileges, granted by the former dukes of Normandie and kings of France, except such as were granted by those whome he repented for usurpers, and no lawfull kings or dukes. He also established at Caen the chamber of accounts of the revenues of his dukedome of Normandie. In Rome he began the foundation of a strong tower behind the castell, that from the castell to the tower, and from the tower to his palace, the men of warre appointed there in garison, might passe to thertie without danger of the citie; if perhaps the citizens should attempt any rebellion.

In this first yeare, whilst these things were doing in Normandie, quene Jone late wife of king Henrie the fourth, and mother in law to this king, was arrested by the duke of Bedford the kings lieutenant in his absence, and by him committed to safe keeping in the castell of Leeds in Kent, there to abide the kings pleasure. About the same time, one frer Hamboll of the order of Franciscanes that professed diuinitie, and had bene confessor to the same quene, was taken in the Ile of Cernesey, and being first brought ouer into Normandie, was by the kings commandement sent thither into England, and committed to the Tower, where he remained till the parson of the Tower quarelling with him, by chance slew him there within the Tower ward. It was reported that he had conspired with the quene by sorcerie and necromancie to destroy the king.

Whilst the king remained in Rome, to set things in order for the establishment of good policie in that citie, he sent abroad diuerse of his capteins, with conuenient forces to subdue certeine townes & castels in those parties, as his brother the duke of Clarence, who wan the strong towne of Vernon and Gaute. In Vernon was sir William Porter made capteine, and in Gaute the earle of March. The earle of Salisburie wan Hundue, after he had besieged it from the fourth of Februarie vntill the twelfth of March. This towne was giuen afterwards vnto the duke of Clarence. Also the said earle of Salisburie wan the townes of Pontifer de Willers, Ew, Helw castell, and finally all the places in that quarter, which till that present were not vnder the English obedience. At Helw castell sir Philip Lech was made capteine.

After Candlemasse, the king departed from Rome to go to Eureur, whither he promised to come in like case, as the Dolphin promised to be at Djeur, to the end that they might aduise vpon a conuenient place where to meet, to intreat of peace to be concluded betwixt the two realms. But the Dolphin by sinister perswasion of some enemies to conoord, brake promise, and came not. When the king saw that the rough default of his aduersarie, no treatie would be had, he remoued to Vernon, and there a while remained. From Eureur the king had dispatched the earle of Warwick vnto the siege of la Roch Union, which fortress he so constrained, that it was yielded into his hands, the first of Aprill, in the beginning of this seuenth yeare of king Henries reigne, and giuen to sir Guie Buttiler late capteine of Rome, of the kings free and liberall grant.

About the same time, the duke of Cresser laid siege vnto Chateau Galiard, which siege continued from the last of March, vnto the latter end of September, or (as some write) vnto the twentieth of December, as after shall appeare. The duke of Gloucster being sent to win the towne and castell of Pout, toke the towne by assault, and the castell was deliuered by composition after foure daies siege. After this the Englishmen ouerran the countie about Chartres, and did much hurt to their enemies in all places where they came. The hearts of the Frenchmen were sore discouraged with the losse of Rome, and the other townes which yielded one after another thus to the English.

Englishmen, so that such as loued the wealth of their countrie sore lamented the imminent mischances, which they saw by the diuision of the nobilitie, like sportie to fall on their heads, namely because they saw no remedie prepared.

But who euer else was disquieted with this matter, John duke of Burgonie raged and swelled, yea and so much fretted therewith, that he wist not what to saie, and lesse to do: for he knew well that he was neither free from disdain, nor yet deliuered from the scope of malice, because that he onelie ruled the king, and had the whole doings in all matters about him. And therefore he considered, that all such mishaps as chanced to the state of the common-wealth would be imputed to his negligence and disordered gouernement. To find some remedie against such dangers at hand, he thought first to assaie, if he might by any reasonable means conclude a peace betwixt the two mightie kings of England and France, which if he might bring to passe, he doubted not to reuenge his quarrell easilie enough against the Dolphin Charles, and to repress all causes of grudge and disdain.

Herewith intending to build upon this fraile foundation, he sent letters and ambassadozs to the king of England, aduertising him, that if he would personallie come to a communication to be had betwene him and Charles the French king, he doubted not but by his onlie meanes, peace should be brought in place, and bloudie battell claretie cryed. King Henrie giuing courteous eare to these ambassadozs, sent with them the earle of Warwicke as his ambassadoz, accompanied with two hundred gentlemen to talke with the duke, as then remaining in the French court at the towne of Prouince. The earle was assailed by the waie as he iournied, by a great number of rebellious persons, gotten into armour of purpose to haue spoiled him of such monie and things as he and his companie had about them. But by the high baliance of the English people, with the aid of their bowes, the Frenchmen were discomfited and chased.

The earle at his coming to Prouince was honorablie receiued, and hauing done the effect of his message, returned; and with him the earle of saint Paule, and the sonne and heire of the duke of Burbon were also sent as ambassadozs from the French king, to conclude upon the time and place of the meeting, with all the circumstances. Whereupon the king of England agreed to come to the towne of Pante, with condition that the duke of Burgonie, and other for the French king should come to Pontoise, that either part might meet other in a conuenient place betwixt those two townes nere to Melun. According to this appointment, K. Henrie came to Pante, where in the feast of Pentecost he kept a liberal house to all comers, and sate himselfe in great estate. Upon the which daie, either for god seruice alreadie by them done, or for the god expectation of things to come, he created Calcoigne de Foix, or therwise called the captaine or captall de Burca valiant Calcoigne, earle of Longueuille; and sir John Greie earle of Tankerville, and the lord Bourchier earle of Ew.

After this solemne feast ended, the place of entertainment and meeting was appointed to be beside Melun on the river of Seine, where in a faire place euerie part was by commissioners appointed to their ground. When the daie of appointment approached, which was the last daie of Maie, the king of England accompanied with the dukes of Clarence, and Gloucester, his brethren, the duke of Excester his uncle, and Henrie Beauford clerke his other uncle, which after was bishop of Winchester and cardinall, with the earles of March, Salisburie, and others, to the number of a thousand men of warre, entered into his ground, which was barred about and posted, where in his tents were pight in a princelie maner.

Likewise for the French part came Isabell the French quene, because her husband was fallen into his old frantike disease, hauing in her companie the duke of Burgonie, and the earle of saint Paule, and she had attending upon her the faire ladic Katharine her daughter, with sir and twentie ladies and damoysels; and had also for her furniture a thousand men of warre. The said ladic Katharine was brought by her mother, onelie to the intent that the king of England beholding her excellent beautie, should be so inflamed and rapt in her loue, that he to obtaine her to his wife, should the sooner agree to a gentle peace and louing concord. But though manie words were spent in this treatie, and that they met at right seuerall times, yet no effect ensued, nor any conclusion was taken by this frendlie consultation, so that both parties after a princelie fashion toke leaue ech of other, and departed; the Englishmen to Pante, and the Frenchmen to Pontoise.

Some authozs write that the Dolphin to saie that no agreement should passe, sent sir Lanegut de Chastell to the duke of Burgonie, declaring that if he would breake off the treatie with the Englishmen, he would then common with him; and take such order, that not onelie they but the whole realme of France should thereof be glad and reioise. Howsoeuer it came to passe, truth it is, that where it was agreed, that they should estewies haue met in the same place on the third of Iulie; the king according to that appointment came: but there was none for the French part, neither quene nor duke that once appeared; so that it was manifest inough how the fault rested not in the Englishmen, but in the Frenchmen. By reason whereof no conclusion sorted to effect of all this communication, saue onlie that a certaine sparke of burning loue was kindled in the kings heart by the sight of the ladic Katharine.

The king without doubt was highlie displeased in his mind, that this communication came to no better passe. Wherefore he mistrusting that the duke of Burgonie was the verie let and stop of his desires, said vnto him before his departure: Cosine, we will haue your kings daughter, and all things that we demand with her, or we will diue your king and you out of his realme. Well (said the duke of Burgonie) before you diue the king and me out of his realme, you shall be well wearied, and therof we doubt little. Shortly after, the duke of Burgonie and the Dolphin met in the plaine fields besides Melun, and there coming together, concluded apparantlie an open peace and amitie, which was proclaimed in Paris, Amiens, and Pontoise.

This agreement was made the first of Iulie in the yeare 1419. It was ingrossed by notaries, signed with their hands, and sealed with their great scales of armes; but as the sequelle shewed, hart thought not what long spake, nor mind meant not that hard wrote. Whiles these things were a doing, diuerse of the Frenchmen in Rone went about a conspiracie against the Englishmen, whereof the king being well aduertised, sent thither certaine of his nobles, which tried out these conspiratozs, caused them to be apprehended, had them in examination, and such as they found guiltie were put to death; and so setting the citie in quietnes, returned to the king, who counted it great honor to keepe the countreies which he wone by conquest in obedience and awe; such such victories are not obtained without sore labour and toile, both of prince and people, as the poet rightlis saith:

The king of England, perceiving by this new alliance, that nothing was lesse to be looked for, than peace at the hands of the Frenchmen, devised still how to win townes and fortresses, which were kept against him: and now that the truce was expired, on the thirtieth daie of Julie, he being as then within the towne of Pante, appointed certeine bands of soldiers in the after none to passe out of the gates, giving onelic knowledge to the captains that he would have them to doe. And to the intent that no inkling of the enterprise should come to the enemies care, he kept the gates himselfe as porter. These that were thus sent forth being guided by the earle of Longueville, otherwise called the captan de Buef, were commanded in as secret maner as they could to draw toward the towne of Pontoise, and to keepe themselves in covert till the darke of the night, and then approach the walles of that towne, and upon espieng their aduantage to enter it by scaling, hauing ladders and all things necessarie with them for the purpose.

Moreouer, about the closing of the daie and night in the evening, he sent forth the earle of Huntington with other bands of soldiers, to succor and assist the other, if they chanced to enter the towne according to the order taken. Those that were first sent forth (according to their instructions) couched themselves to closelie to their appointed places, that the enemies heard nothing of their doings. Whereupon when the night was come, they came in secret wise vnder the walles, and there watched their time till the morning began to draw on. In the meane time, whilst the watch was departed, and before other were come in to their places to relieue it, the Englishmen setting by their ladders, entered and brake open one of the gates to receiue the other that followed.

The Frenchmen perceiving that the walles were taken, and their enemies entered into the towne, at the first were sore amazed: but after perceiving the small number of the Englishmen, they assembled together and fiercelie assailed them, so that they were constrained to retire to the walles and turrets which they had taken, and with much adoe defended the same; some leaping downe into the ditches, and hiding them in the vines, till at length the earle of Huntington, with his companies came to their succors, and entring by the gate which was open, easilie did beat backe the enemies, & got the market place. Which when the lord Lisle Adam captaine of the towne perceived, he opened the gate towards Paris, by the which he with all his retinue and diuerse of the townsmen to the number of ten thousand in all, (as Enguerant de Monstr. recounteth) fled towards Paris, taking awaie with them their coine, iewels, and plate. Some of them fleeing towards Beauuois were met with, and stripped of that they had, by Jehan de Saligni, and Jehan de Clau, two captains that serued the Malientiall faction.

There were within the towne of Pontoise at that time when it was thus taken by the Englishmen, a thousand lances, and two thousand arcubalisters, as Thomas Walsingham affirmeth, and of Englishmen and Galcoignes that went first forth of Pante with the captan de Buef, not past fiftene hundred, as Hall reporteth: although Enguerant de Monstrellet saith, they were about thre thousand. But how manie sooner they were, they durst not at the first, by reason of their small number (as may be thought) once diuide themselves, or deale with batties, till about the houre of prime, that the duke of Clarence came to their aid with fure thousand men, who much praising the valiantnesse of the earle and his retinue that had thus wonne the towne, gaue to them the chiefe spoile of the which there was great plentie.

Then went the duke forth towards Paris, and comming thither, lodged before it two daies and two nights, without perceiving any proffer of issue to be made forth against him by his enemies, and there, fore seeing they durst not once looke vpon him, he returned to Pontoise, for the taking of which towne the whole countrie of France, and speciallie the Parisians were sore dismayed: sith now there was no fortress able to withstand the English puissance; for that the Frenchmen ouerran all the Isle of France, did to the Frenchmen damages innumerable (as their writers affirme) brought daile pries to the English armie, burst by houses, laid bras on the backs of the kine, rid vpon them, carried yong children before them, and sold them to the Englishmen for slaues. These strange doings so feared the Frenchmen within the territorie of Paris, and the countrie about, that the sozie people fled out of the villages with all their stufte into the citie.

The French king, and the duke of Burgogne lieng at saint Denis, in this season, departed from thence with the queene and his daughter, and went to Trois in Champaigne, there to consult of their businesse, hauing left at Paris the earle of S. Paule, and the lord Lisle Adam, with a great puissance to defend the citie. The king of England immediatlie after that Pontoise was wonne (as before yett hane heard) came thither in person, as well to giue order for the placing of a sufficient garrison there for defence thereof, as to proceed further into the countrie for the getting of other townes and places: and so after he had well provided for the good government, & safe keeping thereof, the eighteenth daie of August he departed out of the same with his maine armie.

And because they of the garrison that laie in the castell of Blancon Willers had done, & daile did diuerse and sundrie displeasures to the Englishmen, he pight downe his field nere to the same, the better to restrain them from their hostile attempts, and withall sent part of his armie to besiege the castell, which put them in such feare, that they despairing of all reliefe or succour, and perceiving they should not be able long to defend the place against the kings puissance, yelded the place, with all their coine and other goods into the kings hands. The soldiers of that garrison, and the inhabitants, at the contemplation of a certeine labie thers amongst them, were licensed by the king to depart without armes or weapon, onelic with their liues saued. John of Burgh that was after bailiffe of Gisors, was appointed captaine of this castell.

After this, all the townes and castels within a great circuit offered to yeld themselves vnto the English obedience; the strong towne and castell of Gisors onelic excepted, which still held out, & would shew no token of will to yeld. Whereupon the king the last of August began to approach the same, but at the first he could not come nere, by reason of the marishes and fennes: but yett such was the diligence of the Englishmen, aduanced by the presence of the king, readie in all places to commend them that were forward in their businesse, and to chastise such as slacked their duetie, that daile they came nere and nere, although the Frenchmen issued forth daile to encounter them, giuing them manie sharpe skirmishes. For the towne being double walled and fenced with those broad marishes, so encouraged them within, that they thought no force had bene able to haue subdued them.

But at length calling to remembrance, that the king of England came before no towne nor fortress, from which he would depart before he had brought it vnder his subiection, they offered to come to a parlee, and in the end compounded to render the towne into the kings hands the eight daie of September next ensuing, and the castell (bicause it was the stranger piece) they covenanted to deliuer the four and twentieth of the same, if in the meane time no rescue came to raise the siege. Whereupon when no such rescue could be heard of, at the daies limited, the soldiers of the garrison, & the moze part of the town-men also submitted themselves, and receiued an oth to be true subiects to the king, and so remained still in their romes. The earle of Worcester was made captaine there.

About the same time, to wit, the thre and twentieth of September (as some write) was castell Gallard surrendered to the hands of the duke of Excester, which had bene besieged euer since the last daie of March (as before ye haue heard.) But others write that it held out seauen moneths, and was not deliuered vp till the twentieth of December. This castell was not onlie strong by situation, standing vpon the top of a steep hill, but also closed with mightie thicke walles, and furnished with men, and all manner of munition and things necessarie. The king appointed the lord Ros captaine of it. After that Gisors and castell Gallard were thus yelded to the English obeisance, all the other townes and castels thereabout, and in the countrie of Menluesquin, shortly after yelded to the king, as Courneie, Chamimont, Beaulie, Dangu, and other small fortresses. At Courneie, was sir Gilbert Amfreville made captaine; at Beaulie, the earle of Worcester; and at Dangu, Richard Woodville, shortly after was the castell Daumall yelded to the earle of Warwick, to whome it was given.
And thus was the whole duchie of Normandie (vnto saint Michael onlie excepted) reduced to the possession of the right heire, which had bene wrongfullie detained from the kings of England euer since the daies of king John, who lost it about the yeare one thousand two hundred and seauen.

To satisfie those that be desirous to know what captains were appointed by the king in diuerse townes that were yelded to him (of which we haue made no mention heretofore but in generall) here their names doe follow, and of the townes, as we find them in the chronicles of maister Hall. At Cretule, sir Henrie Tancard an Almaine; at Dorigne, sir John Dopham, to whome it was given; at Chambole, the lord Fitz Hugh; at Cernuel in Perch, sir John Penill; at Cassie, sir William Huddleston bailiffe of Alanson; at Crulle sir Lois Kobbert; at Conde Rozeau sir John Fastolfe; at Catodebecke, sir Lois Kobbert; at Doye, William lord Bourchier earle of Eu; at Aubemarle, the earle of Warwicke, and his depatie thereof William Spontfort; at Bellincombe, sir Thomas Ramston lord thereof by gift; at Longueville, the capitall de Beuf or Buz, earle thereof by gift; at Danville, sir Christopher Burden; at Couches, sir Robert Sparburie; at Cyerburg, sir John Gedding; at Bacqueville, the lord Ros; at Arques sir James Fines, bailiffe of Caury; at Ponceaur, sir Philip Lech; at Cerie Pagnie, Richard Abraham; at Sentler Surget, William Basset; at Bietueill, sir Henrie Spontimer bailiffe of Buntelou.

But now to returne where we left. The wise and grauie personages of the realme of France, sore lamenting & bewailing the miserie of their countrie, saw they had puissance inough to defend their enemies, if they were of perfect concord amongst themselves. And therefore to remoue all rancor and displeasure betwixt the Dolphin, and the duke of Burgognie, they procured a new meeting, which was appointed to be at Spontreau ou fault Ponne, where the two princes at the daie assigned met. But such was the fortune of France, that the duke of Burgognie was there murdered, as he kneeled before the Dolphin: whereupon ensued greater debate than before. For Philip earle of Charolois, the sonne and heire of the said duke, took the matter verie grauoully, as he had no lesse cause, and determined to be reuenged on the Dolphin, and other that were guiltie of the murder: so that now there was great expectation of slaughter and bloodshed, but no hope for the most part of tranquillitie & peace. France therefore, that with overthowles given by the English, & dissision among themselves, was verie sore afflicted; insomuch that one miserie riding on anothers necke, the whole land was in danger of desolation by ciuill dissention & mutuall mutinies; as the poet noteth:

—accessit ad ista

Tunc mala Celtarum Burgundio fraude peremptus

Spar/ag, ciuils tota dissensio terra.

Anglorum prelia sub Henr. 5.

When he had well considered of the matter, and taken aduise with his counsell, he first sent ambassa-dours to the king of England, then lieng at Gisors to treat and conclude a truce betwene them both for a certeine space, that they might talke of some conclusion of agreement. King Henrie receiued the ambassadors verie courteously, and granted that communication might be had of peace, but utterlie deny-ed anie abstinence from warre, bicause he would not lose time, if the treatie sorted not to good effect. Here-vpon hauing his armie assembled at Gaunt, he diuided the same into thre parts, appointing the duke of Gloucester with one part to go vnto the castell of St. Germaine in Laie, and to laie siege therevnto. The duke according to his commission, comming before that castell, within a while constrained them within by continuall skirmishes and assaults to deliuer vp the place into his hands. An other part of the armie was sent vnto the castell of Pontioie, which likewise by such fierce assaults and manfull approches, as the Englishmen made thereto, was shortly given ouer and yelded. The third part of the host went to Hen-ric lane, a verie strong towne compassed about with the riuer of Selne.

But the king deuised to fasten botes and barges together, and to reere vp certeine frames of timber aloft on the same for defense of his soldiers, that should by that meanes approach the walles, wherewith those that had the towne in keeping were so put in feare, that their captaine was glad to come to a communication, & agreed to deliuer the towne into the kings hands, if no rescue came before the thirtieth daie of October next ensuing. On which daie, for that no succours appeared, the towne (according to the covenants) was given vp into the kings hands. Sir Thomas Ramston was made captaine there, and after him sir John Fastolfe. The king, whilst these places were besieged, and thus brought vnder his subiection, continued for the most part at Gaunt; but yet oftentimes he went forth to visit his campes, and to see that nothing should be wanting, that might further the speedie dispatch of his enterprises.

About the same time, there came againe ambassa-dours to him from Charles the French king, & from the young duke of Burgognie to treat with him of some good conclusion of peace to be had; who had no such trust in their sute, but that he doubted their meaning, and therefore ceased not to proceed in the winning of townes and castels, as he was in hand. Now when Christmasse approached, the king withdrew to Roane, and there kept the solemnization of that feast, appointing in the meane time his men of warre to be occupied as occasion serued. The earle of Salisburie was sent to besiege the towne of Freine, the which after stout resistance made at the first, shortly after was deliuered to him to the kings vse. The earles

A great victorie on the English side.

Wall, sir Philip Aech, and diuerse other, were sent into the countie of Haine, where, not farre from the cite of Oens they were encountered by a power of Frenchmen, which the Dolphin had sent against them. There was at the first a sharpe bickering betwixt them, but in the end the victorie remained with the Englishmen; so that manie of the Frenchmen were slaine, and taken, and the residue chased out of the field. There were slaine (as Thomas Walsingham saith) at the point of five thousand, and two hundred taken prisoners, among whom was the marshall de Rouss, and diuerse other of good account. The two English earles remained there as victors, in the countie which was by the king to them assigned.

Whilste these victorious exploits were thus happily attaiued by the Englishmen, and that the king laie still at Rone, in giuing thanks to almightie God for the same, there came to him embassadours from the French king and the duke of Burgognie to moue him to peace. The king minding not to be reputed for a destroyer of the countie, which he coueted to preferue, or for a causer of christian bloud still to be spilt in his quarell, began so to incline and giue care vnto their sute and humble request, that at length (after often sending to and fro) and that the bishop of Arras, and other men of honor had bene with him, and likewise the earle of Warwick, and the bishop of Rochester had bene with the duke of Burgognie, they both finally agreed vpon certaine articles, so that the French king and his commons would thereto assent.

A truce tripartite.

Now was the French king and the quene with their daughter Katharine at Trois in Champagne gouerned and ordered by them, which so much fauoured the duke of Burgognie, that they would not for any earthly god, once hinder or pull backe one jot of such articles as the same duke should seeke to preferre. And therefore what needeth manie words, a truce tripartite was accorded betwene the two kings and the duke, and their countries, and order taken that the king of England should send in the company of the duke of Burgognie his embassadours vnto Trois in Champagne sufficientlie authorised to treat and conclude of so great matter. The king of England, being in good hope that all his affaires should take good successe as he could wish or desire, sent to the duke of Burgognie his vncle, the duke of Gloucester, the earle of Salisbury, the bishop of Elie, the lord Stanhope, the lord Fitz Hugh, sir John Robert, and sir Philip Hall, with diuerse doctors, to the number of five hundred horse, which in the company of the duke of Burgognie came to the cite of Trois the eleuenth of March. The king, the quene, and the ladie Katharine them receiued, and hartlie welcomed, shewing great signes and tokens of loue and amitie.

The articles of the peace concluded betwene king Henrie and the French king.

After a few daies they fell to counsell, in which at length it was concluded, that king Henrie of England should come to Trois, and marie the ladie Katharine; and the king his father after his death should make him heire of his realme, crowne and dignitie. It was also agreed, that king Henrie, during his father in lawes life, should in his stead haue the whole gouernement of the realme of France, as regent thereof, with manie other covenants and articles, as after shall appere. To the performance thereof, it was accorded, that all the nobles and estates of the realme of France, as well spirituall as temporall, and also the cities and commonalties, citizens and burgeses of townes, that were obseant at that time to the French king, should take a corporall oth. These articles were not at the first in all points brought to a perfect conclusion. But after the effect and meaning of them was agreed vpon by the commissioners, the Englishmen departed towards the king their master, and left sir John Robert behind, to giue his attendance on the ladie Katharine.

King Henrie being informed by them of that which they had done, was well content with the agreement and with all diligence prepared to go vnto Trois, and thereupon hauing all things in a readinesse, he being accompanied with his brethren the dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the earles of Warwick, Salisburie, Huntingdon, Cu, Tankerville, and Longue, a fiftene thousand men of warre, went from Rone to Pontoise; departing from thence the eight daie of Maie, came to saint Denis two leagues from Paris, and after to Pontcharcanton, where he left a strong garison of men, with sir William Coigne, to keepe the passage; and so then entering into Brie, he toke by the waie a castell which was kept against him, causing them that so kept it, some to be hanged, and the residue to be led forth with him as prisoners. And after this keeping on his iourne by Monins, and Nogent, at length he came to Trois.

The duke of Burgognie accompanied with manie noble men, receiued him two leagues without the towne, and conueied him to his lodging. All his armie was lodged in small villages the about. And after that he had reposed himselfe a little, he went to visit the French king, the quene, and the ladie Katharine, whom he found in saint Peters church, where was a verie iousous meeting betwixt them (and this was on the twentieth daie of Maie) and there the king of England, and the ladie Katharine were affianced. After this, the two kings and their counsell assembled together diuerse daies, wherein the first concluded agreement was in diuerse points altered and brought to a certeinete, according to the effect aboue mentioned. When this great matter was finished, the kings swore for their parts to obserue all the covenants of this league and agreement. Likewise the duke of Burgognie and a great number of other princes and nobles which were present, receiued an oth, the tenor whereof (as the duke of Burgognie uttered it in solemne words) thus inueth, accordinglie as the same is exemplified by Titus Linius De Foro Luuisiis in Latine.

The oth of the duke of Burgonie.

Go Philippus Burgundia dux, per me meosque haredes, ad sacra Dei euangelia domino regi Henrico Anglia, Francia, et pro Carolo rege regni iuro, quod humiliter ipsi Henrico fideliterq. cunctis in rebus, qua rempublicam spectant & Francia coronam, obediemus, & statim post mortem Caroli domini nostri, domino Henrico regi suisque successoribus in perpetuum ligei fideles erimus; nec alium quempiam pro domino nostro supremo Francia rege, quam Henricum & suos haredes habebimus, neque patiemur. Non erimus praterea in consilio vel consensu cuiusquam damni regis Henrici, suorumue successorum, ubi quicquam detrimenti patiantur capitis sue membri, vel vitam perdant; sed predicta (quantum in nobis fuerit) quam citissimis literis vel nuntiis, ut sibi melius prouideri valeant, eis significabimus.

The same in English.

Philip duke of Burgonie, for my selfe, and for mine heires, doe here sweare vpon the holie euangelists of God, to Henrie king of England

England, and regent of France for king Charles, that we shall humble and faithfully obeye the said Henrie in all things which concerne the common-wealth and crowne of France. And immediatlie after the decesse of our souereigne lord king Charles, we shall be faithfull liegemen unto the said king Henrie, and to his successors for ever. Neither shall we take or suffer any other souereigne lord and supreme king of France, but the same Henrie and his heires: neither shall we be of counsell or consent of any hurt towards the said king Henrie or his successors, wherby they may suffer losse & detriment of life or lim, but that the same be as farre as in us may lie, we shall signifie to them with all speed, by letters or messengers, that they may the better provide for themselves in such cases.

The like was a great number of the princes and nobles both spirituall and temporall, which were present, received at the same time. This done, the morrow after Trinitie Sunday, being the third of June, the marriage was solemnized and fully consummate betwixt the king of England, and the said ladie Katharine. Herewith was the king of England named and proclaimed heire and regent of France. And as the French king sent the copie of this treatie to euerie towne in France: so the king of England sent the same in English unto euerie citie and market towne within his realme, to be proclaimed and published. The true copie whereof, as we find it in the chronicles of maister Hall, we haue thought good here to set downe, for the more full satisfieng of those that shall desire to peruse euerie clause and article thereof, as followeth.

The articles & appointments of peace betweene the realmes of England and France.

Henrie by the grace of God king of England, heire and regent of France, lord of Ireland, to perpetuall mind of christian people, and all those that be vnder our obedience, we notifie and declare, that though there hath bene here before diuerse treaties betwene the most excellent prince Charles our father of France and his progenitors, for the peace to be had betwene the two realmes of France and England, the which heretofore haue borne no fruit: we considering the great harmes, the which haue not onelie fallen betwene those two realmes, for the great diuision of that hath bene betwene them, but to all holy church; we haue taken a treatie with our said father, in which treatie betwixt our said father and us, it is concluded & accorded in the forme after the manner that followeth.

1 First, it is accorded betwene our father and us, that forsomuch as by the bond of matrimonic made for the god of the peace betwene us and our most dere beloved Katharine, daughter of our said father, & of our most dere mother Isabell his wife; the same Charles and Isabell bene made our father and mother: therefore them as our father and mother we shall haue and worship, as it fitteth and seemeth to worship a prince and prince to be worshiped, principallie before all other temporall persons of the world.

2 Also we shall not disfraunce, discaion or let our father aforesaid, but that he hold and possede as long as he liueth, as he holdeth and possedeth at this time, the crowne and dignitie royal of France, with rents and profits for the same, of the sustentance of his estate and charges of the realme. And our foresaid mother also hold as long as she liueth, the state and dignitie of queene, after the manner of the same realme, with conuenable conuenient part of the said rents and profits.

3 Also that the foresaid ladie Katharine shall take and haue dower in our realme of England as queenes of England here tofore were wont for to take and haue, that is to saie, to the summe of forty thousand scutes, of the which two algate shall be a noble English.

4 And that by the waies, manners, and meanes that we without transgression or offense of other made by us, for to speake the lawes, customes, vsages and rights of our said realme of England, shall done our labour and pursuit, that the said Katharine, all so soone as it maie be done, be made sure to take, and for to haue in our said realme of England, from the time of our death, the said dower of forty thousand scutes yereleie, of the which twaine algate be worth a noble English.

5 Also if it happe the said Katharine to ouerlive us, we shall take and haue the realme of France immediatlie, from the time of our death, dower to the summe of twentie thousand franks yereleie, of and vpon the lands, places and lordships that held and had Blanch sometime wife of Philip Deasail to our said father.

6 Also that after the death of our said father aforesaid, and from thence forward, the crowne and the realme of France, with all the rights and appurtenances, shall remaine and abide to us, and bene of us and of our heires for euermore.

7 And forsomuch as our said father is witholden with diuerse sicknesse, in such manner as he maie not intend in his owne person for to dispose for the needs of the foresaid realme of France: therefore during the life of our foresaid father, the faculties and exercise of the gouernance and disposition of the publicke & common profit of the said realme of France, with counsell, and nobles, and wise men of the same realme of France, shall be and abide to us: so that from thenceforth we maie gouerne the same realme by us. And also to admit to our counsell and assistance of the said nobles, such as we shall thinke meet. The which faculties and exercise of gouernance thus being toward us, we shall labour and purpose us speedfullie, diligentlie, and trulie, to that that maie be and ought for to be vnto the worship of God, and our said father and mother, and also to the common good of the said realme, and that realme with the counsell & helpe of the worshipful and great nobles of the same realme for to be defended, praised and gouerned after right and equitie.

8 Also that we of our owne power shall do the court of parlement in France to be kept and obserued in his authoritie and souereignetie, and in all that is done to it in all manner of places that now or in time comming is or shall be subiect to our said father.

9 Also we to our power shall defend and helpe all and euerie of the piers, nobles, cities, townes, communalities, and singular persons, now or in time comming, subiects to our father in their rights, customs, priuileges, freedoms, and franchises, long ing or due to them in all manner of places now or in time comming subiect to our father.

10 Also we diligentlie and trulie shall trauell to our power, and do that iustice be administrated and done in the same realme of France after the lawes, customes, and rights of the same realme, without personall exception. And that we shall kepe and hold the subiects of the same realme in tranquillitie and peace, and to our power we shall defend them against all manner of violence and oppression.

11 Also we to our power shall provide, and do to our power, that able persons and profitable beene taken to the offices as well of iustices and other offices belonging to the gouernance of the demaines, and of other offices of the said realme of France, for the good right and peaceable iustice of the same, and for the administration that shall be committed vnto them; and that they be such persons, that after the lawes and rights of the same realme, and for the utilitie and profit of our said father, shall minister, and that the foresaid realme shall be taken and departed to the same offices.

12 Also that we of our power, so soone as it may commodiouse be done, shall trauell to put into the obedience of our said father, all manner of cities, townes, and castels, places, countries, and persons within the realme of France, disobedient, and rebels to our said father, holding with them which beene called the Dolphin or Arminache.

13 Also that we might the more commodiouse, suerlie and frelie done, exercise, & fulfill these things aforesaid, it is accorded that all worthe nobles and estates of the same realme of France, as well spirituals as temporals, and also cities notable and communalities, and citizens, burgeses of townes of the realme of France, that beene obedient at this time to our said father, shall make these othes that followen.

15 Also that the worthe, great, and noble estates of the said realme, as well spirituals as temporals, and also cities and notable communalities, and citizens and burgeses of the same realme, in all manner of things well and trulie shall keepe and to their power shall do to be kept of so much as to them belongeth, or to anie of them, all those things that beene appointed and accorded betwene our foresaid father and mother and vs, with the counsell of them whome vs list to call to vs.

16 And that continuallie from the death, and after the death of our said father Charles, they shall be our true liegemen, and our heires; and they shall receive and admit vs for their liege and souereigne and verie king of France, and for such to obeie vs without opposition, contradiction, or difficultie, as they beene to our foresaid father during his life, neuer after this realme of France shall obey to man as king or regent of France, but to vs and our heires. Also they shall not be in counsell, helpe, or assent that we lose life or limme, or be take with euill taking, or that we suffer harme, or diminution in person, estate, worship, or goods; but if they know anie such thing for to be cast or imagined against vs, they shall let it to their power, & they shall done vs to werken thereof, as basillie as they may by themselves, by message, or by letters.

17 Also that all manner of conquests that should be made by vs in France vpon the said inobedients, out of the duchie of Normandie, shall be done to the profit of our said father; and that to our power we shall do, that all manner of lands and lordships that beene in the places so for to be conquered, longing to persons obeying to our foresaid father, which shall sweare for to keepe this present accord, shall be restored to the same persons to whom they long to.

18 Also that all manner of persons of the holie church, beneficed in the duchie of Normandie, or any other places in the realme of France, subiect to our father, and fauouring the partie of the dukes of Burgogne, which shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shall inioy peaceable their benefices of holie church in the duchie of Normandie, or in other places next aforesaid.

19 Also likewise, all manner of persons of holie church, obedient to vs, and beneficed in the realme of France, and places subiect to our father, that shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shall inioy peaceable their benefices of holie church in places next a bouesaid.

20 Also that all manner of churches, vniuersities, and studies generall, and all colleges of studies, and other colleges of holie church, being in places now or in time comming subiect to our father, or in the duchie of Normandie, or other places in the realme of France subiect to vs, shall inioy their rights and possessions, rents, prerogatiues, liberties, & franchises, longing or due to them in any manner of wise in the said realme of France, sauing the right of the crowne of France, and euerie other person.

21 Also by Gods helpe, when it hapeneth vs to come to the crowne of France, the duchie of Normandie, and all other places conquered by vs in the realme of France, shall bow vnder the commandement, obeisance, and monarchie of the crowne of France.

22 Also that we shall force vs, & do to our power, that recompense be made by our said father without diminution of the crowne of France to persons obeying to him, and fauoring to that partie that is said Burgogne, to whom longeth lands, lordships, rents, or possessions in the said duchie of Normandie, or other places in the realme of France, conquered by vs hither towarde, given by vs in places and lands gotten or to be gotten, and overcome, in the name of our said father vpon rebels and inobedients to him. And if so be that such manner of recompense be not made to the said persons, by the life of our said father, we shall make that recompense in such manner and places, of goods, when it hapeneth by Gods grace to the crowne of France. And if so be that the lands, lordships, rents, or possessions, the which longeth to such manner of persons in the said duchie and places be not given by vs, the same persons shall be restored to them without any delaye.

23 And during the life of our father, in all places now or in time comming subiect to him, letters of common iustice, and also grants of offices and gifts, pardons or remissions, and priuileges shall be written and proceed vnder the name and seale of our said father. And for so much as some singular case may fall, that may not be foresene by mans wit, in the which it might be necessarie and behouefull, that we do write our letters, in such manner case, if any hap for the good and suertie of our father, and for the gouernance that longeth to vs, as is beforesaid; and for to eschewen perils that otherwise might fall, to the preiudice of our said father, to write our letters, by the which we shall command, charge, and defend after the nature and qualitie of the need, in our fathers behalf and ours as regent of France.

24 Also, that during our fathers life, we shall not call nor write vs king of France; but verelie we shall absteine vs from that name, as long as our father liueth.

25 Also that our said father, during his life, shall name, call, and write vs in French in this manner: Nostre treschier filz Henry roy d'Engleterre heretere de France. And in Latine in this manner: Præclarissimus filius noster Henricus rex Anglie & hares Francie.

26 Also that we shall put none impositions or exactions, erations, or do charge the subiects of our said father without cause reasonable and necessarie, ne other wise than for common good of the realme of France, and after the saving and asking of the lawes and customs reasonable appoyued of the same realme.

27 Also that we shall trauele to our power to the effect and intent, that by the assent of the three estates of either of the realmes of France and England, that all maner of obstacles maie be done awaie, and in this partie, that it be ordeined and provided; that from the time that we or any of our heires come to the crowne of France, both the crownes, that is to the crowne of France and England perpetuallie be together in one; in the same person, that is to saie, from our fathers life to vs, and from the tearme of our life thenceforward in the persons of our heires, that shall be one after an other, and that both realmes shall be gouerned from that we or any of our heires come to the same, not seuerallie vnder diuerse kings in one time, but vnder the same person which for the time shall be king of both realmes, and our soueraigne lord (as it is before said) keeping neuerthelesse in all maner of other things to either of the same realmes, their rights, liberties, customs, blages, and lawes, not making subiect in any maner of wise one of the same realmes, to the rights, lawes, or blages of that other.

28 Also that thenceforward, perpetuallie, shall be still rest, and that in all maner of wise, dissensions, hates, rancours, enuies and wars, betwene the same realmes of France and England, and the people of the same realmes, drawing to accord of the same peace, may cease and be broken.

29 Also that there shall be from henceforward for evermore, peace and tranquillitie, a good accord, and common affection, and stable friendship betwene the said realmes, and their subiects before said. The same realmes shall kepe themselves with their counsell, helps, and common assistance against all maner of men that inforce them for to doen or to imagine wrongs, harmes, displeasures, or grievances to them or either of them. And they shall be conuersant and merchandize frelie and suerlie together, paieing the custome due and accustomed. And they shall be conuersant also, that all the confederats and allies of our said father and the realme of France aforesaid, and also our confederats of the realme of England aforesaid, shall in eight moneths from the time of this accord of peace, as it is notified to them, declare by their letters, that they will draw to this accord, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accord of this peace, saving neuerthelesse either of the same crownes, and also all maner actions, rights and reuenues, that longen to our said father and his subiects, and to vs and our subiects, against all maner of such allies and confederats.

30 Also neither our father, neither our brother the duke of Burgognie shall begin, ne make with Charles, cleping himselfe the Dolphin of Vienness, any treatie, or peace, or accord, but by counsell and assent of all and eche of vs three, or of other the three estates of either of the said realmes aboue named.

31 Also that we with assent of our said brother of Burgognie, and other of the nobles of the realme of France, the which thereto owen to be called, shall ordeine for the gouernance of our said father sekerlie, louinglie, and honestlie, after the asking of his roiall estate and dignitie, by the maner that shall be to the worship of God, and of our father, and of the realme of France.

32 Also all maner of persons, that shall be about our father to do him personall seruice, not onclie in office, but in all other seruices, as well the nobles and gentilles as other, shall be such as hath bene borne in the realme of France, or in places longing to France, good, wise, true, and able to that foresaid seruice. And our said father shall dwell in places notable of his obedience, and no where else. Therefore we charge and command our said liege subiects, and other being vnder our obedience, that they kepe and do to be kept in all that longeth to them, this accord and peace, after the forme and maner as it is accorded; and that they attempt in no maner wise, any thing that may be prejudiciall or contrarie to the same accord and peace, vpon paine of life and lim, and all that they may forfeit against vs. Given at Troes, the thirtieth day of Maie, 1420, and proclaimed in London the twentieth day of June.

33 Also that we for the things aforesaid, and encerie one of them, shall giue our assent by our letters patents, sealed with our scale vnto our said father, with all approbation and confirmation of vs, and all other of our blood roiall, and all other of the cities and towne to vs obedient. Sealed with our scales accustomed. And further our said father, besides his letters patents sealed with our great scale, shall make or cause to be made letters approbatorie, and confirmations of the peeres of his realme, and of the lords, citizens, and burgeises of the same, vnder his obedience. All which articles we haue sworn to kepe vpon the holie euangelists.

On the fourteenth of June being fridaie, there was a solemn procession at London, and a sermon at Paules crosse, in which the preacher openly declared the effect of the kings mariage, and the articles concluded vpon the same, by reason wherof (he said) there must be a new great scale deuised, and the old broken, and in the new the kings name with a new addition of his title as regent of France, and heire apparent of that kingdome was to be ingrauen. Beside the league thus concluded by king Henrie with the French king, and the whole bodie of the realme of France, there was a priuat league accorded betwixt him and the duke of Burgognie, the effect wherof was comprehended in articles as followeth.

First, that the duke of Burgognie should procure this peace latelie before concluded, to be obserued firme and stable in all covenants and points therof, so far as he by any meanes might further the same: in consideration wherof, one of the brethren of king Henrie should take to wife one of the said duke of Burgognies sisters. That king Henrie should euer haue in singular fauour the said duke of Burgognie, as his most deere brother, and support him in all his rights. That the said duke, after the deceasse of king Charles, should take an oth of fealtie to be true to B. Henrie and his heires, according to the forme and tenor therof before expressed, and should in all things be friend to king Henrie and his heires for euer. That king Henrie should do his uttermost indeuour, that due punishment might be had for the murder of duke John, father to the said duke of Burgognie, as well vpon Charles that named himselfe Dolphin, as vpon others that were guiltie and priue to that murder.

If the said Dolphin chanced to be taken, either in battell or to towne besieged, or if anie other chanced so to be taken, that should be proued guiltie or priue to the murder of the said duke John, he should not be deliuered without iust punishment for his deeds, nor without the consent of the two kings Charles and Henrie, and of the three estates of both the realmes. In consideration of the great diligence, and painfull trauell sustained by the duke of Burgognie, it was also agreed, that he should haue by patent granted of king Charles and queene Isabell a fee of twentie thousand pounds Parisien, of puerlie reuenues, assigned forth nere to the confines of his countrie, to intey the same to him and to his wife the duchess Michaele, and to the heires males betwixt them two, lawfullie begotten, to the obtaining thereof, king Henrie should shew all his furtherance; & if it might not be brought to passe till king Henrie had obtained the crowne of France, then should he see the same performed, vpon the receiuing of his bomage.

The king of England, after all the articles of the said treatie and agréments were concluded, passed and sworne vnto, made to the French king, the duke of Burgonie, and other the French lords, a sumptuous banquet; and before they departed from the same, he said with great grauitie made to them a right pithie and sententious oration, declaring to them both how profitable the ioining of the two kingdomes should be to the subiects of the same, and also the right that he had thereto, being by lineall descent of the womans side (which is the surest) rather a Frenchman than an Englishman. And though he was an Englishman borne, yet he assured them to tender the wealth of the realme of France, as much as he would the advancement of his owne native countrie of England.

Wherewith, he inuicted against Charles the Dolphin, being the head and onelie maintainer of all the ciuill discord, whose wicked nature, and cruell disposition, did well appeare in the murder of the late duke of Burgonie. He therefore willed them, according to their dutie, oath, and agrément, to stand with him, and helpe to reduce such a stubborne and disloiall soune vnto the obediensce of his father king Charles, that he might shew himselfe conformable vnto such orders and decrees, as they had taken, appointed, and agreed vpon; and for his part, he promised to loyship, loue, and honor his father in law the said Charles, in place of his owne father, according to the true meaning of this concord and agrément, trusting the same to be a peace finall.

It was rendered by the tenth of June Thus Livius. Sens & Montreuil besieged and taken. The siege was laid the 16. of June.

And to conclude, he promised, that if they shewed themselves true and loiall to him, according to the same agrément; the Ocean sea should sooner cease to flow, and the bright sunne lose his light, than he would desist from doing that which became a prince to do to his subiect, or a father to his naturall child. When he had thus perswaded the nobilitie, and dispatched his businesse at Troies, he with all his armie, hauing with him the French king, and the duke of Burgonie, departed from thence the fourth of June; and vpon the seauenth daie of the same moneth came before the towne of Sens in Burgonie, which held on the Dolphins part: but after foure daies siege, it was yielded vnto the king, and there he made capteine, the lord Genuille. From thence, he removed to Montreuil on fault Monne, which towne was taken on the thre and twentieth daie of June, by assault, so that manie of the Dolphins part were apprehended, before they could get to the castell.

Whilist the siege laie there, and before the towne was entred, the duke of Bedford came thither vnto the king, bringing with him a faire retinue of soldiers out of England. After the getting of the towne, the castell being well bittelled and manned, denied to render, and therefore was it crutched with a strong siege. During the which, the duke of Burgonie was informed, in what place of the towne the duke his father was buried, who was slaine there (as before you haue heard) and now his corps was taken by againe by his sonnes appointment, and seared, and so conuected vnto Wigcon in high Burgonie, and there buried by his father Philip; to the end that the remembrance of him should remaine to posterities, by the reseruatiou of some monument abiding in the place of his interment, after that his bodie was consumed, and his naturall countenance forgotten. Which is the last point of reuerend dutie (as we may well thinke) which pietie of children towards their parents doth require; namely, that they be decentlie buried when they be departed; and that their graues or some stones may put vs that are alieue in mind of going the same waie, and to let no more by this sitting life, than standeth with the vncertainie and shortnesse of the same; as one right well saith:

*Cum tumulum cernis, cur non mortali spernis?
Esse memor mortis, quo vivis tempore fortis.*

Because they within the castell of Montreuil, gaue opprobrious words vnto the kings herald that was sent to them, the king caused a gibet to be set up before the castell, on the which were hanged twelue of those spitefull offenders, all gentlemen & friends to the capteine named monsieur de Entrie, who at length, perceiuing that by no means he could be succoured; and fearing to be taken by force, began to treat with the king of England, who for the space of eight daies would hearken to none of his offers; but in conclusion, he and his rendozed themselves simple, their liues onelie saved, six weekes after they had bene besieged. The earle of Warwick was made capteine, both of the towne and castell, who fortified it with men, munition, and bittels.

About this time Robert the gouernour of Scotland, the sixteenth yeere after his brothers reigne, and in the thirtieth yeere of his owne regiment decreased, in whose stead and office his sonne Mordae duke of Albanie was by and by chosen, who had sonnes thre, Walter, Alexander, and James, whereof the two eldest beginning betimes to be obstinate, grew some after verie graceles and wicked: that in one flagitious feat among the rest by this Walter verie impoultie against his parents was uttered. The gouernour had a faire, a gentle, and well sieng falcon, whereby he set great store. The sonne verie desirous of the same, made manie meanes and motions to haue hir, not without note of malapert importunitie and lacke of reuerence toward his parents pleasure, which the father dissembling to see, would not yet in anie wise forgo his hawk. Whereat this child reiecting regard of dutie, and receiuing an vnaturall hate and heat by broth of iniquitie let a boiling in his brest, came in on a time, where standing a while at a sudden bzaid, pluckt awaie the bird from his fathers fist, and straight before his face wzing of hir necke. The gouernour hereat sore astonished, for verie greafe gaue a great grone; Well sonne (quod he) since pe cannot brydle your bzunts for dutie and reuerence toward me your parent and soveraigne, I will bring in one that shall brydle vs both. Where vpon some after, he with one Calen Campbell, a noble man & of much authoritie (vnto whome this Walter had done a great despight) and with other of the nobilitie fell straight in consultation about the calling home of their king. Which all with one assent they did right well allow, whereby some after (as is touched afore, and followeth more at large) he was by them in his kingdome right rofallie placed. But this came of it. These mischafous children Walter and Alexander, the verie cause of their fathers confusion and their owne, within few yeares after condemned by law, vpon a hill by Sterling castell, had their heads chopt off at once. Walters wife with hir two sonnes, Andrew and Alexander, ran for refuge awaie into Ireland; thus for their long iniquities their hires inlie paid all in a daie.]

How to proceed in our proccesse of France. After the thus winning of the towne and castell of Montreuil; the king departing from thence, came to Melun vpon Seine, the thirtieth daie of June, and besieged it round about, having then in companie with him the French king, and the young king of Scots, the dukes of Burgonie, Clarence, Bedford, Gloucester, and War, the prince of Dainger, and one and twentie earles, besides lords, barons, & knights, equall to lords in degree, to the number of seaven and fiftie, what of England and France; and beside also fiftene maister soldiers. This siege continued the space almost of seaven moneths, or (as Thomas Walsingham saith) fouretene weekes, and foure daies, with skirmishing, scaling, assaulting, and defending, to the losse (no doubt) of both parts. Capteine of this towne was one monsieur de Barbason, a Gascoigne of such experience and approued valiance in wars, that his renoume and fame was spred through the world.

At the first laing of the siege, he called all the soldiers there in garrison, and likewise the townesmen afore him, and warned them all on paine of death, that none of them should be so hardie, as to treat, or once to motion anie word of surrendering the towne, or of coming to anie composition or agreement with the two kings; except they made him being their capteine priue thereto, before they attempted anie such thing. ¶ In the meane season, the French quene, the quene of England, and the duchesse of Burgonie, lieng at Corbeill, came diuerse times to visit their husbands, and to see their friends; whome the king of England highlie feasted, and longlie interteined, that euerie creature reported great honour of him. This towne of Melun seemed verie strong, both by reason of the river of Seine, which compassed part thereof, and also by strong walles, turrets, ditches, and bulwarks made about it.

The king therfore, to take awaie all the issues and entres from them within, made a bridge ouer the river, able to beare horses and carriage: and againe, appointed diuerse botes furnished with men of warre, to kepe the streame; so that they within should haue no waie to come abroad, either by water or land: yet on a daie, the Frenchmen sailed forth, and assailed the English lodgings, where the earle of Marlike was incamped on the east side of the towne, not farre from the duke of Burgonie; but by the valiant prowesse and manlie courage of the Englishmen, the enimies were easilie beaten backe and constrained to retire into the towne againe, with their losse. Where is to be remembred, that during this siege before Melun, there came to the king the duke of Sauere, the kings brother in law (but the kings sister that had bene married to him, was not then liuing) and brought with him seauen hundred well appointed horsesmen, which were retained to serue the king, and right worthilie they bare themselves, and therefore most liberallie recompensed at the kings hand, for the time they continued in his seruice.

The king enforced this siege by all waies and meanes possible, to bring the towne into subiection, as well by mines as otherwise, but they within the towne so valiantlie behaued themselves, as well by countermine (whereby at length they entered into the kings mines) as by other waies of resistance, that by force of assaults it was not thought anie easie matter to win the same. It fortuned on a daie, that whilst there rose a contention betwixt two lords of the kings host, who should haue the honor to go first into the mine, to encounter with the Frenchmen, that now had brought their mine through into the English mines, and made barriers betwixt, that they might safelie come and fight with the Englishmen: the king (to auoid the strife) entered the mine himselfe first of all other, and by chance came to fight hand to hand with the lord Barbason, who was likewise entered the mine before all other of them within the towne.

After they had fought a good season together, at length they agreed to discover either to other their names; so as the lord Barbason, first declaring what he was; the king likewise told him, that he was the king of England. Whereupon, Barbason perceiving with whome he had fought, caused the barriers forthwith to be closed, and withdrew into the citie, and the king returned backe to his campe. At length, bittels within the towne began to faile, and the pestilence began to war hot, so that the lord Barbason began to treat; and in conclusion, about the middest of Nouember (as Fabian saith) the towne was yielded vpon certeine conditions, whereof one was, that all that were consenting to the death of the duke of Burgonie, should be deliuered to the king of England, of whome the lord Barbason was suspected to be one. The king sent them vnder the conduct of his brother the duke of Clarence, to the citie of Paris, whereof the French king made him capteine, and so at his coming thither, he took possession of the Bastill of S. Anthonie, the Loure, the house of Melle, and the place of Bois de Vincennes.

Monsieur de Barbason was accused by the duke of Burgonie, and his sisters as guiltie to their fathers death; but he in open court defended himselfe as not guiltie of that crime, granting indeed and confessing, that he was one of the familiar seruants to the Dolphin, but that he was priue or consenting to the death of the duke of Burgonie, he utterly denied. Whereupon he was not condemned, neither yet acquitted, by reason of such presumptions and conjectures as were alledged and brought against him, so that he remained in prison at Paris and else where, the space of nine yeares, till at length, being brought vnto castell Galliard, it chanced that the same castell was toome by those of the Dolphins part, and he being as then prisoner there, escaped out of danger, and so by that means was set at libertie, as after shall appeare.

Some write, that he had bene put to death, if he had not appealed from king Henries sentence, vnto the iudgement of the officers at armes; alledging, that by the lawe of armes, no man hauing his brother in armes within his danger, afterwards ought to put him to death for any cause or quarell. And that he was the kings brother in armes he proued it, for that he had fought with him hand to hand within the mines (as before we haue heard) which combat was thought of equall force by the heralds, as if he had fought with the king bodie to bodie, within solempne lists. The credit of this matter we leaue to the consideration of the readers. The earle of Huntington was made capteine of Melun. In defense of this towne and castell, the French had gotten vnto them manie Scots. At the siege here the king kept with him young James of Scotland, who sent to those Scots, that they should come out and yield them vnto him, and not to stand in armes against their liege lord and king; but they gaue word backe againe, they could not take him for king, that was in the power of another, and so kept them in hold and in their armes till. King Henrie vpon winning of these forts, for their rebellion against their prince, which they would haue to be counted constancie, and for their contemptuous answer vnto him, twentie of the proudest, in example of the rest, caused he there to be hanged at once.

From thence the king departed with his armie vnto Corbeill, where the French king and the two quenes then sojourned; and after, both the kings, accompanied with the dukes of Bedford, Burgonie, Gloucester, and Excester, and the earls of Marlike

After the great solemnization at the foresaid coronation in the church of saint Peters at Westminister was ended, the quene was conueied into the great hall of Westminister, and there set to dinner. Upon whose right hand sat at the end of the table the archbishop of Canturburie, & Henrie furnished the rich cardinal of Winchester. Upon the left hand of the quene sat the king of Scots in his estate, who was served with covered messe, as were the forenamed bishops; but yet after them. Upon the same hand and side, nere the words end, sat the duchesse of Borke and the countesse of Huntington. The earle of March, holding a scepter in his hand, knelt upon the right side: the earle marshall in like manner on the left of the quene. The countesse of Kent sat under the table at the right foot, and the countesse marshall at the left. The duke of Gloucester sir Humfre was that daie overker, and stood before the quene bareheaded. Sir Richard Penell was that daie carver to the quene, the earles brother of Suffolke cupbearer, sir John Steward sewer, the lord Clifford pantler in the earle of Warwikes stead, the lord Willoughbie butler in stead of the erle of Arundell, the lord Grate Ruthin or Kiffinape, the lord Aubie almoner in stead of the earle of Cambridge, the earle of Worcester was that daie earle marshall in the earle marshalls absence; who rode about the hall upon a great courser with a multitude of tipped haues about him, to make and keepe roome in the said hall. Of the which hall the barons of the cinque ports began the table upon the right hand, toward saint Stephens chappell; and beneath them at the table sat the boldchers of the chancerie. Upon the left hand next to the cupbord sat the mayor and his brethren the aldermen of London. The bishops began the table against the barons of the cinque ports; and the ladies against the mayor. Of which two tables, for the bishops, began the bishop of London and the bishop of Durham; and for the ladies, the countesse of Stafford, and the countesse of March.

The first course.

The feast was all of fish: for the ordering of the service whereof were diuerse lords appointed head officers, as steward, controller, surcoier, and other honourable officers. For the which were appointed the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the lord Fitz Hugh, the lord Furneall, the lord Grate of Wilton, the lord Ferrer of Grobie, the lord Poymings, the lord Harrington, the lord Darcie, the lord Dacres, and the lord de la Ware. These with others ordered the service of the feast as followeth; and thus for the first course. Watone and mustard, eels in burneur, frument with batten, pike in herbage, lamprie powdered, trotot, codling, place fried, mat-fine fried, crabs, lech lumbard flourished, tartes, and a deuise called a pellican, sitting on his nest with his birds, and an image of saint Katharine holding a book, and disputing with doctors, holding this poesie in his right hand, written in fatte and legible letters, Madame le Roine; and the pellican answering, C'est la signe d'un roy, pour tenir loy, Eta tout sa gent, elle mette sa entent.

The second course.

The second course was: gellie coloured with columbine flowers, white potage or cream of almonds, became of the sea, conger, soles, cheuen, bay-bill and roch, fresh salmon, halibut, gurnard, rochet, babled, finlets fried, creus or lobster, lech damastie, with the kings poesie flourished thereupon, Princes plus; lamprie fresh baked, sampeine flourished with a scutcheon rosall, and therein thre crownes of gold planted with floureluces and floure of carionmill wrought of confections: with a deuise of a panther, and an image of saint Katharine with a whele in one hand, & a scroll with a poesie in the other, to wit,

La royne masle, in cestale,
Per bon resoun, aues renoun.

The third course was, dates in compost, creame motle, carpe deore, turbut, tench, perch with goion, 10 fresh sturgeon with welks, popperous rosted, mermes fried, creuisse de can dore, pzanis, eels rosted with lamprie, a lech called the white lech flourished with hawthorne leaues & red hawes; a marchpane garnished with diuerse figures of angels, among which was set an image of S. Katharine, holding this poesie,

Il est escrit, par voir & est,
Per mariage pure, cest guerre ne dure.

And lastlie a deuise of a tiger looking in a mirror, and a man sitting on horse-backe all armed, holding in his armes a tigers whelpe with this poesie, Per force sans resounie ay prise ceste best: and with his owne hand making a countenance of thyowing of mirrors at the great tiger, which held this poesie; Gile che mirrou ma feste disour. Thus with all honour was finished the solemn coronation, after which the quene sojourned in the palace of Westminister till Palmesundae following; and on the morow the toke hir iournie towards Windsor; where the king and she held their Easter.

After the solemn feast of the coronation was ended, the king as well to visit certeine places for deuotion by waie of pilgrimage, as also to see in what state and order diuerse parts of his realme stood, departed from the quene, appointing daie and place where she should meet him; and so iournied forth from place to place, thorough sundrie countries, as well of Wales as England, and in euerie quarter where he came, he heard with diligent care the complaints of iustors, and toke order for the administration of iustice both to high and low, causing manie misdeameours to be reformed. At length he came to the towne of Leicester, where he found the quene according to the appointment before taken. Here at Leicester, he held the feast of Easter. How then standeth this with the report of Fabian, who saith, that the king and quene kept their Easter at Windsor; and that when the said festiual time was expired, the king made prouision for his warres in France, during the tearme of Richard Whittinghams meraltie of London, which was in the eight yeare of this king Henries reigne: Suerlie there must needs be an errour, either in mistaking the yeare or the place: but lesse we will grant the king and quene (with their court of attendants) to haue bene Eie ibi simul, which privilege is granted to none but Ubiquitaries.

But while these things were thus adooing in England, the duke of Clarence, the kings lieutenant in France and Normandy, assembled together all the garrisons of Normandy, at the towne of Bernaic, and from thence departed to the countrie of Haine, and at Pont le Gene he passed the river of Nonne, and rode through all the countrie to Lucie, where he passed the river of Loire, and entered into Anjou, and came before the citie of Angiers, where he made manie knights, that is to saie, sir William Ros, sir Henrie Goddard, sir Rowland Alder, sir Thomas Beaufort, called the baron of Clarence, and diuerse other; and after that he had fortified, burnt, and spoiled the countrie, he returned with prete and pillage to the towne of Beaufort in the ballie, where he was aduertised, that a great number of his enemies, Frenchmen, Scots, Spaniards, and other were assembled together, at a place called Wick Wadge, that is, Old Waugie, with the duke of Alanson, calling himselfe

The duke of Clarence had a Lombard resorting unto him, reticined with the part aduerse (his name was Andrieu Forzusa) of whom the duke inquired the number of his enemies, to whom he reported, that their number was but small, & not of puissance to match with halfe the power of his strong armie, intising him with assurance of victorie, to set on the Frenchmen. The duke like a couragious prince, assembled together all the horsemen of the armie, and left the archers vnder the guiding of the bastard of Clarence, and two Portingales, captieins of Fresnie le vicount, saing, that he onlie and the nobles would haue the hono<sup>r</sup> of that tournee. When the duke was passed a certeine street and narrow passage, he espied his enemies ranged in good order of battell, by the monition of the Lombard, which had sold him to his enemies, & his aduersaries had laid such ambushments at the streets, that the duke by no waie without battell could either retire or flee.

The Englishmen seeing this, ballantlie set on their enemies, who were foure to one, by reason whereof at length the Englishmen were oppressed with multitude, and brought to confusion. There were slaine, the duke of Clarence, the earle of Tankerville, the lord Ros, sir Gilbert Umfreville earle of Angus, and sir John Lomlie, sir Robert Terend, and almost two thousand Englishmen: & the earles of Summerfet, Suffolke, and Berch, the lord Fitz Water, sir John Berkelie, sir Rafe Heulle, sir Henrie Inglis, sir William Bowes, sir William Longton, sir Thomas Brough, and diuerse other taken prisoners. And of the Frenchmen were slaine above twelue hundred of the best men of warre they had, so that they gained not much.

The bastard of Clarence which tarried at Beaufort, being informed of the great number of the Frenchmen, made forward with all the archers, to come to the succo<sup>r</sup> of the duke, but they came too late. For the Frenchmen hearing of the approaching of the archers, fled with their prisoners, and left the bodie of the duke, and other the dead carcasses behind them. The archers buried them all sauing the dukes corpse, which with great solemnitie was sent to England, and buried at Canturburie beside his father. After this the Englishmen burnt and spoiled the countie of Paine, and so returned to Alanfon, and after departed euerie man to his garrison. This battell was fought on Easter euen, in the yeare 1421. But now to returne to the king.

A parliament.

After he had kept his Easter at Leicester, he with the quene removed and went northward, till they came to Yorke, where they were receiued with great ioy of the citizens, and other the nobles and gentlemen of the countie. The king went unto Beuerlie, to visit the shrine of saint John, and immediatlie by on his departure from thence, the sorrowfull newes of his brother the duke of Clarences death, came to him, for which he was right penfise. But sixth mourning would not auaille, he called to remembrance what he had to doe, and thereupon without delaiie, sent Edmund earle of Poxtaigne, brother to the earle of Summerfet into Poxtmandie, giuing to him like authoritie and preheminiene, as his brother the late deceased duke of Clarence had before entioied.

After this, he called his high court of parlement, in the which he declared with such great wisdom & grauitie, the acts which had bene done in France, the state of the time present, and what was necessarie to be provided for the time to come (if they would loke to haue that icwell and high kingdome, for the which they had so long laboured and fought) that the communalitie gladlie granted a fifteenth, & the clergie beneuolentlie offered a double disme. And because no delaiie should be in the kings affaires for lacke of payment, the bishop of Winchester the kings uncle lent unto him twentie thousand pounds, to be paid him againe of the same dismes. When all things were necessarie for this tournee were readie and prepared, he sent his brother the duke of Bedford before him to Calis with all his armie, being (as some write) foure thousand men of armes, and twentie thousand archers and others; though some haue written, that the whole armie passed not twelue thousand of one and other.

The king himselfe shortly after, about the middle of Maie, passed the seas to Calis, and so from thence he marched through the countie into Boies de Vincennes, where the French king and the quene as then sojourned. The duke of Burgognie also that had receiued him at Monsiruell, attended him to Douai in Ponthieu, and there having taken leaue of him for six daies, returned now againe to him, according to his promise. Then did they consult together about their affaires, and appointed in all hast to fight with the Dolphin, and to raise the siege of Chartres which he had there planted. Hereupon, the king of England with all his puissance, came to the towne of Pante, and thither repaired the duke of Burgognie; but yer they departed from thence, they had knowledge, that the Dolphin hearing of the puissant armie of the king of England approaching towards him, was recoiled with his people towards Towers in Touraine.

Hereupon the king of England incontinentlie, did not onlie send backe the duke of Burgognie into Picardie, to resist the attempts of sir Jacques de Harecourt, which made war in that countie for the Dolphin; but also appointed the king of Scots, with the duke of Gloucester, to besiege the towne of Dzeur. They comming thither about the eighteenth of Iulie, planted siege on euerie side, both of the towne and castell; and with power of batric, and other forcible meanes, so constrained them within, that on the eight daie of August they compounded, that if no sufficient rescue came to raise the siege, before the end of twelue daies next ensuing, both the towne and castell should be deliuered to the king of Englands use, so as the soldiers might depart with their goods whither they would, except one Englishman, which was knownen to be amongst them, being fled for treason out of the kings dominions.

On the twentieth daie of August, which was the day of the appointment, the king of Scots received the towne and castell to the behoofe of his soueraigne lord the king of England, who (during all the time of the siege) laie at Poxtaunall. The townsmen that would remaine still in their houses, were sworne to be true subiects to the king; and the other which refused, departed with the souldiers. The Englishman that was excepted, was deliuered according to the covenants; and after executed, as he had deserved. The earle of Worcester was made captieine of Dzeur, and sir Henrie Portimer balliffe there. This done, the king hearing that the Dolphin should be at Baugencie, assembling his power, hastened thitherwards: but at his comming into those parties, he found no appearance of enemies in the field, and so he remained there fiftene daies.

In which meane while, the earle of Suffolke was sent forth to discover the countie, and the king went by assault the towne of Baugencie, and after when vittels began to faile, he marched forward, meaning to pursue the Dolphin. But the Dolphin doubting the English puissance, conueied all the vittels forth of those quarters, and retired himselfe to Burges in Berrie, choosing that place as his first refuge, & there fore determined there to remaine, till fortune turning monlie called king of Berrie. The king of England followed, till bittels and forrage began sore to faile on all sides, and then returning, passed towards Dylance, taking the castell of Rouge Pont by assault.

Titus Lilius.

La historie du duc de Normandie.
Liv. VI.

He staied three daies before Dylance, and from thence, for want of bittels, marched through Casti-nois, till he came to Uignie sur Monne, where he remained for a season, to refresh his people that were sore trauelled, in that painefull passed iourne: in which the king lost not onelie manie of his men for lacke of bittels, but also a great number of horses and carriages. Some haue written, that about the same time, he should win the citie of Sens, otherwise called the kings new towne by surrender; but after he had remained for a time at Uignie, we find that he remored to Paris, where he was honorable receiued. For he came among them as one hauing empire and dominion in his hand, so that to him they were no lesse forward in submission for feare of his indignation, than ready to giue him all the intertainment that they could deuise for the keeping of his fauour: the lacke whereof they knew stood with the hazard of their safetie, as the contrarie tended to their welfare.

Shortlie after, considering with himselfe that the towne of Meur in Brie, being replenished with e-nimies, was not to be suffered to remaine in that state, in the middes of his new gotten subiects, he determined to take awaie the open scruple that might poison and infect the members, dwelling hard by:
wherefore with a great number of earles and barons in his companie, he came to besiege it. This towne was no lesse well bittelled than manned, and no better manned than fortified; so that the king could neither haue it to him deliuered at his pleasure, nor gaine it by assault, without the great losse of his people: yet neuerthelesse, he determined not to depart, till he had got it by one meane or other. The riuer of Spaine diuided this towne into two parts, so that there was no enterie from the one into the other, but by a brydge, raised vp, and made ouer the riuer, sustained with manie arches. The one part is called the ci-tie, and the other la March, being the strongest and best fortified. The king first lodged a mile off in a castell, and sent the duke of Excester to begin the siege, which he did, according to his instructions, vpon the first of October.

The strong towne of Meur lishmen.

Shortlie after, the king himselfe came, and lodged in the abbey of Pharon, the duke of Excester in the abbey de Chage, the earle of March at the greie friers, and the earle of Marwicke directedlie against that part that is called la March. They within defended themselves right ballantlie, so that the Englishmen were not all at their ease, but specialie through lacke of bittels manie died, and manie fell sicke, by reason whereof, no small number returned home into England; where in the meane time, on the first of December, a parliament was called and holden at Westminster, by the duke of Bedford, gouernour of the realme in the kings absence. In this parliament, a fiftieth was granted to the king towards the maintenance of the warres, the one moiety to be paid at Candlemasse, and the other at Martinmasse, of such monie as at the time of the grant was current.

Whilome.
The birth of king Henrie
the first.

This yeare at Windsoze on the daie of saint Petrus in December, the quene was deliuered of a sonne named Henrie, whose godfathers were John duke of Bedford, and Henrie bishop of Winchester, and Jaquet, or (as the Frenchmen called him) Jaquetline of Bauiar, countesse of Holland was his godmother. The king being certified hereof, as he laie at siege before Meur, gaue God thanks, in that it had pleased his diuine prouidence to send him a sonne, which might succed in his crowne and scepter. But when he heard reported the place of his natiuitie; were it that he warned by some prophesie, or had some foreknowledge, or else iudged himselfe of his sonnes fortune, he said vnto the lord Fitz Hugh his trustie chamberleine these wordes; My lord, I Henrie bozne at Spornmouth, shall small time reigne, & much get;

and Henrie bozne at Windsoze, shall long reigne, and all lose: but as God will, so be it.

King Henrie
prophesie of his sonne.

The king held his Christmasse at the siege before Meur, for he would not giue ouer that siege, although his armie was greatlie diminished, by reason of lacke of bittels, extreame cold, soule weather, and other discommodities that bred great sore of disca-ses and sickenesse among his people; notwithstanding all the helps and means that might be, he deuised to remedie the same: so that beside such as died, as well of sickenesse as by the enimies hand, manie returned home into their countries. But yet he ceased not to continue the siege, beating the walles with his ordinance, and casting downe bulwarkes and rampiers on eche side the towne, made approches as well by water as land, with nightie engines deuised of boyds to defend the Englishmen, as they ap-proched the walles, and gaue assaults. The walles also were in diuerse places undermined.

Titus Lilius.

After this, the Englishmen found meanes, by brydges made of boats, to passe the riuer; but yet the souldiers and other within defended their rampiers and breaches most stoutlie, and with guns and quarrels kill shot at the Englishmen, of whome they slue manie, and among other the earle of Worcester was slaine, with a bullet of the great artillerie, & the lord Clifford with a quarrell of a crossebow; yet the Englishmen still wan ground, and got nether and nearer to the walles. They also towe the chieffest part of a brydge from the enimies, and kept watch and ward vpon and about the same. The earle of Marwicke had also taken a tawmure from them of the market place, built on the southside thereof, able to receiue and lodge a good number of men, which seruing to good purpose, for the better brydeling of them within, he caused to be kept, and thus were they within Me-aur sore oppressed on euerie side.

Herevpon in Februarie, the captiues doubting least the citie could not be defended long, caused all the bittels and goods to be conueted into the market place, and retired all the men of warre into the same, leauing none in the other part of the citie, but the commons, and such as were not able to do any auaileable seruice in the warre. The king aduertised hereof, commanded in all hast to assault the citie, which was quicklie done; so that the citie by fine force was within three houres taken and spoiled; and the same daie the market place besieged round about, and a mill towne adioining vnto the same. In Aprill, the quene passed ouer into France, with a saire retinue of men, vnder the conduct of the duke of Bedford, the duke of Glocester remaining lord gouernour of the realme in his place. At his com-ming thither, she was so welcommed and honorable receiued, first of her husband, and after of her father and mother, that she appeared to be no lesse loued of her noble husband, than of her deere and naturall parents.

Whilist the siege still continued before Meur, Oliuer Ma-nnie a valiant man of warre of the Dolphins part (which before was capitaine of Falaise, and yielding it, swore neuer to beare armour against the king of England) assembled a great number of men of warre, as well Brittaines as Frenchmen, that is to saie, the lord Spontbarchier, the lord of Coimon, the lord of Chatelgiron, the lord Tintignace, the lord de la Houslaie, and diuerse other, which entered into the countie of Constantine in Normandie, and robbed and killed the Englishmen, where they might either espie or take them at their due aduantage. But the earle of Suffolke keeper of the marches, hearing of their doings, sent for the lord Scales, sir John Aston bailiffe of Constantine, sir William Hall, sir John Banaster, and many other, out of the garrisons within that territorie, the which incountred with their enemies at a place called Le parke leuseque, in English, The bishops parke.

A foye cōflicte.

There was a foye fight and a long betwixt them, but finallie, the Frenchmen were put to flight, so that in the conflict and chase were slaine, the lord of Coimon, the lord of Chatelgiron, and thre hundred other: and there were taken prisoners, the lord de la Houslaie, and sir Oliver Hannie, with thre score others. The king pardoned sir Oliver Hannie his life, though he ill deserued so great a benefit, for that he had broken his oth and promise, but he was sent into England, there to learne to speake English, and so being brought to London, shortly after died, being as then a verie aged man, & was buried in the white friers. ¶ But here note (by the waie) the roiall part of this king, who as he tempered all his actions with singular circumspection; so with a pitifull mind he pondered the miserie of his enemies; so that when he might (iure belli, by the law of armes) haue spoiled them of goods and life, he diuerse times spared both; with clemencie comonlie making conquest of them, who seemed by open hostilitie scarce conquerable.

Abr. Fl.

The king being still before the market place at Meaux in Brie (as ye haue heard) sore beat the wals with his ordinance, and cast downe bulwokes and rampiers on euerie side the towne, so that he had made an open breach for his people to enter. Whereof the lord of Offemont being aduertised, with a companie of cholen persons sent by the Dolphin, assailed in the night season to enter the towne, to the succours of them within. But though diuerse of his people got ouer the walles, by helpe of ladders which they had set vp; yet such was his chance, that as he passed a plankie, to haue come to the walles, he fell into a deepe ditch; and in the meane time, the Englishmen perceiuing by the noise what the matter meant, came running to the ditch, took the lord of Offemont, and slue diuerse of his companie that stood in defence.

Continuation de la chronicles de Plandiers.

The captiues within, perceiuing in what case they stood, by reason their succours were thus intercepted, and doubting to be taken by assault, for that they wanted munition and weapon, began to treat with the king of England, who appointed the earle of Marwicke, and the lord Hungerford, to commune with them; and in conclusion an accord was taken, and so the towne and market place with all the goods were deliuered into the king of Englands hands, the tenth daie of Maie, in the yeare 1422. The appointment taken with them of this towne was this, that they should yeld themselves simple vnto the kings pleasure, their liues onlie saued: and hereupon manie of them were sent ouer into England, amongst whome was the bishop of that towne, which shortly after his arrivall here fell sicke and died.

Titus Livius. The conditions of the surrender of Meaux into the kings hands.

There were also foure persons excepted, against whome the king might by order of law and iustice proceed as he saw cause, for their faults and trespasses committed. As first, the captiue of the towne, named the bassard of Clauru, the which had done manie grauous oppressions to the people of the countie thereabouts, in spoiling them of their goods and ransoming them at his pleasure. He had also put diuerse to death most cruellie, when they were not able to pae such finance and ransomes as he demanded. Whereupon, being now put to death himselfe, his bodie was hanged vpon a tree that stood on an hill without the towne, on the which he had caused both husbandmen and townesmen, with other prisoners, to be hanged before time. His standard also, which was wont to be borne before him in battell, was set vp in the same tree. The bailiffe also of the towne, and two of the chiefe burgesses that had bene of counsell with him in his vnlawfull doings, were likewise executed. Also beside these, there were found in this towne diuerse that were accused to be guiltie of the duke of Burgognies death, wherefore they were put to their triall, in the parlement at Paris, and some of them being found guiltie, were executed.

When the deliuerie of the strong towne of Meaux was published thorough out the countie, all the townes and fortresses in the Ile of France, in Annois, in Brie, & in Champagne, yelded themselves to the king of England, which appointed in the same valiant captiues, and hardie soldiers. After that he had thus got possession of Meaux, and the other fortresses, he returned againe to Bois de Vincennes, and being there receiued of the king and queene of France, and of the queene his wife the thirtieth daie of Maie, being Whitsun euen, they remoued all together vnto Paris, where the king of England lodged in the castell of Loure, and the French king in the house of saint Paule. These two kings kept great estate with their queenes, at this high feast of Pentecost, but the king of Englands court greatlie exceded, so that all the resort was thither. The Parisiens that beheld his princelie port & high magnificence, iudged him rather an emperour than a king, and their owne king to be in respect of him like a duke or marquisse.

The roiall post of the B of England.

The Dolphin having knowledge by espials where the king of England and his power late, came with all his puissance ouer the riuer of Loire, and besieged Colneie, a towne situate vpon that riuer, a fix score miles distant from Paris, and appointed part of his armie to waste and destroye the confines of the duchie of Burgognie, to the intent to diuide the power of the king of England, from the strength of the duke of Burgognie, supposing (as it came to passe indeed) that the duke would make hast towards Burgognie, to defend his owne lands. In the meane time, they within Colneie were so hard handled, that they promised to render their towne to the Dolphin, if they were not rescued by the king of England within ten daies. King Henrie hearing these newes would not send anie one creature, but determined to go himselfe to the raising of that siege, and so with all diligence came to the towne of Corbeill, and so to Senlis, where (whether it were with heat of the aire, or that he with his daillie labour were feebled or weakened) he began to war sicke, yea and so sicke, that he was constrained to tarrie, and send his brother the duke of Bedford to rescue them of Colneie, which he did to his high honor. For the Dolphin hearing that the duke of Bedford was comming to raise his siege, departed thence into Berrie, to his great dishonor, and lesse gaine.

Colneie rescued by the Duke of Bedford.

About the same time, the duke of Britaine sent his chancelor the bishop of Maunts, with the bishop ofannes, and others of his counsell, as ambassadors from him vnto king Henrie, with full commission, to ratifie and allow for him and his people the peace concluded at Troies: but by reason of the kings grauous sicknesse, nothing was then done in that matter. Neuertheless, the duke himselfe in person came afterwards to Amiens, and there performed that which he had appointed his ambassadors at this time, in his name, to haue done and accomplished.

in the meane season, king Henrie waxed sicker and sicker, and so in an hour he was conveyed to Bois de Vincennes, to whom shortly after repared the dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, & the earles of Salisburie and Warwicke, whom the king lovingly welcomed, and seemed glad of their presence.

Now, when he saw them penitise for his sickness, and great danger of life wherein he presentlie laie, he with manie graue, courteous, and pitie words, recomforted them the best he could, and therewith exhorted them to be trustie and faithfull unto his sonne, and to see that he might be well and vertuouslie brought up. And as concerning the rule and gouernance of his realms, during the minoritye and yong yeares of his said sonne, he willed them to ioine together in friendlie loue and concord, keeping continuall peace and amitie with the duke of Burgognie, and neuer to make treatie with Charles that called himselfe Dolphin of France, by the which any part either of the crowne of France, or of the duchies of Bourbonie and Guien may be lessened or diminished; and further, that the duke of Cleuance, and the other princes should still remaine prisoners, till his sonne came to lawfull age, least returning home againe, they might kindle more fire in one daie than might be quenched in thre.

He further aduised them, that if they thought it necessarie, that it should be good to haue his brother Dumfreie duke of Gloucester to be protector of England, during the nonage of his sonne, and his brother the duke of Bedford, with the helpe of the duke of Burgognie to rule and to be regent of France, commanding him with fire and sword to persecute the Dolphin, till he had either brought him to reason and obedience, or else to drive and expell him out of the realme of France. And herewith he protested vnto them, that neither the ambitious desire to enlarge his dominions, neither to purchase vaine renowne and worldly fame, nor any other consideration had moued him to take the warres in hand; but onelie that in prosecuting his iust title, he might in the end attaine to a perfect peace, and come to enioie those pieces of his inheritance, which to him of right belonged: and that before the beginning of the same warres, he was fullie perswaded by men both wise and of great holinesse of life, that vpon such intent he might and ought both begin the same warres, and follow them, till he had brought them to an end ius-tie and rightlie, and that without all danger of Gods displeasure or perill of soule.

The noble men present, promised to obserue his precepts, and to performe his desires; but their hearts were so penitise, and replenished with sorow, that one could not for weeping behold an other. Then he said the seauen psalmes, and receiued the sacrament, and in saying the psalmes of the passion ended his daies here in this world, at Bois saint Vincent, the last of August, in the yeare a thousand foure hundred twentie and two. This Henrie was a king, of life without spot, a prince whom all men loued, and of none disdained, a captaine against whom fortune never frowned, nor mischance once spurned, whose people him so seuerely loved both loued and obedient (and so humane withall) that he left no offense unpunished, nor friendship unrewarded; a ferour to rebels, and suppressour of sedition, his vertues notable, his qualities most praise-worthy.

In strength and nimblenesse of bodie from his youth few to him comparable, for in wrestling, leaping, and running, no man well able to compare. In casting of great iron barres and heauie stones he excelled commonlie all men, neuer shrinking at cold, nor dothfull for heat; and when he most laboured, his head commonlie vnconquered; no more wearie of harnesse than a light cloake, berie ballantlie abiding at needs both hunger and thirst; so manfull of mind as neuer sene to quinch at a wound, or to smart at the paine; not to turne his nose from euill fauour, nor close his eyes from smoke or dust; no man more moderate in eating and drinking, with diet not delicate, but rather more meet for men of warre, than for princes or tender stomachs. Curie honest person was permitted to come to him, sitting at meale, where either secretlie or openlie to declare his mind.

High and weightie causes as well betwene men of warre and other he would gladielie heare, and either determined them himselfe, or else for end committed them to others. He slept verie little, but that verie soundlie, in so much that when his soldiers sang at nights, or minstrels plaied, he then slept fastest; of courage inuincible, of purpose immutable, so wisehardie alwaies, as feare was banisht from him; at euerie alarm he first in armor, and for most in ordering. In time of warre such was his providence, bountie and hap, as he had true intelligence, not one-lie what his enemies did, but what they said and intended: of his deuises and purposes few, before the thing was at the point to be done, should be made puiue.

He had such knowledge in ordering and guiding an armie, with such a gift to encourage his people, that the Frenchmen had constant opinion he could neuer be vanquished in battell. Such wit, such prudence, and such policie withall, that he neuer enter-prised any thing, before he had fullie debated and forecast all the maine chances that might happen, which done with all diligence and courage he set his purpose forward. What policie he had in finding present remedies for sudden mischeues, and what engines in sauing himselfe and his people in sharpe distresses: were it not that by his acts they did plainlie appeare, hard were it by words to make them crediblie. What an-tonnesse of life and thirst in auarice had he quite quenched in him; vertues in deed in such an estate of soueraintie, youth, and power, as verie rare, so right commendable in the highest degree. So staied of mind and countenance beside, that neuer iolie or triumphant for victorie, nor sad or damped for losse or misfortune. For bountifullnesse and liberalitie, no man more free, gentle, and franke, in bestowing rewards to all persons, according to their deserts: for his saying was, that he neuer desired monie to keepe, but to giue and spend.

Although that some properlie serues not for theme of praise or dispraise, yet what in breuitie may well be remembered, in truth would not be forgotten by doct, were it but onlie to remaine as a spectacle for magnanimitie to haue alwaies in eie, and for encouragement to nobles in honourable enterprises. Knownen be it therefore, of person and forme was this prince rightlie representing his herocall affects, of stature and proportion tall and manlie, rather leane than grosse, somewhat long necked and blacke haired, of countenance amiable, eloquent and graue was his speech, and of great grace and power to perswade: for conclusion, a matelie was he that both liued & died a paterne in princehood, a lode-starre in honour, and mirrour of magnificence: the more highlie exalted in his life, the more deepe lie lamented at his death, and famous to the world alwaies. Peter Bassett (a chefe man in his chamber) affirmed that he deceased of a pleurisie, though the Scots and French set it downe to be of saint Feacres disease, that they saie was a palse with a crampe, which Enguerant reports to be saint Anthonies fire, but neither of them trulie.

person, adorned with robes, diadem, scepter, & ball, like a king; the which chariot, six horses drew richlie trapped, with severall appointments; the first with the armes of S. George, the second with the armes of Poimandrie, the third of king Arthur, the fourth of saint Edward, the fift of France, and the sixt with the armes of England and France. On this same chariot gaue attendance James II. of Scots, the principall mourner, king Henries uncle Thomas duke of Glesster, Richard earle of Marlowe, the earle of March Edmund, the earle of Stafford Humfrie, the earle of Powtaigne Edmund Beaufort, the lord Fitz Hugh Henrie, the lord Hungerford Walter, sir Robert Robert lord Bourchier, sir John Cornwall lord Fanhope, and the lord Crum-well were the other mourners. The lord Louell, the lord Ancelet, the lord Pooleie, the lord Soluch bare the baners of saints and anowies, as then they were called; the baron of Dupleie bare the standard, and the earle of Longuile the baner. The hadments were caried onelic by capteins to the number of twelue; and round about the chariot rode fine hundred men of armes all in blacke armour, their horses barbed blacke, and they with the but ends of their speares upwards.

The conduct of his dolorous funerall was committed to sir William Philip, treasuro: of the kings household, and to sir William Porter, his chiefe caruer, and others. Beside this, on euerie side of the chariot went three hundred persons, holding long topches, & lords bearing baners, banners, and penons.
With this funerall appointment was he conueied from Bois de Vincennes, to Paris, and so to Rome, to Avuile, to Calis, to Dover, from thence thorough London to Westminster, where he was interred with such solempne ceremonies, mourning of lords, prayer of priests, and such lamenting of commonis, as neuer before then the like was seene in England.
Shortlie after this solempne burfall, his sorrowfull quene returne into England, and kept hir estate with the young king hir sonne.

Thus ended this puiant prince his most noble and fortunate reigne, whose life (saith Hall) though cruell Atropos abbreviated; yet neither fire, malice, nor stetting time shall appall his honour, nor blot out the glozie of him that in so small time had done so manie and roiall acts. [In this yeare, the one and twentith of October deceased the gentle and welbeloued Charles French king the first of that name, who was baried at S. Denis.] So that betwene the death of these two kings, namely the one of England, the other of France, there was no great space of time; sith Charles departed in October, and Henrie in August: by the mutation of whose lines, which of the two reabines seemes the greater losse, it is a question not to be discused. Certaine it is that they were both soveraigns tenderlie loved of their subiects, as they were princes greatlie favouring their people. Finally, in memorie of this Henrie the fift, a king of a roiall hart, and euerie waie indued with imperiall vertues, I find so fit a report concerning in truth both his properties and disposition, that I thinke it beste conuenient here to be inserted in place of an epitaph;

Henrici illustris properans mors occupat actus;

Ille sua patria decus immortale per aevum Penturum, virtutis & indelebile lumen, Celsa animo prorsus, leni quoque pectore cines Non solum, at iustos hostes fideique probata Dilexit, nunc raro iracundior ore.

Of learned men and writers, these I find remembered by Bale and others, to have lived in the daies of this noble and valiant king Henrie the fift. First, Alaine de Lin, bozne in Lin, and professed a Carmelite frier in that towne, he at length became prior of that convent, proceeded docto: of divinitie in Cambridge, and wrote manie treatises; Thomas Otterbozne that wrote an historie of England, is thought to live about this season, he was a Franciscan o: grate frier, as they called them, a great student both in divinitie and philosophie; John Seguard an excellent poet, and a rhetorician, kept a scholl, and read to his scholers in Forwich, as is supposed, writing sundry treatises, reprovving as well the profaning of the christian religion in monks and priests, as the abuse of poetrie in those that took upon them to write filthy verses and rimes; Robert Rose a frier of the Carmelites order in Forwich commonlie called the white friers, both an excellent philosopher, and divine, proceeded docto: at Drenford, promoted to be prior of his house, and writing diverse treatises; amongst all the sophists of his time (as saith Bale) he offended none of the Wickhevissts, who in that season set forth purelie the word of God, as maie appeare by his woorkes.

Moreover, John Lucke, a docto: of divinitie in Drenford, a lye enemy to the Wickhevissts; Richard Caister bozne in Forfolke, vicar of saint Stephens in Forwich, a man of great holinesse and puritie in life, favouring (though secretlie) the doctrine of the Wickhevissts, and reprovving in his sermons, the unchast manners and filthy example that appeared in the cleargie. Of sir John Wiccastell lord Cobham ye have heard before; William Walleis a blacke frier in Lin, and provinciall of his order here in England, made a booke of moralizations upon Ouids Me-tamorphoseis, comparable to poissie upon Aescops Fables; Richard Snettham, a student in Drenford, where he professed to greatlie in learning and wis-dome, that he was accounted the chiefe in all that universitie, in respect whereof he was made chancellor of the same, chosen also to be one of the twelve to examine and iudge upon Wickhevissts doctrine by the archbishop of Canturburie; John Langdene a monke of Chiches church in Canturburie, an other of those twelve; William Tallo: a priest, and a master of art in Drenford, a stedfast follower of Wickhevissts doctrine, & burnt for the same in Smithfield at London, the second day of March, in the yeare of our Lord 1422, & last of king Henrie the fift his reigne.

Furthermore, Richard Cradale student in Drenford, one of those twelve also; William Lindwood a labourer excellentlie learned, as well in the civil as canon lawes, advanced to the service of this king, and made by him keeper of the privie seale, sent in ambassage both to the kings of Spaine and Portingale, about businesse of most weightie importance. It is said that he was promoted to the bishop-rike of saint David; Bartholomew Flozarius, supposed (as Bale saith) by Nicholas Biggam, to be an Englishman, wrote a treatise called Florarium, whereof he took his surname; and also an other treatise of abstinence, in which he reproveth certaine corrupt manners in the cleargie, and the profession of friers mendicants; Adam Weimelington, a Carmelite frier, studied both in Drenford and Paris; William Batecombe is placed by Bale about the time of other learned men that lived in this kings time, he was an excellent mathematician, as by the Lord Crum-

well.

Titus Livius de Foro Luuifis liued also in these daies, an Italian bozne: but sith he was both resliant here, and wrote the life of this king, I haue thought good to place him among other of our English writers. One there was that translated the said hystorie into English, adding (as it were by waie of notes in manie places of that booke) sundrie things for the more large understanding of the hystorie: a copie 10 thereof I haue sene belonging to Iohn Stow citizen of London. There was also about the same time an other writer, who (as I remember) hath followed the said Livius in the order of his booke, as it were chapter for chapter, onelie changing a good, familiar and easie stile, which the said Livius bled, into a certaine poeticall kind of writing: a copie whereof I haue sene (& in the life of this king partlie followed) belonging to master Iohn Twine of Kent, who (as I was informed) meant to leaue to posteritie some fruits of his labours for the due understanding thereof.

Henrie the sixt, sonne and heire to Henrie the fift.

Bodleian lib. 10.

After that death had bereft the world of that noble prince king Henrie the fift, his onelie sonne prince Henrie, being of the age of nine monethes, or thereabouts, with the sound of trumpets was openlie proclaimed king of England and France 20 the thirtieth daie of August, by the name of Henrie the fift; in the yeare of the world five thousand, three hundred, eightie and nine, after the birth of our Saviour 1422, about the twelue yeare of the emperor Frederike the third, the fortieth and two and last of Charles the first, and the third yeare of Spordaks regimēt (after his father Robert) gouernour of Scotland. The custodie of this yong prince was appointed to Thomas duke of Orcester, & to Henrie Beauford 30 bishop of Winchester. The duke of Bedford was deputed regent of France, and the duke of Gloucester was ordeined protectour of England; who taking vpon him that office, called to him wise and graue counsellors, by whose aduise he provided and took order as well for the good gouernment of the realme & subiects of the same at home, as also for the maintenance of the warres abroad, and further conquest to be made in France, appointing valiant and expert capteins, which should be readie, when need required. Besides this, he gathered great summes of 40 monie to mainteine men of warre, and lest nothing for gotten that might aduance the good estate of the realme.

While these things were a doing in England, the duke of Bedford regent of France studied most carefully, not onelie to keepe and well order the countreies by king Henrie late conquered; but also determined not to leaue off warre & trauell, till Charles the Dolphin (which was now adide, because king Charles his father in the moneth of October in this present yeare was departed to God) should either be subdued, or brought to obediēce. And suerlie the death of this king Charles caused alterations in France. For a great manie of the nobilitie, which before, either for feare of the English puissance, or for the loue of this king Charles (whose authoritie they followed) held on the English part, did now reuolt to the Dolphin, with all indeuour to vtur the English nation out of the French territories. Whereunto they were the more earnestlie bent, and thought it a thing of greater facilitie, because of king Henriess yong yeares; & thome (because he was a child) they esteemed not, but with one consent reuolted from their sworne fealtie: as the recorder of the Englishmens battels with forren nations verie aptlie doth note, saieing:

Hic Franci puerum regem neglectum habentes Desisunt, violatque fidem gens perfida sacro Consilio ante datum.

The duke of Bedford being greatlie moued with these sudden changes, fortified his towne both with garrisons of men, munition, and battels, assembled also a great armie of Englishmen and Normans, and so effectuallie exhorted them to continue faithfull to their liege and lawfull lord yong king Henrie, that manie of the French capteins willinglie sware to king Henrie fealtie and obediēce, by whose example the communalitie did the same. Thus the people quieted, and the countreie established in order, nothing was minded but warre, and nothing spoken of but conquest.

The Dolphin which lay the same time in the citie of Poitiers, after his fathers deceasse, caused himselfe to be proclaimed king of France, by the name of Charles the seuenth: and in good hope forreconier his patrimonie, with an haughty courage preparing war, assembled a great armie: and first the warre began by light skirmishes, but after it grew into maine battels. The Dolphin thinking not to lose any occasion sions of well doing, sent the lord Granile to the towne of Pont Meulan, standing on the riuier of Seine, who comming to the same vpon the sudden, the fourteenth of Januarie, toke it, and slew a great number of English souldiours, which he found within it.

Lord Granile
falsified his oth.

When the duke of Bedford the regent, aduertised of this sudden surprise, appointed the lord Thomas Montacute earle of Salisburie (a man both for policie and courage, liker to the old Romans than to men of his daies) accompanied with the earle of Suffolke, the lord Scales, the young lord Poinings, sir John Fastolfe maister of the household, with himselfe, and diuerse others, to besiege the said towne of Pont Meulan, which after two moneths siege was rendred to the said earle, and the lord Granile swore to be true to the king of England euer after that day: but shortly after, forgetting his oth, he turned French againe.

The earle of Salisburie appointed sir Henrie Portimer, and sir Richard Vernon, captiues of the towne, and from thence went into Champaigne, and there besieged the towne of Sens, toke it, and sir William Mar in the captiue within it, and slew all the souldiours that kept it, made captiues there sir Hugh Coddington, sir Richard Aubemond. ¶ In this season, Henrie duke of Glocester, either striken in loue, or vpon some other occasion, married the ladie Jaquet or Jaquelin, daughter and sole heire to William of Barier duke of Holland, which was lawfull wife to John duke of Brabant then liuing, who afterwards (as after ye shall heare) recovered hir out of the dukes hands.

Affinitie an
friendship.

The chances thus happening (as you before haue heard) John duke of Bedford, Philip duke of Burgonie, and John duke of Britaine made a frendlie meeting in the citie of Amiens, where they renewed the old league and ancient amitie made betwene the noble prince king Henrie the sixt and them, adding thereto these conditions and agreements, ech of them to be to the other friend and aider; and the enemie of the one to be enemie to the other; and all they to be friends and aiders to the king of England, welwiller to his welwillers, and aduersarie to his aduersaries. And (because that affinitie is commonlie the band of amitie) there was concluded a marriage betwene the duke of Bedford, and the ladie Anne sister to the duke of Burgonie, which was after solemnized at Trois in Champaigne, in the presence of the duke of Burgonie brother to the bride, and of his uncle the duke of Brabant, the earles of Salisburie and Suffolke, and of nine hundred lords, knights, and esquiers, with such feast and triumph, as before that time had not bene seene of the Burgognions.

Whilist these matters were in hand, the Parisiens, thinking to blind the eyes of the duke of Bedford, wrote to him how diuerse castles and fortresses lieng about their territories, were replenished with their enemies, dastie stopping their passages, and robbing their merchants, to their utter vndowing, if they by his helpe were not relieved. But this was but a glose of the Parisiens, meaning to cause him to go about the winning of some strong hold, whilist they in his absence might bring into the citie Charles the Dolphin, that then called himselfe French king; for so had they appointed, assigning to him the date of his comming and the post of his entrie. But their practice being discovered to the duke of Bedford, he with a great power entered into Paris, one daie before the faine was appointed, a two nights before he was looked for of his enemies being vnprovided, and suddenly caused the conspirators within the citie to be apprehended, and openlie to be put to execution.

This done, putting a mistrust in the Parisiens, he caused the castles and fortresses nere and adjoining to the citie, to be furnished with Englishmen. And to auoid all night-watchers about Paris, and the confines thereof, he first toke into his possession either by assault or coruption, the towne of Trainelle and Bzaie vpon Seine. And because two castles, the one called Pacie, and the other Courlaie were also, vniuersall neighbors to the Parisiens, he sent sir John Fastolfe great maister of his household with a notable armie to win the same castles; which he did, and with preie and prisoners returned backe againe to his maister the regent.

In this verie season, the Dolphin sent the lord William Steward earle of Buchquane that was constable of France, and the earle of Ventadour in Auvergne, and manie other noble men of his part, to late siege to the towne of Crauant in the countie of Aurerre, within the parts of Burgonie. Wherof hearing the lord regent, and the duke of Burgonie they assembled a great armie, and appointed the earle of Salisburie to haue the guiding thereof; who with his captiues and men of warre, English and Burgognions, came in god arraie to giue battell to the besiegers. And because the riuier of Yonne, which runneth by the said towne, was betwene the English armie, and their aduersaries, they could not well assault their enemies, which defended the bankes and passages verie stronglie: yet notwithstanding, both horsemen and footmen of the English part courageously put themselves into the riuier, and with fine force recovered the banke, whome the Burgognions incontinentlie followed.

The English
armie carried the river and winning the banke.

When they were all gotten into the plaine, the archers shot, the bill men strake, and long was the fight in doubtfull balance. But in conclusion the French men not able to resist the force of the English nation, were discomfited, slaine, and chased, leauing a glorious victorie to the Englishmen and Burgognions. There were slaine of the Frenchmen an eightiaine hundred knights and esquiers, beside commons: of Scots nere hand three thousand. Amongest the Frenchmen these were chiefest that were slaine: the earle of Aleslake, the earle of Comigens, the earle of Connoire, the lord Coquart de Comeron, the bastard of Arminake, the vicount of Touraine, the bastard of Forrestes, the lord de Port, and the lord Amozancie.

After this fortunate victorie was the earle of Salisburie made (by the lord regent) lieutenant and viceroy for the king and the said lord regent in the countie of France, Brie, and Champaigne; and sir John Fastolfe was substituted deputie vnder the lord regent within the duchie of Normandie on this side the riuier of Seine; and withall he was also made gouernour of the countie of Anjou and spaine. The earle of Salisburie after five moneths siege, won by surrender the towne and castell of Montaguillon in Brie; the captiues wherof, the one named Regent of Cotinie, and Guille Bourgois Britons, were nener to beare armour against the Englishmen on this side the river of Loire. In the meane time of that siege, the earle of Suffolke took by force the castell of Coucie, and the strong castell of la Roch in Gasconnois he got by appointment.

In this second yeare of king Henrie the first, James (the first of that name & the hundred & second k. of Scotland, toke to wife the ladie Jane, daughter to John earle of Summerfet deceased, and sister to John then duke of Summerfet, and also coline germane remoued to king Henrie, and nexte to the duke of Winchester, and to the duke of Excester) was led at libertie, couenancing to paie a small portion of monie more than was allowed to him for his wiues marriage monie, and lest hostages for the same. But before his departure out of the realme, he did his homage vnto the young king of England Henrie the first at the castell of Windsor, before three dukes, two archbishops, twelue earles, ten bishops, twentie barons, and two hundred knights and esquires, besides others, in order of wordes according to the tenour hereafter following.

The formall recognisance or acknowledgement of the said homage.

I James Steward, k. of Scots, shall be true and faithfull vnto you lord Henrie by the grace of God king of England & France, the noble and superiour lord of the kingdome of Scotland; and to you I make my fidelitie for the same kingdome of Scotland, which I hold and claime of you; and I shall beare you my faith and fidelitie of life and lim, and worldie honour against all men; and faithfullie I shall knowledg and shall do you seruice due for the kingdome of Scotland aforesaid. So God helpe me, and these holie euangelists.

But notwithstanding this his oath, and the great bounteous liberalitie of the mother & vncles of his wife, in bestowing on him abundance of plate & treasure, with rich clothes of arras; he had not bene long at home, but that some out of France into Scotland ouer came there James Steward, who (after manie of the Scottish nobilitie by diuerse occasions in France consumed) grew to be capteine of the horsemen there. With him came the archbishop of Remes with power and commission for concluding a league betwene France and Scotland, and also of a marriage betwene Lewis the Dolphin sonne and Margaret Jameses daughter, though both verie yong. Which matters accordinglie accomplished, to France againe they got them. So James became as firme French as any of his predecessours.

But now to leaue the Scottish king amongst his countreimen in Scotland, and returne to the doings of England. I find that the duke of Glocester, being protector and gouernour of the realme, prepared an armie of ten thousand men, and sent them ouer to his brother the regent into France; who comming into the territarie of Paris, were tofallie of him rescued. About the same time the Frenchmen got by stealth diuerse townes out of the Englishmens hands, and amongst other the faire towne of Compiene was one, and the pretie towne of Crotoie another. When the duke of Bedford was aduertised hereof, he determined not to let the matter passe in such sort, but with all conuenient speed sent forth a force to recover those townes againe. And first the earle of Suffolke with the earle of Lignie, and diuerse other capteins of the Englishmen went to besiege Compiene, and lodged on the one side of the river of Sozame, as the lord Lisle Abham, sir Thomas Hampson, and the prouost of Paris laie on the other side. The Frenchmen within the towne well furnished with good souldiers, munition, and vittels, couragiously defended themselves.

The Englishmen remembryng that Guiliam Remond, otherwise called Mariolaine had ben the leader of the souldiers within the towne (which Mariolaine before a while was taken prisoner by sir John Falstolfe) caused him to be brought from Paris vnto the campe, and set him in a chariot with an halter about his necke, and conueied him to the gibbet without the towne, sending word to them within, that if they would not without delaie render the towne, their capteine should incontinentlie be strangled afore their faces. Which moued the souldiers so much, by reason of the loue they bare to their old capteine and gouernour, that for the deliuerance of him and partlie of themselves they yelded the towne, so that both he and they might depart with honoure and harnesse onelie in sure conduct and safetie. Yet per this towne of Compiene was deliuered, sir Philip Hall, which was sent to Crotoie by the lord regent with eight hundred men to besiege it, got it suddenly by assault, & the Frenchmen had either disposed their garrison, or appointed their lodgings.

About the same time sir John de la Pole brother to the duke of Suffolke, being capteine of Auranches in Normandie, assembled all the garrisons of the base marches of the countrie of Anion, and came before the citie of Angiers, burnt the suburbs, spoiled and destroyed the whole countrie; and hauing as manie prisoners as his men might go awaite with, he was encountered by the earle of Aumarie, the viscount of Parbonne, and sir Honland Frenchmen; which finding the Englishmen out of araie, incumbered with carriage of their great spoile, suddenly set on them, gaue them the overthrow, slue three hundred and toke manie prisoners; as the said sir John de la Pole, sir John Bassett, John Aulfort lieutenant of Saleise, John Clifton, Henrie Portimer, and other to the number of six hundred.

But though the Frenchmen got here in this place, they went not awaite with like gaine in another: for the bassard de la Baulme, and the lord Craignar capteins of Courallou, with a great band made rode into Gasconnois, whom by chance Mattheu Cough and other Englishmen, which were also abroad in the countrie, met and encountred. There was a sore fight betwene the parties, being of courage and number in maner equall. But after long confid, the Frenchmen almost all were slaine and taken, and the bassard being well horsed, fled; after whome followed vpon the spurres, Mattheu Cough chasing him euen to his castell gate, and there toke him: for the which act he was much praised of the erle of Salisbury (to whom he presented the said bassard) and had not onelie the rights giuen him that belonged to the prisoner, but also was rewarded with a goodlie courser at the earles hands.

About this season, Arthur brother to John duke of Britaine, commonlie called the earle of Richmond, hauing neither profit of the name, nor of the countrie, notwithstanding that king Henrie the first had created him earle of Paris in Normandie, and gaue him not onelie a great pensio, but also the whole profits of the same towne of Paris; yet now, because that the duke his brother was returned to the part of the Dolphin, he likewise revolting from the English obediace, came to the Dolphin to assisters, and there offered himselfe to serue him, whom the

the Dolphin gladly accepted, resolling more thereof, than if he had gained an hundred thousand crownes: for the Britons within the towne of Purie, hearing that their maister was joined with the Dolphin, kept both the towne and castell against the duke of Bedford, furnishing it daily with new men and munition.

The lord regent advertised hereof, raised an armie of Englishmen and Normans, to the number of eightene hundred men of armes, and eight thousand archers and other. He had in his companie the earles of Salisburie and Suffolke, the lords Seales, Willoughbie, and Pointings, sir Reginald Graie, sir John Fastolfe, sir John Saluaine, sir Lancelot Lisle, sir Philip Hall, sir John Dathleie, sir John Greie, sir Thomas Blunt, sir Robert Harling, sir William Oldhall, and manie other, both knights and esquiers, with whom he came before the towne of Purie, which was well defended, till they within perceived themselves in danger, by reason of a mine which the Englishmen made, whereupon they yielded the towne. But the captaine of the castell would not presently render the place, howbeit they promised to deliuer it, if the same were not rescued at a day assigned by the Dolphin or his power.

Upon this promise, hostages were deliuered into the possession of the lord regent, by whose licence an herald was sent to the Dolphin, to aduertise him of the time determined; who understanding the distresse of his friends, incontinentlie sent John duke of Alanson, as his lieutenant generall, the erle Douglas, whom at their setting forth he made duke of Touraine, and the erle Buchquhane as then constable of France, the erls of Aumarle, Montadoure, Connerre, Paulicourier, and Forests, the vicounts of Harborne and Tonars, the lords of Craulle, Gawles, Palicourne, Pannie, Ballaie, Fountains, Pontfort, and manie other noble knights and esquiers, to the number of fiftene thousand Frenchmen & Britons, besides five thousand Scots, whom the erle Douglas had but latelie transported out of Scotland.

This roiall armie approached within two miles of Purie. But when the duke of Alanson understood by such as he had sent to view the conduct of the Englishmen, that he could not get anye aduantage by assailing them (although the Dolphin had giuen him strict commandement to fight with the regent) he retired backe with his whole armie to the towne of Verneuil in Perch, that belonged to the king of England; sending word to the garrison, that he had discomfited the English armie, and that the regent with a small number with him by swiftnesse of horse had saved himselfe. The inhabitants of Verneuil, giuing to light credit hereunto received the duke of Alanson with all his armie into the towne.

In the meane time came the date of the rescue of Purie, which for want thereof was deliuered to the duke of Bedford by the captaine called Gerard de la Pallier, who presenting unto the duke of Bedford the keys of the castell, shewed him a letter also signed and sealed with the hands and seales of eightene great lords, who the date before promised by the tenour of the same letter to giue the duke battell, and to raise the siege. Well (said the duke) if their hearts would haue serued, their puissance was sufficient once to haue proffered, or to haue performed this faithfull promise: but sith they disdain to seeke me, God and saint George willing, I shall not desist to followe the tract of their hostes till one part of vs be by battell ouerthrowne. And herewith he sent forth the earle of Suffolke with six hundred horsemen, to espie the doings of the Frenchmen, and where they were lodged. The earle riding forth, passsed by Dampulle, and came to Verneuil, where he heard certeine newes where the Frenchmen had gotten Verneuil, and remained there still.

These newes he sent by post vnto the duke of Bedford, the which incontinentlie vpon that aduertisement set forthward in great hast towards his enemies. The Frenchmen hearing of his comming, set their people in arraie, and made all one maine battell without fore ward or reer ward; and appointed foure hundred horsemen, Lombards and others to breake the arraie of the Englishmen, either behind, or at the sides, of the which was captaine sir Stephan de Minolles, called the Hire. The duke of Bedford likewise made one entier battell, and suffered no man to be on horsebacke, and set the archers (euerie one hauing a sharpe stake) both on the front of the battell, and also on the sides, like wings. And behind were all their hostes tied together, either by the reins or by the talles, with the carts and carriages, to the defense whereof were two thousand archers appointed.

Herewith either part being come almost to the joining, the duke of Alanson, on the one side, exhorted his people to plaie the men, declaring vnto them, that the conclusion of this battell should either deliuer them out of vile seruitude, or place them in the hale of bondage. On the other side, the duke of Bedford, to encourage his men, willed them to remember how oft they had suborned those their aduersaries in battell (with whom they should now cope) for the most part, euere being the lesse number against the greater. Againe, he declared how necessarie it was to fame the bold attempts of the presumptuous Dolphin now in the beginning, least if the fire were suffered further to burne, it must haue need of the more water to quench it.

Manie words he uttered, to put them in hope of good successe and victorie. But scarce had he ended his exhortation, when the Englishmen rushed forth, and boldly set on their enemies, crying; saint George, a Bedford, a Bedford; and the Frenchmen likewise cried Pontioy saint Denis. Then began the battell right fierce on both sides, continuing for the space of three houres in doubtfull balance, fortune the winging hir selfe so equall, that no eye could iudge to whether part she was more fauourable. But at length, after that those foure hundred horsemen, which were appointed, as ye haue hard, to breake the arraie of the Englishmen, had passed thorough on the one side vnto the place where the carriages and hostes stood, and could not passe further, by reason of the fierce shot of the English bowes, they falling to the spoile made a hand, and therewith departed. Those archers then that were appointed to keepe the carriages, being now at libertie, came forthward, and so fiercelie shot at the thickest prease of their enemies fighting on foot, that in the end they were not able longer to indure, but were bozne downe by fine force, and so banquished.

This battell was fought the eight and twentieth of August, in the yeare of our Lord a thousand foure hundred twentieth and foure, in the which battell were slaine of the Frenchmen the earles of Aumarle, Montadour, Forest, Paris, the lords Craulle, Gawles, Fountains, Ambois, Tonars, Pontenue, Combrisse, Brunell, Tumble, and Poisse, beside three hundred knights. The vicount Harborne was hanged on a gibbet, because he was one of the murderers of the duke of Burgognie. Of Scots also were slaine, Archembald earle Douglas, that was made (as before is mentioned) duke of Touraine, James Douglas sonne to the said Archembald earle of Winton, John earle of Boughen newlie made constable of France, sir Alexander Speldin, sir Henrie Balglaue, sir John Sterling, William of Pomelston, sir James Craic, sir Robert Handen, sir Alexander I. insale, sir Robert Steuward, sir Robert Swinton, and seauen and twentie hundred Scots of name and armes, beside others.

So that in this battell were slaine by report of Montjoy king at armes in France, and the English haralos there present, of Frenchmen & Scots nine thousand and seauen hundred: and of Englishmen one and twentie hundred, but no man of name, saving five young esquiers. And there were taken prisoners, John duke of Alanson, the bastard of Alanson, the lord of Faicet, the lord of Hozmit, sir Piers Harrison, sir Lois de Gaucourt, sir Robert Wyllset, sir John Turnebull a Scot, and two hundred gentlemen, beside common soldiers. The Frenchmen within Vernouil, seeing the Dolphins armie thus overthrowne, deliuered the towne to the regent, their liues saued. Then was sir Philip Hall appointed capteine there, and the lord regent returned, and came to Rone, and after to Paris.

The Dolphin that called himselfe king of France, was sore appalled with the overthrow of his armie: for he was driven out of all the countries in manner, that appertained to the crowne of France, & might resort to none except to Bourbonois, Aluergne, Berry, Poitou, Touraine, a part of Anjou, and Langue doc: yet to shew himselfe as king, he erected his court of parlement, his chancerie, & all other courts in the cite of Poitiers, and there established his great seale, with all due circumstances thereto appertaining: where he continued fouretee peares together, and then was removed to Paris, after he had got that cite, and expelled the Englishmen, as after shall appeare.

The duke of Bedford lieng at Paris, sent the lord Scales, sir John Montgomerie, sir John Fastolfe, with two thousand men to winne the countries of Anjou, and Maine, unto whom were rendred without assault, the strong castels of Beaumont le Vicount, Tennes, Sillie, Mice, Courcieriers, Roussie, Blaise, Coustemenant, and twentie other, which I doe here passe over. Such was then the opinion conceived of the English puissance, so oft tried, proued, and preuailing, that the Frenchmen thought the Englishmen would haue all which they wished for, or wrought for.

The earle of Salisburie, with the said lord Scales, and the other capitaine before named, were appointed with an armie of ten thousand men, to besiege the rich and strong cite of Mans, the chiefe cite of all the countrie of Maine; whither when they came, they made their approches, and planted their batterie to the walls, so that with the shot of their great peeces (which kind of engins before that time had not bene much sene nor heard of in France) the cite was within a few daies despoiled of all his towers and outward defences. The citizens and soldiers, perceiving in what danger they stood, & knowing not how to remedie the matter, offered the towne vpon this condition, that all persons which would fauour within the towne, might abide; and all that would depart with horse and harneis onelie, should be permitted: which offers were accepted, and the towne rendered, whereof the earle made capteine the earle of Suffolke, and his lieutenant sir John Fastolfe.

After this, the earle of Salisburie besieged the faire towne of Saint Susan, whereof was capteine one Ambrose de Lere, a right valiant chiefe. The earle caused the towne to be assaulted at his first comming to it: but he lost more than he gained, and therefore left off his assaults, and caused a trench to be cast about the towne, and so planted his batterie, by force whereof he overthrew the walles, in such sort that the capteine offered for himselfe and his soldis ers 2000000 crownes, so that they might depart in their doublets onelie, which summe (because winter approached) was accepted, and the towne yeldeo. Of this towne sir John Popham was made capteine. Then the erle went to Maine la Roche, which towne after five weekes siege was yeldeo, and appointed to the keeping of sir John Montgomerie, knight.

After the feast of the Purification of our ladie, the earle of Salisburie besieged the castell de la Fert Barnard, during which siege a sale was made of the towne of Alanson being in the Englishmens possession, by a Gascoigne that was one of the garrison there. But this sale being opened to the erle of Salisburie by the same Gascoigne at the daie appointed, the lord Willoughbie and sir John Fastolfe, with two thousand men were sent to encounter with the buiers of that towne; so that when Charles de Williers chiefe merchant of this wate, came earlie in a morning with two hundred horsemen, and three hundred footmen, and approached the towne, abiding for the Gascoigne, yet he was aware, the Englishmen had compassed him and his companie round about, and setting vpon the Frenchmen, slue and toke all the whole number of them, saue Peter Danthenazie and five and twentie other, which by the swiftnesse of their horses saued themselves.

After this conflict, the lord Willoughbie returned to the earle of Salisburie, lieng still at siege before the towne de la Fert Barnard, which shortly after was rendered by into the erle of Salisburies hands, to whome the lord regent gaue it, to inioie to him and his heires for euer. Beside this, the said earle partlie by assalt, & partlie by composition toke diuers other, as Saint Hales; where he made capteine Richard Gethin esquier; Chancraur Lermilage, where he made gouernour Matthew Cough; Querland, of the which he assigned ruler John Banaster; Halcorne, whereof he made capteine William Glasdale esquier; Lille Soub; Boulton, whereof was made capteine sir Lancelot Lile knight; Loupelland, whereof was made capteine Henrie Branch; Pontseur, of the which was made capteine sir William Oldhall knight; la Suze was assigned to the keeping of John Suffolke, esquier. And besides this, a boue fortie castels and piles were overthrowne and destroyed. The newes hereof reported in England, caused great reioicing among the people, not onelie for the conquest of so manie townes & fortresses, but also for that it had pleased God to giue them victorie in a pitched field: whereof generall processions were appointed, to render vnto God humble thanks for his fauour so bestowed vpon them.

This peare after Easter, the king called a parlement at Westminster, by aduise of the peeres; and comming to the parlement house himselfe, he was conueied through the cite vpon a great courser, with great triumph, the people flocking into the streets to behold the child, whome they iudged to haue the liuelie image and countenance of his father, and like to succedd him, and be his heire in all princelie qualities, martiall policies, and morall vertues, aswell as in his realmes, seignories and dominions. In this parlement was granted to the king a subside of sixelue pence the pound, towards the maintenance of his warres, of all merchandize, comming in or going out of the realme, as well of Englishmen as strangers.

During which parlement, came to London Peter duke of Burmye, sonne to the king of Portugal, counsiller germane removed to the king; which of the duke of Excester and the bishop of Winchester his vnckles was highlie sealed, he was also elected into the order of the garter. of that name (which long time had bene restrained from his libertie, and finally toward lane) deceased without issue, whose inheritance descended to the lord Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to Richard earle of Cambridge, beheaded (as before ye haue heard) at the towne of Southampton. In the time of this parlement also was sir John Mortimer confined to the same earle, either for desert or malice, atteinted of treason, and put to execution, of whose death no small slander arose amongst the common people.

After all these things done in England and in France, Humfreie duke of Gloucester, who had married the ladie Jaquet, or Jaqueline of Bauler, countesse of Heinault, Holland, and Zeland (notwithstanding the was coupled in marriage afore to John duke of Brabant, as yet living, and had continued with him a long space) passed now the sea with the said ladie, and went to Mons or Bergen in Heinault, where the more part of the people of that countrie came and submitted themselves unto him, as to their soveraigne lord, in right of his said wife, the ladie Jaquet or Jaqueline: with which doing hir former husband was greatly moved. And likewise the duke of Burgognie, being great friend to the same duke of Brabant, was much offended: who of old familiarity wrote lovinglie to the duke of Gloucester, requiring him to reforme himselfe according to reason, and to forsake his ungodlie life, both in keeping of an other mans wife, and also in seeking to usurpe other mens rights and titles.

Hereupon went letters betwixt them for a time, but at length when the duke of Burgognie perceived that the duke of Gloucester meant to mainteine his interest, & to make warre against the duke of Brabant; he took part with the duke of Brabant so earnestlie, that he consented to fight with the duke of Gloucester bodie to bodie within lists in defense of the duke of Brabants quarrell, and further aided the duke of Brabant in his warres against the duke of Gloucester, with all his puissance, in somuch that in the end (after the duke of Gloucesters returne into England) the duke of Brabant recovered all the towne in Heinault, with the ladie Jaquet or Jaqueline held against him. And further the same ladie was by composition delivered by them of the towne of Mons unto the duke of Burgognie; who caused hir to be conveyed unto Cant, from thence she made shift to escape into Holland, where she was obeyed as countesse of the countrie.

Then made the warre in hir owne defense against the dukes of Burgognie and Brabant, who sought to spoile hir of all hir towne and lands: but they procured pope Martin the first (before whom the matter was) to give sentence that the first matrimonie with the duke of Brabant was good, and the second with the duke of Gloucester to be unlawfull. But in the meane time, the lord Fitz Walter was sent over to the aid of the ladie Jaquet or Jaquelin, with a power of Englishmen, landed in Zeland, nere unto the towne of Zierie, against whom came the duke of Burgognie, and encountering with them and other such Hollanders and Zelanders, as were joined with them, nere to a place called Brielwers haven, there discomfited them; so that of English, Hollanders, and Zelanders, with the said lord Fitz Walter, were slain seven or eight hundred, and the residue chased to the water. At length, when the duke of Gloucester understood the sentence pronounced against him by the pope, he began to wax wearie of his wife the said ladie Jaquet, by whom he never had profit, but losse, and took in a second marriage Cleane Cobham, daughter to the lord Cobham of Steverotow, which before (as the same went) was his soveraigne paramour, to his slander and dishonour.

A little before this time, sir Thomas Rampton, sir Philip Branch, sir Nicholas Burdet, and other Englishmen, to the number of five hundred men of warre, repaired and fortified the towne of St. James de Beuron, situate on the frontiers of Normandie towards Britaine, within halfe a league of the duke of Britains ground, with whom as then they had open warre; and so began to do many displeasures to his people. Whereupon Arthur earle of Richmond and Purie, brother to the said duke, and lately before created constable of France, assembled an huge power of men to the number of forty thousand (as some haue written) and with the same came before the said towne of St. James de Beuron, and planted his siege verie stronglie about it, enforcing with his great ordinance to overthrow the walls. And one day amongst other, he determined to give the assault, and so did, the which continued a long space verie hot and earnest.

The Britons Britonants were come downe into a low bottom, where there was a little pond or fishpoule, and they must needs passe by a streit waie to come to the wallles in great danger. On that side of the towne was a little bulwourke, which sir Nicholas Burdet kept, having with him a forty or eighty fighting men: and over against the same bulwourke there was a gate well furnished also with English souldiers; so that the Britons which came downe to the ditches in great number to give the assault, heard on either side them the Englishmen (within the said bulwourke and gate) make a great noise, in crieng Salisburie and Suffolke; with the which crie the Britons being marvellously astonished, began to recoil in great disorder. And therewith the said sir Nicholas Burdet issued forth upon them, and pursuing them right valiantlie, slew them downe, so that there died of them what by the sword, and what by drowning in the said pole, about seven thousand or eight hundred, and to the number of fiftie were taken prisoners. And beside this, those Englishmen gained eightene standards and one baner.

Incontinentlie the newes hereof were reported to the constable of France, who was buie at the assault on the other side of the towne, whereof he was sore displeased, and no lesse amazed; so that he caused the retreat to be sounded, for all the siege on that side toward the pole was already raised. After this, upon counsell taken amongst the Frenchmen, it was determined that they should dislodge: and so about the middle of the next night, the constable and all the residue of his people departed toward Fougiers, leaving behind them great plenty of artillerie both great and small, with vicinals, and all their other provisions: as fourteen great guns and forty barrells of powder, three hundred pipes of wine, two hundred pipes of biscuit and flower, two hundred fralles of figs and raisins, and five hundred barrells of herrings.

Somewhat before this season fell a great division in the realme of England, which of a sparkle was like to have grown to a great flame. For whether the bishop of Winchester called Henrie Beaufort, sonne to John duke of Lancaster by his third wife, envied the authoritie of Humfreie duke of Gloucester, protector of the realme; or whether the duke disdained at the riches and pompous estate of the bishop: sure it is that the whole realme was troubled with them and their partakers: so that the citizens of London were faine to keepe daile and nightlie watches, and to shut up their shops for feare of that which was doubted to have ensued of their assembling of people about them. toe eight times in one daie betwene the two parties, and so the matter was staied for a time. But the bishop of Winchester, to cleere himselfe of blame so farre as he might, and to charge his nephew the lord protectour with all the fault, wrote a letter to the regent of France, the tenor whereof insueth.

The bishop of Winchesters letter

Right high and mightie prince, and my right noble, and after one, lieuest lord, I recommend me vnto you with all my hart. And as you desire the welfare of the king our soueraigne lord, and of his realmes of England and France, your owne health, and ours also: so haue you hither. For by my truth, if you tarie, we shall put this land in aduenture with a field; such a brother you haue here, God make him a good man. For your wisdom knoweth, that the profit of France standeth in the welfare of England, &c. Written in great hast on Allhalowen euen. By your true seruant to my lues end, Henrie Winchester.

The duke of Bedford being sore graued and disquieted with these newes, constituted the earle of Marlowe, which was latelie come into France with six thousand men, his lieutenant in the French dominions, and in the duchie of Normandie; and so with a small companie, he with the duchesse his wife returned againe ouer the seas into England, and the tenth daie of Januarie he was with all solemnitie receiued into London, to whome the citizens gaue a paire of basins of silver and gilt, and a thousand markes in monie. Then from London he rode to Westminster, and was lodged in the kings palace. The five and twentieth daie of March after his comming to London, a parlement began at the towne of Leicester; where the duke of Bedford openly rebuked the lords in generall, because that they in the time of warre, thorough their priue malice and inward grudge, had almost moued the people to warre and commotion, in which time all men ought to should be of one mind, hart, and consent: requiring them to defend, serue, & deade their soueraigne lord king Henrie, in performing his conquest in France, which was in manner brought to conclusion. In this parlement the duke of Gloucester laide certein articles to the bishop of Winchester his charge, the which with the answers hereafter do inue; as followeth.

The articles of accusation and accord betwene the lord of Gloucester, and the lord of Winchester.

Articles set forth by the lord of Gloucester, against Henrie bishop of Winchester.

Here insueth the articles, as the kings counsell hath conceived, the which the high and mightie prince my lord of Gloucester hath surmised vpon my lord of Winchester chancelour of England, with the answer to the same.

1 First, whereas he being protectour, and defendour of this land, desired the Towre to be opened to him, and to lodge him therein; Richard Woodville esquier (hauing at that time the charge of the keeping of the Towre) refused his desire, and kept the same Towre against him vndolie and against reason, by the commandement of my said lord of Winchester; and afterward in aprouing of the said refusal, he receiued the said Woodville, and cherished him against the state and worthip of the king, and of my said lord of Gloucester.

2 Item, my said lord of Winchester, without the aduise and assent of my said lord of Gloucester, or of the kings counsell, purposed and disposed him to set hand on the kings person, and to haue remoued him from Eltham, the place that he was in, to 10 Windsor, to the intent to put him in gouernance as him list.

3 Item, that where my said lord of Gloucester (to whome of all persons that should be in the land, by the waie of nature and birth, it belongeth to see the gouernance of the kings person) informed of the said vndue purpose of my said lord of Winchester, declared in the article next abovesaid, and in letting thereof, determining to haue gone to Eltham vnto the king to haue provided as the cause required: my said 20 lord of Winchester vnturle, and against the kings peace, to the intent to trouble my said lord of Gloucester going to the king, purposing his death, in case that he had gone that waie, set men of armes and archers at the end of London bridge next Southwike: and in forbarring of the kings high waie, let brail the chaine of the stoupes there, and set vp pipes and hurdes in manner and forme of bulwarks: and set men in chambers, cellars, & windowes, with bolues and arrowes and other weapons, to the intent to 30 bring small destruction to my said lord of Gloucesters person, as well as of those that then should come with him.

4 Item, my said lord of Gloucester saith and affirmeth, that our soueraigne lord his brother that was king Henrie the sixt, told him on a time, when our soueraigne lord being prince was lodged in the palace of Westminster in the great chamber, by the noile of a spaniell, there was on a night a man spied and taken behind a tapet of the said chamber, the which 40 man was deliuered to the earle of Arundell to be examined vpon the cause of his being there at that time; the which so examined, at that time confessed that he was there by the stirring and procuring of my said lord of Winchester, ordeined to haue slaine the said prince there in his bed: wherefore the said earle of Arundell let sacke him forthwith, and departed him in the Thames.

5 Item, our soueraigne lord that was king Henrie the sixt, said vnto my said lord of Gloucester, that his father king Henrie the fourth lining, and visited then greatlie with sicknesse by the hand of God, my said lord of Winchester said vnto the king (Henrie the sixt then being prince) that the king his father so visited with sicknesse was not personable, & therfore not disposed to come in conuersation and gouernance of the people; and for so much, counselled him to take the gouernance and crowne of this land vpon 50 him.

The answer of the bishop.

Here insue the answers to the accusations made by my lord of Winchester chancelour of England, vnto the causes and matters of heauinesse, declared in the articles against him by my lord of Gloucester.

1 First, as of the refusal made vnto my lord of Gloucester, of opening the Towre to him, of his lodging therein, by the commandement of my said lord of Winchester; he answereth, that in the presence of my said lord of Gloucester before his comming out of his countrie of Heinault, for causes such as were thought resonable, it seemeth lawfull that the Towre should haue bene notable stozed and kept with

tels: howe: if it was not forthwith executed, and that in likewise after that my said lord of Glocester, was gone into his said countrie of Heinaut, for seditions and odious billes and languages, cast and vsed in the cite of London, founding of insurrection and rebellion against the kings peace, and destruction of well of diuerse estates of this land, as strangers being vnder the defense, in so much that in doubt thereof, strangers in great number fled the land. And for the more sure keeping of the said Tower, Richard Modulle esquier so trusted with our souereigne lord the king that dead is (as well ye know) & also chamberlaine and counsellor vnto my lord of Bedford, with a certeine number of defensible persons assigned vnto him, was made deputie there by the assent of the kings counsell, being that time at London, for to abide therein, for the safegard thereof; and stricte charged by the said counsell, that during that time of his said charge, he should not suffer any man to be in the Tower stronger than himselfe, without speciall charge or commandement of the king by the aduise of his counsell.

2 Item, that some after (vpon the comming of my said lord of Glocester into this land from his countrie of Heinaut) the said lords of the kings counsell were informed, that my said lord of Glocester grudged with the said maner of enforcing the Tower, and let saie to them of London, that he had well vnderstand that they had bene heauilie threatened for the time of his absence, and other wise than they shuld haue bene, if he had bene in this land. Wherefore he was right euill contented, and especiallie of the said forcing of the Tower, set vpon them in manner of a chafed villain, considering the good equitie and truth that they had alwaies kept vnto the king, offering them there vpon remedie if they would.

3 Item, that after this, Richard Scot lieutenant of the Tower, by the commandement of my said lord of Glocester, brought vnto him frier Randolp, the which had long before confessed treason done by him against the kings person that dead is, for the which knowlege he was put to be kept in the said Tower, & stricte commanded vnder great paine giuen vnto the said Scot, to keepe him stricte & suerlie, & not to let him out of the said Tower without commandement of the king by aduise of his counsell. The which frier Randolp, my said lord of Glocester kept then with himselfe (not witting to the said Scot) as he declared to my said lord of Winchester, some after that he had brought the said frier Randolp to my lord of Glocester; saieing to my lord of Winchester, that he was vndone but he helped him, & expressed, as for cause of the withholding of frier Randolp; and saieing moreover, that when he desired of my said lord of Glocester, the deliuerance of the said frier Randolp, to lead him againe vnto the Tower, or sufficient warrant for his discharge: my said lord of Glocester answered him, that his commandement was sufficient warrant and discharge for him. In the which thing abovesaid, it was thought to my lord of Winchester, that my said lord of Glocester toke vpon him further than his authoritie stretched vnto, and caused him to doubt and dread, least that he would haue proceeded further. And at such time as the said Modulle came vnto him, to aske his aduise and counsell, of lodging my said lord of Glocester in the Tower; he aduised and charged him, that before he suffered my said lord of Glocester, or any person to lodge therein stronger than himselfe, he should procure him a sufficient warrant therof, of the king, by the aduise of his counsell.

4 Item, as to the said article of the foresaid causes of heauinesse, my said lord chancelor answereth, that he neuer purposed to set hand on the kings person, nor to remoue him, or that he should be removed, or put in any manner of governance, but by the aduise of the kings counsell. For he could not perceive any manner of godnesse or of auantage that might haue growne to him thereof, but rather great perill and charge; and hereof my said lord of Winchester is readie to make pfooe, in time and place conuenient.

5 Item, as to the third article of the foresaid causes and heauines, my said lord chancelor answereth, that he was oft and diuerse times warned, by diuerse credible persons, aswell at the time of the kings last parlement, holden at Westminster, as before and since, that my said lord of Glocester purposed him bodilie harme, & was warned therof, and counselled by the said persons, and that diuerse times, to abstaine him from comming to Westminster, as my said lord of Winchester declared vnto my said lord of Glocester.

6 Item, that in the time of the said parlement, diuerse persons of low estate of the cite of London, in great number assembled on a day vpon the wharfe, at the crane of the vinetree, and wished and desired that they had there the person of my lord of Winchester, saieing, that they would haue thowen him into the Thames, to haue taught him to swim with swins. Whereof billes and language of slander and threatnings were cast and spoken in the said cite by my said lord the chancelor, which caused him to suppose that they that so said and did, willed and desired his destruction, although they had no cause.

7 Item, that after the comming to London of sir Rafe Botiller, and master Letwes, sent from my lord of Bedford, to the rest of the lords of the counsell, they being informed, that my said lord of Glocester did beare displeasure to my said lord of Winchester, they came to the said lord of Glocester to his In, the second sundaie next before All hallondate, and there opened vnto him, that they had knowledge and vnderstanding of the said displeasure, praieing him to let them know if he bare such displeasure against my said lord of Winchester, and also the causes thereof. At the which time (as my said lord of Winchester was afterwards informed) my said lord of Glocester affirmed that he was heauie toward him, and not without causes that peraduenture he would put in writing.

8 Item, that after the mondaie next before All hallondate last past in the night, the people of the said cite of London, by the commandement of my said lord of Glocester, as it was said (for what cause my lord the chancelor wist not) assembled in the cite, armed and arraid, and so continued all the night. Amongst diuerse of the which (the same night by what excitacion, my said lord the chancelor wist not) seditions and heauie language was vsed, and in especiall against the person of my lord the chancelor. And so the same mondaie at night, my said lord of Glocester sent vnto the In of court at London, charging them of the court dwelling in the same, to be with him vpon the moztow at eight of the clocke in their best arraie.

9 Item, that on the moztow being tuesday next following, my said lord of Glocester sent earlie vnto the maior and aldermen of the said cite of London, to ordeine him to the number of three hundred persons on horse backe, to accompanie him vnto such a place as he disposed him to ride, which (as it was said) was vnto the king, to the intent to haue his person, and to remoue him from the place that he was in, without assent or aduise of the kings counsell. The which thing was thought vnto my said lord the chancelor, that he ought in no wise to haue done, nor had not bene seene so before.

Frier Randolp.

Item, that my said lord the chancelloz, considering the things aboue said, and doubting therefore of perils that might haue ensued thereof, intending to purueie there against, and namelie for his owne suertie and defense, according to the law of nature, ordeined to let, that no force of people should come on the brdge of London towards him, by the which he or his might haue bene endangered or noied, not intending in any wise bodilie harme vnto my said lord of Glocester, nor to any other person, but onelie his owne defense, in eschewing the perill abouesaid.

Item, as toward the fourth and fift of the said articles, my lord the chancelloz answereth, that he was euer true to all those that were his soueraigne lords and reigned vpon him, and that he neuer purposed treason or vnturth against any of their persons, and in especiall against the person of our said soueraigne lord Henrie the sixt. The which considering the great wisdom, truth, and manhood that all men knole in him, he would not for the time that he was king, haue set on my said lord the chancelloz so great trust as he did, if he had found or thought in him such vnturth. The which thing my said lord the chancelloz offered to declare and shew, as it belongeth to a man of his estate to do, requiring ther vpon my lord of Bedford and all the lords spirituall and temporall in this parlement, that it might be seene that there were iudges conuenient in this case, that they would do him right, or else that he might haue leaue of the king by their aduise to go sue his right, before him that ought to be his iudge.

And as toward the letter sent by my lord of Winchester vnto my lord of Bedford, of the which the tenor is before rehearsed, of the which my lord of Glocester complained him of the malicious and vnture purpose of my said lord of Winchester, as toward the assembling of the people, and gathering of a field in the kings land, in troubling thereof, and against the kings peace: my said lord of Winchester answereth, that if his said letters duellie vnderstand, and in such wise as he vnderstood and meant in the writing of them, it maie not reasonable be gathered and taken, that my said lord of Winchester intended to gather any field, or assemble people in troubling of the kings land, and against the kings peace, but rather purposed to acquite him to the king in his truth, and to keepe the rest and peace in the kings land, and to eschew rebellion, disobedience and all trouble. For by that that in the beginning of the said letter, he calleth my said lord of Bedford his lieuell lord after one, that is the king, whome he ought to accept of dutie of his truth, the which he hath euer kept, and will keepe.

Moreover, in the said letter he desireth the coming home of my lord of Bedford, for the welfare of the king and of his realmes of England and of France, which stand principallie in keeping of his rest and peace, and praieth my said lord of Bedford to speed his coming into England, in eschewing of leuypardie of the land, and of a field, which he dread him might haue followed if he had long taried. As toward those words: If ye tarie, we shall put this land in aduenture with a field, such a brother ye haue here, &c. My said lord of Winchester saith, the soth is: before or he wrote the said letter, by the occasion of certaine ordinances made by the maior and aldermen of London against the excessive taking of masons, carpenters, tilers, plasserers, and other labourers for their daileie tourmes, and approued by the kings devise and counsell, there were cast manie heauines and seditious billes vnder the names of such labourers, theatning rising with manie thousands, and menacing of estates of the land, and likewise seditious and euill language spoken and so continued and libelle to haue ensued, of purpose and intent of disobedience and rebellon. To the redressing of which, it seemed to my lord the chancelloz, that my said lord of Glocester did not his indeuour nor diligence that he might haue shewed. For lacke of which diligence, they that were disposed to do disobedience were incouraged & emboloned, so that it was like, that they should haue made a gathering, and that the king and his true subiects should haue bene compelled to haue made a field to haue withstand them; the which field making, had bene aduenturing of this land, and in tokening that it was neuer my said lord chancellozs intent, to gather no field, but as truth most stirred him against such as riotouslie would make such assembling against our soueraigne lord, and the weale of this land, he desired so hastilie the coming of my said lord of Bedford: the which he would in no wise haue so greatlie desired, if he would haue purposed him vnto any unlawfull making of a field; for he wist well, that my said lord of Bedford would most sharplie haue chastised and punished all those, that so would make any riotous assembling.

When this answer was made, the duke caused this writing following openlie to be proclaimed.

It knowne to all folkes, that it is the intent of my lord of Bedford, and all the lords spirituall & temporall, assembled in this present parlement, to acquite him and them, and to proceed truelie, iustlie, and indifferently, without any parcialitie in any manner of matter or quarels, moued or to be moued betwene my lord of Glocester on that one partie, & my lord of Winchester chancelloz of England on that other partie. And for suer keeping of the kings peace it is accorded by my said lord of Bedford, & by my said lords spirituall and temporall, an oth to be made in forme as followeth, that is to saie.

The oth of the lords.

That my said lord of Bedford, and my said lords, spirituall and temporall, and ech of them shall (as far forth as their cunninges and discretions suffice) truelie, iustlie, and indifferently counsell and aduise the king, and also proceed and acquit themselves in all the said matters, and quarels, without that they or any of them shall prouilie and apertlie make or shew himselfe to be partie or parciall therein, not leauing or eschewing so to do for affection, loue, meed, doubt, or dread of any person or persons. And that they shall in all wise keepe secret all that shall be commoned by waie of counsell, in the matters and quarels abouesaid, in the said parlement, without that they or any of them shall by word, writing of the king, or in any wise open or discover it to any of the said parties, or to any other person that is not of the said counsell: but if he haue a speciall commandement or leaue thereto of the king or my said lord of Bedford. And that ech of them shall with all his might and power, assist by waie of counsell, or else shew it vnto the king, my lord of Bedford, and to the rest of my said lords to put the said parties to reason; and not to suffer that any of the said parties by them, or by their assistance, proceed or attempt by way of fight against the kings peace; nor helpe, assist, or comfort any of them thereto: but let them with all their might and power withstand them, and assist vnto the king, and my said lord of Bedford, in keeping of the kings peace, and redressing all such manner of proceeding by waite of fight or force.

Albons not swoyne because he was not present, which oth in manner and forme above rehearsed, all the lords a swell spirituall as tempozall, being in this parlement at Leicester assembled, the fourth day of March, promised upon their faith, dutie, and allegiance, which they owe to the king their souereigne lord, true lie to obserue and keepe, according to the true meaning and purport of the same.

The arbitrement.

IN the name of God Amen. We Henrie archbishop of Canturburie, Thomas duke of Excester, John duke of Norfolk, Thomas bishop of Duresme, Philip bishop of Worcester, John bishop of Bath, Humfrie earle of Stafford, William Alnwickie keeper of the kings priue seale, Kase lord Cromwell, arbitrators in all manner of causes, matters and quarrels of heavinesses & greivances, with all incidents, circumstances, dependents, or conneres being and hanging betwene the high & worthie prince Humfrie duke of Glocester on the one partie, and the worshipfull father in God Henrie bishop of Winchester and chancellor of England on the other partie, by either of them, for the peasing of the said quarrels and debates taken and chosen in manner and forme as it is contained more plainlie in a compromise made thereupon, of the which the tenor insueth in this forme.

Anno Reg. 4.

Memorandum, the seauenth daie of March in the fourth yeare of our souereigne lord the king, Henrie the sixt, the high and mightie prince Humfrie duke of Glocester at the reuerence of God, and for the god of the king our souereigne lord in this land, & name lie at the reuerence, and especiallie at the request and praier of the mightie and high prince my lord of Bedford his brother, agreed him to put, and putteth all manner matters and quarrels indeed, with all their incidents, circumstances, dependents and conneres that touchen him and his person, that he hath in anie wise do, or seeleth himselfe greued or heauie against my lord his uncle, my lord of Winchester: or else that my lord of Winchester findeth him agreued against him, in as much as they touch him or his person from the beginning of the world unto this daie, in the aduise, ordinance and arbitrement of the worshipfull father in God, Henrie archbishop of Canturburie, the high and noble prince Thomas duke of Excester, and John duke of Norfolk, the worshipfull father in God Thomas bishop of Duresme, Philip bishop of Worcester, John bishop of Bath, the noble lord Humfrie earle of Stafford, the worshipfull persons maister William Alnwickie keeper of the kings priue seale, and Kase lord Cromwell, promising and beighting by the faith of his bodie, & words of his princehood and kings sonne, to do, keepe, obserue, and fulfill for him and his behalfe, all that shall be declared, ordeined, and arbitrated, by the foresaid archbishop, dukes, bishops, earle, keeper of the priue seale, and lord Cromwell in all matters and quarrels abovesaid.

Granting also and promising ouer that, to be comprehended in the foresaid arbitrement, as toward putting awaie all heavinesses and displeasures, in anie wise contained, by my lord of Glocester against all those that haue in anie wise assisted, counselled, or fauoured vnto his said uncle of Winchester, and as toward anie matters that be touching my lord of Glocester, remitteth it, and the gouernance thereof vnto the king & his counsell, they to deme it by the aduise of his counsell, as him thinketh it to be done. In witness of the which thing to this present compromise my said lord of Glocester hath subscribed his name with his owne hand: Humfrie Glocester. And in like forme my lord of Winchester in another compromise hath subscribed with his owne hand vnder the word of his priesthood, to stand at the aduise, ordinance, & arbitrement of the persons abovesaid, Mutatis mutandis.

A decree or order taken by the kings counsell for the pacifying of the quarrels & variances that were betwene the duke of Glocester, and the bishop of Winchester.

The causes aforesaid and quarrels by vs seene, heard, and diligentlie examined and decreed, by the assent of the said parties, ordeine and atward, that my lords of Glocester, and of Winchester, for any thing done or spoken, by that one partie against that other, or by anie of theirs, or anie other person or persons, afove the seuenth daie of this present moneth of March, neuer hereafter take causes, quarrels, displeasures, or heavinesses, that one against the other, ne neither against the counsellors, adherents, or fauourers of that other for anie thing or things that are past. And that my said lord of Glocester be good lord to my said lord of Winchester, & haue him in loue and affection as his kinsman & uncle. And that my said lord of Winchester haue to my said lord of Glocester true and sad loue and affection, do and be ready to do him such service as apperteineth of honestie to my said lord of Winchester and his estate to do. And that each of them be good lord vnto all those adherents, counsellors, and fauourers of that other, and shew them at all times fauourable loue and affection, as for anie thing by them done or said, before the seauenth daie of March.

And we decree, ordeine, and atward, that my said lord of Winchester, in the presence of the king our souereigne lord, my lord of Bedford, and my lord of Glocester, and the residue of the lords spirituall and tempozall, and commons being in this present parlement, saie and declare in manner and forme that foloweth: My souereigne lord, I haue well vnderstand, that I am noised among the states of your land, hold that the king our souereigne lord that was, at that time being prince, and lodged in the great chamber at Westminster, by the basing of a spaniel, there was on a night taken behind a tapet in the same chamber, a man, that should haue confessed, that he was there by mine excitation and procuring, to haue slaine the foresaid prince there in his bed; whereupon he was sacked, and forthwith also drowned in the Thames.

Furthermore, I am accused, how that I should have stirred the king that last died, the time also that he was prince, to have taken the gouernance of this realme, and the crowne vpon him, his father liuing the same time, being king. Although which language and noising, I feele my name and fame greatlie emblessed in diuerse mens opinions. Wherevpon, I take first God to my witnes, and after all the world, that I haue bene at all times, and am true louer, and true man, to you my souereigne lord, and shall be all my life. And also, I haue bene to my souereigne lord that was your father, all the time of his reigne, true man, and so such he toke me, trusted me and cherished me to his liues end; and as I trust, no man will affirme the contrarie, nor neuer in my life procuring nor imagining death nor destruction of his person, ne assenting to any such thing, or like thereto, the time that he was king or prince, or else in other state.

I was likewise true man to king Henrie the fourth, all the time that he was my souereigne lord, and reigned vpon me. In which matters, in all manner of wise that it liketh to you my souereigne lord for to command me, I am readie for to declare me: and furthermore, where, how, and when it shall like you, by the aduise of your counsell, to assigne me. Wherefore I beseech you my souereigne lord, as humble as I can, considering that there is no grounded process, by the which I might lawfullie in these matters abovesaid, be conuicted (blessed be God) to hold me, and declare me, by the aduise of all the lords, spirituall and temporall, being in this present parlement, true man to you my souereigne lord, and so to haue bene vnto my souereigne lords that were your father and grandfather, and true man also to haue bene at all times to your said father whilst he was prince, or else in any other estate, the said slander and noise notwithstanding, and this same declaration to be inacted in this your said present parlement.

The which words declared in manner as it is abouesaid, it seemeth to my said lords the arbitrators, that it is meet, that my said lord of Winchester shoulde him apart, and in the meane time, the lords being present, be singularlie examined therevpon, and saie their aduise. And if it be assented by them, in manner as my said lord of Winchester desireth, let him be called againe, and that then my lord of Bedford haue these words in effect that follow: Faire vncle, the king my lord by the aduise of his counsell, hath commanded me to saie to you, that he hath well vnderstand and considered all the matters which ye haue here openlie declared in his presence, and therevpon ye desire a petition, that he will declare you, and by the aduise and assent of the lords spirituall and temporall, being in this present parlement, he declareth you a true man to him, and that ye haue so bene to my lord his father, and grandfather, also true man to my lord his father while he was prince, or else in any other estate, the said slander and noising notwithstanding, and will that the said declaration be so inacted in this present parlement.

After the which words thus said (as before is declared) it was decreed also by the said lords arbitrators, that the said lord of Winchester shoulde haue these words that follow vnto my said lord of Gloucester: My lord of Gloucester, I haue conceiued to my great heavinesse, that ye should haue receiued by diuerse reports, that I should haue purposed and imagined against your person, hono<sup>r</sup>, and estate, in diuers manners, for the which, ye haue taken against me great displeasure: Sir, I take God to my witnesse, that what reports so ever haue bene to you of me, peradventure of such as haue had no great affection to me, God forgive it them, I neuer imagined, ne purposed any thing that might be hindring or prejudice to your person, hono<sup>r</sup>, or estate: and therefore I praise you, that ye be vnto me good lord from this time forth; for by my will, I gaue neuer other occasion, nor purpose not to doe hereafter by the grace of God. The which words so by him said, it was decreed by the same arbitrators, that my lord of Gloucester, shoulde answer and saie: Faire vncle, sith ye declare you such a man, as ye saie, I am right glad that it is so, and for such a man I take you. And when this was done, it was decreed by the same arbitrators, that euery each of my lord of Gloucester, and Winchester, shoulde take either other by the hand, in the presence of the king and all the parlement, in signe and token of good loue & accord, the which was done, and the parlement adioined till after Easter.

At this reconciliation, such as loued peace reioiced (sith it is a fowle & pernicious thing for priuat men, much more for noblemen to be at variance, sith vpon them depend manie in affections diuerse, whereby factions might grow to the shedding of blood) though others, to whom contention & hartgrudge is delight, wished to see the bittermost mischance that might therof insue, which is the bitter ouerthrow and desolation of populous tribes, even as with a little sparkle whole houses are manie times consumed to ashes; as the old proverbe saith, and that berie true and aptlie;

But when the great fier of this difference betwene these two noble personages, was thus by the arbitrators (to their knowledge and iudgement) utterlie quenched out, and laid vnder wood; all other controuersies betwene other lords, taking part with the one partie or the other, were appeased, and brought to concord, so that for soj the king caused a solemne feast to be kept on Whitsundae; on which daie he created Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to the erle of Cambridge (whome his father at Southampton had put to death, as before ye haue heard) duke of Yorke, not foreseeing that this preferment shoulde be his destruction, nor that his seed shoulde of his generation be the extreame end and finall conclusion. The same daie also promoted John lord Mowbray, and earle marshall, sonne and heire to Thomas duke of Norfolk (by king Richard the second exiled this realme) to the title, name, and stile of duke of Norfolk.

During this feast, the duke of Bedford adioined the king with the high order of knightood, vnto on the same daie dubbed with the sword these knights, whose names insue: Richard duke of Yorke, John duke of Norfolk; the earle of Westmerland, Henrie lord Perrie, John lord Butler, sonne to the earle of Dymond, the lord Kosse, the lord Spatrawers, the lord Welles, the lord Barkelie, sir James Butler, sir Henrie Greie of Tankarville, sir John Talbot, sir Rafe Greie of Marke, sir Robert Wære, sir Richard Greie, sir Edmund Hungerford, sir Walter Wingfield, sir John Butler, sir Reginald Cobham, sir John Walsheleu, sir Thomas Tunstall, sir John Chedocke, sir Rafe Langstre, sir William Durie, sir William ap Thomas, sir Richard Carnonell, sir Richard Woodville, sir John Shirdlow, sir Nicholas Blunket, sir William Cheine iustice, sir William Wabington, sir Rafe Butler, sir Robert Beauchampe, sir Edmund Trafford, sir John June these baron, and diuerse others.

After this solemne feast ended, a great aid and subsidie was granted for the continuance of the conquest in France, and so therevpon monie was gathered, and men were prepared in euery citie, towne, and countrie. During which businesse, Thomas duke of Excester, great vncle to the king, a right sage and discreet counsellor, departed out of this mortall life, at his manor of Crane wich, and with all funerall pompe was conueyed through London to Wexham, and there buried. ¶ In the same yeare also died the ladie Elizabeth, halfe sister to the same duke, and of the whole bloud with king Henrie the fourth, married first to the lord John Holland, duke of Excester, and after to the lord Janhope, buried at the blacke friers of London.

Philip Morgan after the death of John Fortham (sometime treasurer of England, bishop of Elie and Durham, both which bishopricks, for anie thing that I can yet see, he inioined both at one time) was made bishop of Elie in the yeare of our redemption 1425, in this lord Henrie the first and manie of the nobilitie had written to the convent of the church of Elie, to chose William Alnetwicke (doctor of both lawes confessor to the king and keeper of the priue seale) to be their bishop. Notwithstanding which (they having more regard to their owne priuileges and benefit) chose Peter the prior of Elie to succeed in the place of John Fortham. But none of both these inioined that roine; for Martin bishop of Rome (stepping into the matter to make the third part, neither fauouring the kings motion nor approving the monks election) remoued this William Morgan from the see of Worcester into Elie, sometime called Helir: as I haue scene it set downe in Saron characters in an ancient booke of the liues of saints written in the Saron tong, about the yeare of Christ 1010, before the time of Edward the confessor, and much about the time of Albo Floracensis. This Morgan sat at Elie nine yeares, twentie and six weeks, and foure daies, departing his life in his manour of Hatfield, in the yeare 1434, and was buried at the Charterhouse of London; being the twentie and fourth bishop that was installed in that place.]

John Winter.

While these things were thus a doing in England, the earle of Marlowe, lieutenant for the regent in France, entered into the countrie of Maine, & besieged the towne of Chateau de Loire, the which shoulde to him was rendered, whereof he made captaine Matthew Cough, esquier. After this, he took by assault the castell of Paiet, and gaue it for his valiantesse to John Winter esquier, and after that he conquered the castell of Lude, and made there captaine William Cladesdale gentleman. Here he was informed, that the Frenchmen were assembled in the countrie of Beauce, whereupon he halsted thitherwards to haue giuen them battell, but they having knowledge of his approach, durst not abide to trie the matter with him by a pight field, but fled before he came nere them.

The earle of Marlowe made gouernour
of the young king.

Anno Reg. 5.

The earle in his returne toan the castell of Pont-dublean by surrender; where he left the valiant lord Willoughbie, and then returned to Paris. During which season, he was ordeined by the three estates of the realme of England, to be gouernour of the young king in the place of the duke of Excester deceased: howbeit, he did not as yet returne into England, but remained in France for a season, and atchiued manie worthe enterprisses. Whilste the lord regent of France was thus in England, meanes was made by the duke of Burgonie, for the deliuerie of the duke of Alanson, taken at the battell of Veruole, and now for the summe of two hundred thousand crownes he was set at libertie; but he would not by anie meanes acknowledge the king of England to be his liege and souereigne lord.

After that the duke of Bedford had set all things in good order in England, he took leave of the king, and together with his wife returned into France, first landing at Calis, where the bishop of Winchester (that also passed the seas with him) received the habit, hat, and dignitie of a cardinal, with all ceremonies to it appertaining: which promotion, the late a. right deeplie perding into the unrestrainable ambitious mind of the man, that euen from his youth was euer to cheeke at the highest: and also right well ascertained with what intollerable pride his head should soone be swollen under such a hat: did therefore all his life long keepe this prelat backe from that presumptuous estate. But now the king being young and the regent his friend, he obtained his purpose, to his great profit, and the impouerishing of the spiritualitie of his realme. For by a bull legantine, which he purchased from Rome, he gathered so much treasure, that no man in manner had monie but he: so that he was called the rich cardinal of Winchester.

After that the lord regent was arrived in France, the lord of Ruffinian, marshall of Britaine, assembled a great companie of the British nation, which fortified and repared the towne of Pontorion: and after, the said marshall, with a thousand men, entered into the countrie of Constantine, and coming before the towne of Arranches, was encountered by the Englishmen of that garrison; & after long fight, his people were put to the worse, chased, and discomfited, and he himselfe taken prisoner in the field. The duke of Bedford, hearing that the towne of Pontorion, situate within two leagues of Pont Saint Michael, was newlie fortified, and stronglie defended, sent thither the earle of Marlowe, accompanied with the lord Scales, and other valiant captains and souldiers, to the number of seauen thousand men, to besiege the towne; who so inuironed it on euerie side, that no man could scale neither in nor out.

The siege thus long continuing, bittels began to war scant in the English armie: wherefore the lord Scales, hauing in his companie sir John Harpeleite bailiffe of Constantine, sir William Bearton bailiffe of Caen, sir Rafe Tesson, sir John Carbonell, and three thousand good men of warre, departed from the siege to get bittels, powder, and other things necessary for their purpose. And as they were returning with their carriages by the sea coast, nere to Saint Michaels Mount, they suddenly were encountered by their enemies, whereof were cheefe, the baron of Coloses, the lord Dauleboff, captaine of the said Mount, the lord Mountabon, the lord Pontbarchier, the lord of Chateaugiron, the lord of Tintignat, the lord of Chateaubrian, with six thousand men of warre.

The lord Scales and his companie, perceiving themselves beset on the one side with the sea, & on the other with their enemies, alighted from their horses, and like couragious persons, there in an vnpeakeable furie, set on their enemies. The fight was fierce & cruell. The Englishmen kept themselves close together; so that their enemies could get no aduantage of them. At the last, the lord Scales cried so, George they flee. Whereupon, the Englishmen took such courage, and the Frenchmen that fought before, were so dismayed, that they began to flee in deed. The Englishmen leaped on horse-backe, and followed them so, that they slew and took aboue eleven hundred persons, among the which were taken the baron of Coloses, the vicount of Rone, and others. The lord of Chateaugiron, with a Scottish captaine, & diuers other men of name were slaine. After this victorie, the lord Scales with his bittels, prouision, and prisoners, returned to the siege, where he was of the earle and other noble men to ioullie receiued.

Whilste the siege continued thus before Pontorion, Christopher Hanlon, and other souldiers of the garrison of Saint Sulan, made a rode into the countrie of Aniou, and came to a castell called Ramfort, which castell was so prussie scaled, that the capteine within, and his companie, were taken or slaine, before they knew of their enemies approaching. When know ledge hereof was given vnto the Frenchmen which were assembled, to the number of twentie thousand, to raise the siege that late before Pontorson, they left that enterprize, and went to recover the said castell of Hamfort, and so comming before it, planted their siege so on each side of it, that at length by composition the Englishmen within, doubting to be taken by force, rendered by the castell, hauing libertie to depart with bag and baggage.

Shortlie after, the lord of Rais, calling himselfe lieutenant generall for the Dolphin, entred into Spaine with an armie of three thousand men, and by force toke the castell of Alalicorne, wherof was capteine an Englishman, one Oliuer Obwaterbie. In like maner, they toke the little castell of Lude, and therein William Blackbozne, lieutenant for William Glafdale squier. After this, the Frenchmen returned backe to the Dolphin, and kept not on their iourneie to Pontorson, for that they understood by espials, that the earle of Marlowe, and the Englishmen there, determined to giue them battell, if they once attempted to raise the siege. They within the towne, being sicke and besieged, perceiving no likelihood of succours, and seeing the English armie daile increase, fell to treatie for doubt to be taken by force, and so rendered the towne vpon condition, that they might depart with horse and harnesse onelie. Which being granted to them, the erle like a valiant capteine entred into the towne, and there appointed for gouernours, the lord Ros, and the lord Talbot, and leaving there a conuenient garrison, returned to the lord regent.

After the taking of this towne of Pontorson, there was a league and treatie concluded betwene the regent and the duke of Britaine; by the articles of which agreement, the townes of Pontorson and saint James de Beuron were beaten downe to the ground and rased. When the lord of Rais was departed out of Spaine (as ye haue heard) Christopher Barton, Philip Cough, Martin Godfre, called the Decker, toke by stealth the castell of saint Laurence de Portiers. At the same time, when the capteine and the most part of his companie were gone forth to heare masse, in a church ouer against the same castell, and keeping themselves close, till the capteine returned, they toke him as he was entred within the first gate, & so was this castell stuffed with Englishmen, and capteine thereof was appointed sir William Oldhall.

The same season, sir John Fastolfe, gouernour of the countries of Antou and Spaine, assembled a great puissance of men warre, and laid siege before the castell of saint Owen Difrais, beside the towne of Laual; and after he had laine there ten daies, the castell was deliuered, they within departing with their liues and armour onelie to them granted, by the tenor of the composition, which they toke with the same sir John Fastolfe. After the winning of this castell, the Englishmen remoued to the strong castell of Graule, and after twelue daies, they with in offered to yeld the castell by a daie, if they were not succoured by the Dolphin or his power: the offer was taken and pledges deliuered.

When sir John Fastolfe returned in post to the regent, aduertising him of this composition and agreement; wherefore, the said regent rased a great power to fight with the Frenchmen at the daie appointed, and in his companie were the earles of Portaigne and Marlowe, the lord Ros and Talbot, sir John Fastolfe, sir John Aubermont, sir John Ratcliffe, and diuerse other, to the number of twenty tie thousand men; and so marched forwards, in hope to meet and ioine battell with their aduersaries. But the French power, being not far off from the place, durst not approach. Wherefore, the regent sent to sir John Fastolfe incontinentlie, to receiue the castell: but they within (contrarie to promise and appointment) had newlie vittelled & manned the place, and so forsaking the pledges, and their fellows in armes, refused to render the fortresse; wherefore, the pledges were brought before their sight, and there before the castell openlie put to death.

After this the lord Talbot was made gouernour of Antou and Spaine, and sir John Fastolfe was assigned to an other place, which lord Talbot, being both of noble birth, and of hartie courage, after his comming into France, obtained so manie glorious victories of his enemies, that his onelie name was yet is dreadfull to the French nation, and much renowned amongst all other people. This iustie and most valiant capteine entred into Spaine, where he slue men, destroyed castles, burnt townes, and in conclusion suddenlie toke the towne of Laual. The lord Loebac, and diuerse other, withdrew into the castell, in the which they were so straitlie besieged, that in the end they agreed to paie the lord Talbot an hundred thousand crownes, for licence to depart, with all their bag and baggage.

Then was this castell deliuered to the keeping of Gilbert Halsall, which after was slaine at the siege of Orlence, in whose place Matthew Cough was made capteine there: who being at the iourne of Senlis, by treason of a miller that kept a mill adioining to the wall, the Frenchmen entred into the towne, and brought it againe into their subiection. Now the duke of Bedford hearing that the towne of Pontargis, in the territoile of Orlence, was but slenderlie kept, and not thoroughlie furnished, sent the erle of Suffolke, with his brother sir John Pole, and sir Henrie Bisset, hauing in their companie a sir thousand men, to assalt that towne; but when they came thither and found the towne both well manned and stronglie fortified, contrarie to their expectation, they surceased from giuing the assalt, and onelie laid their siege round about it.

The earle of Marlowe was appointed to lie with a great number of men of warre, at St. Marthelines de Archeimpe, to encounter the Frenchmen, if they would attempt to aid or vittell those within the towne. The situation of this towne was such, that by reason of waters and marshes, the English armie must needs leuer it selfe into thre parts, so that the one could not easilie helpe the other, but either by boats or bridges. This siege continued aboue two moneths, so that in the meane time the Frenchmen had leasure to prouide for the succour thereof; and so it came to passe, that the constable of France Arthur of Britaine, the lord Boissac one of the marshals, Stephan la Hire, Pothon de Saintrelles, the lord Graule, and diuerse others, to the number of thre thousand horsemen, were sent forth by the Dolphin.

These prussie in the night season came on that side, where sir John de la Pole and sir Henrie Bisset laie, whome they found so out of order, and without good watch, that the Frenchmen entred into their lodgings, slue manie in their beds, and spared none, for their resistance was but small. Sir John de la Pole with his horse saved himselfe, and sir Henrie Bisset escaped by a boat, and eight other with him. The residue fleeing in plumpes, and struing to passe by a bridge of timber, the which was pestered with pikes of the multitude, brake, and so there were a great number drowned: inso much that there were slaine by the enemies sword, and drowned in the water, fiftene hundred men.

The earle of Marwike hearing of this misfortune, departed from saint Mathelines with all speed, and comming before Pontargis, offered battell to the French captains, which answered, that they had manned and vittelled the towne, and intended to do no more at that time. The Englishmen hereupon came forthie backe againe with all their ordinance to the duke of Bedford. Yet had not the French so great cause to vaunt of their successe: for at this verie time, sir Nicholas Burdet, appointed by the duke of Sum-Sir Nicholas Burdet, Polydor.

merfet to indamage his enemies in the coasts of Britaine, sent horsemen into euerie part, working all the displeasure to the people that might be deuised. The countrie, through which he passed, was wasted, the townes were burnt, the houses spoiled, and great number of prisoners taken, the small villages were destroyed, and the walled towns ransomed, and so without hurt or damage the said sir Nicholas Burdet returned into Normandie.

These newes being signified to the constable, and other the French captains, allwaged their great mirth and triumphant ioy, conceiued for the victorie of Pontargis, that loth they were to attempt anie further enterprises against the English nation. But the duke of Alanson, who (as ye haue heard) was lately deliuered out of captiuitie, reuiued againe the dulled spirits of the Dolphin, and somewhat aduanced, in hope of good speed, the fainting hartes of his captains; so that (some occasion offered) they determined to atchieue a notable feat (as they took it) against the Englishmen, which was the recouerie of the citie of Mans out of their hands: for so it happened, that diuers of the chiefe rulers in that citie, and namelie diuerse spirituall persons, meaning to reuolt to the Dolphins side, aduertised him by letters of their whole minds, which letters were conueied vnto him by certeine friers.

The Dolphin glad of those newes, appointed the lords de la Beethand faict, marshals of France, accompanied with the lords of Mount Jehan, of Bueil, Do-uall, Coisie, Beaumanoz, the Wite, and his brother Guillian, with fise hundred other baliant captains and souldiers, to the accomplishing of this enterprise; who comming thither at the daie assigned, in the night season approached towards the walles, making a little fire on an hill, in sight of the towne, to signifie their comming, which perceived by the citizens that nere to the great church were watching for the same, a burning cresset was shewed out of the steeple, which suddentlie was put out and quenched. What needeth manie words?

The captains on horsebacke came to the gate, the traitors within shue the porters and watchmen, and let in their friends, whereby the footmen entered first, and the men of armes waited at the barriers, to the intent that if need required, they might fight it out in open field. Hereby manie Englishmen were slaine, & a great crye and garboile raised through the towne, as in such surprises is wont. The cause of this mischance was not knowne to any, but onelie to the conspirators; for the remnant of the citizens being no partakers, imagined, that the Englishmen had made haucke in the towne, and put all to the sword. The Englishmen on the other side iudged, that the citizens had begun some new rebellion against them, or else had stricken amongst themselves.

The earle of Suffolke, which was gouernour of the towne, hauing perfect knowledge by such as escaped from the wals, how the matter went, withdrew without any farriance into the castell, which standeth at the gate of saint Vincent, whereof was constable Thomas Colver esquier, whither also fled manie Englishmen; so as for bging of the enemy, prease of the number, and lache of vittells, they could not haue endured long: wherefore they prouide sent a messenger to the lord Talbot, which then laie at Alanson, certifieng him in how hard a case they were. The lord Talbot hearing these newes, like a carefull captaine in all hast assembled together about seuen hundred men, & in the euenting departed from Alanson, so as in the morning he came to a castell called Cuiorch, two miles from Mans, and there staid a while, till he had sent out Matthew Cough, as an espiall, to vnderstand how the Frenchmen demeaned themselves.

Matthew Cough so well sped his businesse, that prouide in the night he came into the castell, where he learned that the Frenchmen verie negligentlie beset themselves, without taking heed to their watch, as though they had bene out of all danger: which well vnderstod, he returned againe, and within a mile of the citie met the lord Talbot, and the lord Scalcs, and opened vnto them all things, according to his credence. The lords then, to make hast in the matter, because the daie approached, with all speed possible came to the posterne gate, and alighting from their horses, about six of the clocke in the morning, they issued out of the castell, crying saint George, Talbot.

The Frenchmen being thus suddentlie taken, were sore amazed, in so much that some of them, being not out of their beds, got vp in their shirts, and lept ouer the walles. Other ran naked out of the gates to save their liues, leauing all their apparell, horses, armour, and riches behind them, none was hurt but such as resisted. & Hard shift was made on all hands for safetie of life, & hapie was he that could find a place of refuge where to lurke vnside and vnhurt of the enemy; who in the execution of their vengeance were so peremptorie, that it was a matter of great difficultie or rather impossibilitie to escape their force. To be short, there were slaine and taken, to the number of foure hundred gentlemen, the priuat souldiers were frankelie let go. After this, inquisition was made of the authors of the treason, and there were found & condemned thirtie citizens, twentie priests, and fiftene friers, who according to their demerits were all hanged.

The citie of Mans being thus recovered, the lord Talbot returned to Alanson, and shortly after the earle of Marwike departed into England, to be gouernour of the young king, in stead of Thomas duke of Excester, lately departed to God, and then was the lord Thomas Montacute earle of Salisburie sent into France, to supplie the vacante of the said earle of Marwike, who landed at Calis with fise thousand men, and so came to the duke of Bedford as then lieng in Paris, where they fell in counsell together concerning the affaires of France, and namelie the earle of Salisburie began maruellouslie to fantasie the gaining of the citie & countrie of Orleans.

This earle was the man at that time, by whose wit, strength, and policie, the English name was much fearefull and terrible to the French nation, which of himselfe might both appoint, command, and do all things in manner at his pleasure, in whose power (as it appeared after his death) a great part of the conquest consisted: for suerlie, he was a man both painefull, diligent, and ready to withstand all dangerous chances that were at hand, prompt in counsell, and of courage invincible, so that in no one man, men put more trust; no; any singular person wan the hartes so much of all men.

Hereupon, after this great enterprise had long bene debated in the priue counsell, the earle of Salisburie deuise therein was of them all granted and allowed, so that he being replenished with good hope of victorie, and furnished with artillerie & munition appertaining to so great an enterprise, accompanied with the earle of Suffolke, and the lord Talbot, and with a valiant armie, to the number of ten thousand men, departed from Paris, and passed through the countie of Beausse. There he took by assault, the towne of Senville, and within five daies after had the castell deliuered unto him, by them that were tied into it for their safegard. He also took the towne of Saugencie, suffering ex. <sup>10</sup> a man which would become subiect to the king of England, to intioie their lands and goods. The townes of Meun upon Loire, and Jargcault, hearing of these doings, presented to them the keyes of their townes upon like agreement. Dileance de

Ballard of Dileance.

After this, in the moneth of September the earle came before the citie of Dileance, and planted his siege on the one side of the riuer of Loire; but before his comming, the ballard of Dileance, the bishop of the citie, and a great number of Scots, hearing of the earles intent, made diuerse fortifications about the towne, and destroyed the suburbs, in which were twelue parish churches, and foure orders of friers. They cut also downe all the vines, trees, and bushes, within five leagues of the citie, so that the Englishmen should haue neither refuge nor succour.

After the siege had continued full three weekes, the ballard of Dileance issued out of the gate of the bridge, and fought with the Englishmen; but they returned him with so fierce and terrible strokes, that he was with all his companie compelled to retire and flee backe into the citie. But the Englishmen followed so fast, in killing and taking of their enemies, that they entered with them. ¶ The bulworne of the bridge, with a great tower standing at the end of the same, was taken incontinentlie by the Englishmen, who behaued themselves right valiantlie vnder the conduct of their couragious capteine, as at this assault, so in diuerse skirmishes against the French; partie to keepe possession of that which Henrie the sixt had by his magnanimitie & puissance atchiued, as also to enlarge the same. But all helped not. For who can hold that which will alwaie? In so much that some cities by fraudulent practises, other some by martiall prowesse were recovered by the French, to the great discouragement of the English and the appalling of their spirits; whose hope was now dashed partie by their great losses and discomfitures (as after you shall heare) but chieslie by the death of the late deceased Henrie their victorious king; as Chr. Okland herie truelie and agreeable to the storie noteth:

Dolphinus, comit' que eius fera praelia tentant, Fraude domi captant alias, virtute recepta Sunt verbes alia quiddam, sublapsa referunt Anglum spes retro, languescere pectora dicas, Quippe erat Henricus quintus, dux strenuus olim, Mortuus: hinc damni grauior causa atque doloris.

In this conflict, manie Frenchmen were taken, but none were slaine, and the keeping of the tower and bulworne was committed to William Glasdale esquier. By the taking of this bridge the passage was stopped, that neither men nor vittels could go or come by that waie. After this, the earle caused certeine bulwornes to be made round about the towne, casting trenches betwene the one and the other, laicng ordinance in euerie place where he saw that any batterie might be deuised. When they within saw that they were environed with fortresses and ordinance, they laid gun against gun, and fortified towers against bulwornes, and within cast new rampiers, and fortified themselves as stronglie as might be deuised.

The ballard of Dileance and the fire were appointed to see the walles and watches kept, and the bishop saw that the inhabitants within the citie were put in good order, and that vittels were not vaineilie spent. In the tower that was taken at the bridge end (as before you haue heard) there was an high chamber, hauing a grate full of barres of iron, by the which a man might looke all the length of the bridge into the citie; at which grate manie of the chiefe capteins stood manie times, viewing the citie, and deuising in what place it was best to giue the assault. They within the citie well perceived this watching hole, and laid a peece of ordinance directlie against the window.

It so chanced, that the nine and fiftith daie after the siege was laid, the earle of Salisburie, sir Thomas Garrauc, and William Glasdale, with diuerse other went into the said tower, and so into the high chamber, and looked out at the grate, and within a short space, the sonne of the maister-gunner, perceiving men looking out at the window, took his match (as his father had taught him) who was gone downe to dinner, and fired the gun; the shot whereof brake, and shiuered the iron barres of the grate, so that one of the same bars strake the earle so violentlie on the head, that it stroke alwaie one of his eyes, and the side of his cheeke. Sir Thomas Garrauc was likewise stricken, and died within two daies.

The earle of
slaine.

The earle was conueied to Meun on Loire, where after eight daies he likewise departed this world, whose bodie was conueied into England with all funerall appointment, and buried at Wilsam by his progenitozs, leaving behind him an onelie daughter named Alice, married to Richard Beuill, sonne to Rafe earle of Westmerland, of whose more shall be said hereafter. The damage that the realme of England receiued by the losse of this noble man, manifestlie appeared; in that immediatlie after his death, the prosperous good lucke, which had followed the English nation, began to decline, and the glorie of their victozies gotten in the parties beyond the sea fell in decaye.

Though all men were sorrowfull for his death, yet the duke of Bedford was most stricken with beaunesse, as he that had lost his onelie right hand, and chiefe aid in time of necessitie. But sith that dead men cannot helpe the chances of men that be liuing, he like a prudent gouernour appointed the earle of Suffolke to be his lieutenant and capteine of the siege, and joined with him the lord Seales, the lord Talbot, sir John Fastolfe, and diuerse other right valiant capteins. These persons caused bastilles to be made round about the citie, and left nothing vnattempted, that might aduance their purpose, which to bring to wished effect there was not anie want, as of no cautelous policie, so of no valiant enterprise, tending to the enemies ouerthrow.

In the Lent season, vittels and artillerie began to waile scant in the English campe, wherefore the earle of Suffolke appointed sir John Fastolfe, sir Thomas Rampston, and sir Philip Hall, with their retinues, to ride to Paris, to the lord regent, to informe him of their lacke, who incontinentlie vpon that information prouided vittels, artillerie, and munitions necessarie, and loaded therewith manie chariots, carts, and horses: and for the sure conueieng of the same, he appointed sir Simon Pozhier, prouost of Paris, with the gard of the citie, and diuerse of his owne household-servants to accompanie sir John Fastolfe and his complices, to the armie lieng at the siege of Dileance. They were in all to the number of sixtane hundred men, of the which there were not past five or six hundred Englishmen.

Enguerant,

These departing in good order of battell out of Paris, ris, came to Cenuille in Beaulieu, and in a morning earlie, in a great frost, they departed from thence toward the siege; and when they came to a towne called Moluzaie, in the lands of Beaulieu, they perceived their enemies comming towards them, being to the number of nine or ten thousand of Frenchmen and Scots, of whom were capitaine Charles of Clermont, sonne to the duke of Bourbon then being prisoner in England; sir William Steward constable of Scotland, a little before deliuered out of captiuitie, the earle of Perdsake, the lord John Candoline, the Abbot of Chartres, the lord of Tournes, the lord of Lohar, the lord of Egler, the lord of Beaulieu, the bastard Tremolle, and manie other valiant capitaine.

1500 English did slay and haquish 10000
French.

Wherefore sir John Fastolfe set all his companie in good order of battell, and pitched stakes before euerie archer, to breake the force of the horsemen. At their backs they set all the wagons and carriages, and within them they tied all their horses. In this maner stood they still, abiding the assault of their enemies. The Frenchmen by reason of their great number, thinking themselves sure of the victorie, egerlie set on the Englishmen, which with great force them receiued, and themselves manfully defended. At length, after long and cruell fight, the Englishmen droue backe and banquished the proud Frenchmen, a compelled them to flee. In this conflict were slaine the lord William Steward constable of Scotland, and his brother the lord Dornalle, the lord Chateaubrian, sir John Baskot, and other Frenchmen and Scots, to the number of five and twentie hundred, and aboue eleuen hundred taken prisoners, although the French writers affirme the number lesse.

herrings.

After this fortunate victorie, sir John Fastolfe and his companie (hauing lost no one man of anie reputation) with all their carriages, vittels, and prisoners, marched forth and came to the English campe before Aleance, where they were fullie receiued, and highlie commended for their valiance and worthy prowesse shewed in the battell; the which because most part of the carriage was herring and lenton stuffe, the Frenchmen called it the battell of herrings. The earle of Suffolke being thus vittelled, continued the siege, and euerie daie almost furnished with the Frenchmen within, who (at length being in despair of all succours) offered to treat, and in conclusion, to saue themselves and the citie from captiuitie of their enemies, they deuised to submit the citie, themselves, and all theirs under the obeisance of Philip duke of Burgonie, because he was extract out of the stocke and blond roiall of the ancient kings of France, thinking by this means (as they did in deed) to breake or diminish the great amitie betwene the Englishmen and him.

W. P.

This offer was signified by them vnto the duke of Burgonie, who with thanks certified them againe, that he would gladlie receiue them, if the lord regent would therewith be contented. Hereupon he dispatched messengers to the duke of Bedford, who though some counselled that it should be verie good and necessary for him to agree to that maner of yielding; yet he and other thought it neither conuenient nor honourable, that a citie so long besieged by the king of England, should be deliuered vnto anie other prince, than to him, or to his regent, for that might be a verie bad president to other townes in anie like case. Hereupon the regent answered the Burgonians ambassadors: that after so long a siege on his part, and obstinat a resistance of theirs, he might not receiue rendering and conditions at their appointment. At this answer the duke hong the groine, as concluding that our side should enue his glorie, or not to be so forward in aduancing his honour as he would haue it.

In time of this siege at Aleance (French stories saie) the first weeke of March 1428, vnto Charles the Dolphin, at Chinon as he was in verie great care and studie how to wrestle against the English nation, by one Peter Babilicourt capitaine of Alconleu, (made after marshall of France by the Dolphins creation) was caried a poore wench of an eightene yeeres old, called Jone Dompzin by name of his father (a sozie shepheard) James of Aze, and Isabel his mother, brought by poorelie in their trade of keeping cat-tell, borne at Dompzin (therefore reported by Bale, Jone Dompzin) upon Heuse in Lorraine within the diocesse of Thoul. Of fauour was she counted like some, of person stronglie made and manlie, of courage great, hardie, and stout withall, an understander of counsels though she were not at them, great semblance of chastitie both of bodie and behauiour, the name of Jesus in his mouth about all his businesses, humble, obedient, and fasting bluerse daies in the weeke. A person (as their bookes make him) raised by by power diuine, onelie for succour to the French estate then depelie in distresse, in whom, for planning a credit the rather, first the companie that toward the Dolphin did conduct him, through places all dangerous, as holden by the English, where he neuer was afoze, all the waie and by nightertale safely did she lead: then at the Dolphins sending by his assignement, from saint Katharins church of Fierbois in Touraine (where he neuer had bene and knew not) in a secret place there among old iron, appointed the his sword to be sought out and brought him, that with fine flour delices was grauen on both sides, wherewith she fought & did manie slaughters by his owne hands. On warfar rode he in armour cap a pie & muffled as a man, before him an ensigne all white, wherein was Jesus Christ painted with a flour delice in his hand.

Vnto the Dolphin into his gallerie when first he was brought, and he shadowing himselfe behind, setting other gate lords before him to trie his cunning from all the companie, with a salutation (that indeed marz all the matter) she pickt him out alone, who thereupon had him to the end of the gallerie, where she held him an houre in secret and private talke, that of his priuie chamber was thought verie long, and therefore would haue broken it off; but he made them a signe to let him see on. In which (among other) as likelie it was, she set out vnto him the singular feats (so sooth) giuen him to understand by reuelation diuine, that in vertue of that sword she should atchieue, which were, how with honoz and victorie she would rasse the siege at Aleance, set him in state of the crowne of France, and droue the English out of the countrie, thereby he to inioie the kingdome alone. Hereupon he hartened at full, appointed him a sufficient armie with absolute power to lead them, and they obedientlie to do as she had them. Then fell she to worke, and first defeated indeed the siege at Aleance, by and by encouraged him to crowne himselfe king of France at Reims, that a little before from the English she had toone. Thus after pursued she manie bold enterprizes to our great displeasure a two yeare together, so the time she kept in state vntill she were taken and for her selfe and withcherie burned: as in particularities hereafter followeth. But in his priuie time she armed at all points (like a folie capitaine) roade from Poitiers to Blois, and there found men of warre, vittels, and munition, readie to be conueied to Aleance.

Here was it knowne that the Englishmen kept not so diligent watch as they had bene accustomed to do, and therefore this maid (with other French capitaine) comming forward in the dead time of the night night, and in a great raine and thunder entered into the citie with all their vittels, artillerie, and other necessarie provisions. The next daie the Englishmen boldlie assaulted the towne, but the Frenchmen defended the walles so, as no great feat worthe of memorie chanced that daie betwixt them, though the Frenchmen were amazed at the valiant attempt of the Englishmen, whereupon the bastard of Orleans gaue knowledge to the duke of Alanson, in what danger the towne stood without his present helpe, who comming within two leagues of the citie, gaue knowledge to them within, that they should be ready the next daie to receiue him.

This accordingly was accomplished: for the Englishmen willingly suffered him and his armie also to enter, supposing that it should be for their advantage to haue so great a multitude to enter the citie, whereby their vittels (whereof they within had great scarcitie) might the sooner be consumed. On the next daie in the morning, the Frenchmen altogether issued out of the towne, where by assault the bastille of Saint Lou, and set it on fire. And after they likewise assaulted the tower at the bridge foot, which was manfully defended. But the Frenchmen (more in number) at length took it, yet the lord Talbot could come to the succours, in the which William Gladesdale the captaine was slaine, with the lord Pollins, and lord Doymings also.

The Frenchmen puffed up with this good lucke, fetched a compasse about, and in good order of battell marched toward the bastille, which was in the keeping of the lord Talbot: the which upon the enemies approach, like a captaine without all feare or dread of that great multitude, issued forth against them, and gaue them so sharpe an encounter, that they not able to withstand his puissance, fled (like sheepe before the wolfe) againe into the citie, with great losse of men and small artillerie. Of Englishmen were lost in the two battles, to the number of six hundred persons, or thereabout, though the French writers multiplye this number of hundreds to thousands, as their manner is.

The earle of Suffolke, the lord Talbot, the lord Scales, and other captains assembled together in counsell, and after causes shewed to and fro, it was amongst them determined to leaue their fortresses and bastilles, and to assemble in the plaine field, and there to abide all the daie, to see if the Frenchmen would issue forth to fight with them. This conclusion taken was accordingly executed: but when the Frenchmen durst not once come forth to shew their heads, the Englishmen set fire of their lodgings, and departed in good order of battell from Orleans. The next daie, which was the eight daie of Maie, the earle of Suffolke rode to Jargeaur with foure hundred Englishmen, and the lord Talbot with an other companie returned to Mehun. And after he had fortified that towne, he went to the towne of Lauall, & tooke it, together with the castell, soe punishing the towne men for their cankered obstinacie against them.

Thus when the Englishmen had severed themselves into garrisons, the duke of Alanson, the bastard of Orleans, Jone le Desell, the lord Saluicourt, and diuerse other captains of the Frenchmen, came the twelue daie of June, before the towne of Jargeaur, where the earle of Suffolke and his two brethren sojourned, & gaue to the towne so fierce an assault on three parts, that Poiton de Sentrailes, perceiving an other part void of defendants, scaled the wals on that side, and without difficultie took the towne, and slew sir Alexander Pole, brother to the earle, and manie other, to the number of two hundred. But the Frenchmen gained not much thereby, for they lost three hundred good men and more. Of the Englishmen fortie were taken, with the earle and his other brother named John.

The Frenchmen, as they returned to Orleans, fell at variance for their prisoners, and slew them all, saving the earle and his brother. Shortly after, the same French armie came to Mehun, where they took the tower at the bridge foot, and put therein a garrison. From thence they remoued to Saugencie, and constrained them that were within the towne to yeld, upon condition they might depart with bag and baggage. At the same place there came to the duke of Alanson, the new constable Arthur of Britaine, and with him the lord Dalbret, and other. Also after this the earle of Mandosine came to them, so that by the daile repaire of such as assembled together to strengthen the French part, they were in all to the number betwixt twenty and thre and twenty thousand men.

All which being once joined in one armie, shortly after fought with the lord Talbot (who had with him not past six thousand men) nere vnto a village in Beaulle called Pataie: at which battell the charge was giuen by the French so upon a sudden, that the Englishmen had not leisure to put themselves in a rate, after they had put up their stakes before their archers, so that there was no remedie but to fight at aduerture. This battell continued by the space of three long houres: for the Englishmen, though they were overpressed with multitude of their enemies, yet they neuer fled backe one foot, till their captaine the lord Talbot was soe wounded at the backe, and so taken.

When their hearts began to faint, and they fled, in which sight were slaine about twelue hundred, and forty taken, of whom the lord Talbot, the lord Scales, the lord Hungerford, & sir Thomas Rampton were cheefe. Diuerse archers, after they had shot all their arrowes, hauing onelie their swords, defended themselves, and with helpe of some of their horsemen came safe to Mehun. This overthrow, and specially the taking of the lord Talbot, did not so much reioice the Frenchmen; but it did as much abash the Englishmen: so that immediatlie thereupon, the townes of Jenaile, Mehun, Fort, and diuerse other, returned from the English part, and became French. From this battell departed without anie stroke stricken sir John Fastolfe, the same yeare for his valiantnesse elected into the order of the garter. But for doubt of misdealing at this brunt, the duke of Bedford took from him the image of saint George, and his garter; though afterward by meanes of friends, and apparant causes of good excuse, the same were to him againe deliuered against the mind of the lord Talbot.

Charles the Dolphin that called himselfe French perceiving fortune to smile thus vpon him, assembled a great power, and determined to conquer the citie of Reimes, that he might be there sacred, crowned, and annointed, according to the custome of his progenitors, that all men might iudge that he was by all lawes and decrees a iust and lawfull king. In his waie thitherwards he besieged the citie of Arrerre, the citizens whereof compounded with him to yeld, if they were not rescued within certeine daies. From thence he came before Trois, and after twelue daies siege had that citie deliuered vnto him, by composition, that the captaine sir Philip Hall (with his people and mouables) might depart in safetie. After that Trois was yelded, the communaltie of Chaalons rebelled against sir John Aubemond their captaine, and constrained him to deliuer the towne vpon like composition. In semblable manner did they of Reimes, desiring him to giue safe conduct to all the Englishmen safelie to depart. When Reimes was was thus become French, the foresaid Charles the Delphin in the presence of the dukes of Lorraine and Barre, and of all the noble men of his faction, was sacred there king of France by the name of Charles the seauenth, with all rites and ceremonies thereto belonging. They of Auxerre, when the terme of their appointment was expired, submitted themselves to him; and so likewise did all the cities and townes adjoining.

The duke of Bedford aduertised of all these doings, assembled his power about him, and hauing together ten thousand good Englishmen (beside Normans) departed out of Paris in warlike fashion, & passing thorough Wye to Pontrecau fault Ponne, sent by his herald Bedford, letters to the French king, signifying to him; that where he had (contrarie to the small conclusion accorded betwene his noble brother K. Henrie the sixt, & king Charles the first, father to him that was the usurper) by allurement of a diuellish witch, taken vpon him the name, title, & dignitie of the king of France; and further had by murder, stealing, craft, and deceitfull meanes, violently gotten, and wrongfullie kept diuerse cities and townes belonging to the king of England his nephew; for proofe thereof he was come downe from Paris with his armie, into the countrie of Wye, by dint of sword and stroke of battell to proue his writing and cause true, willing his enimie to chosse the place, and in the same he would giue him battell.

The new French king being come from Reimes to Dampmartine, studieng how to compassie them of Paris, was halfe abashed at this message. But yet to set a good countenance on the matter, he answered the herald, that he would sooner seeke his maister, than his maister should need to pursue him. The duke of Bedford hearing this answer, marched toward the king, and pitched his field in a strong place. The French king though at the first he meant to haue abidden battell; yet when he vnderstood that the duke was equall to him in number of people, he changed his purpose, and turned with his armie a little out of the waie. The duke of Bedford, perceiuing his faint courage, followed him by the hills and dales, till he came to a towne not far from Senlis, where he found the French king and his armie lodged; wherefore he ordered his battels like an expert chiefeine in martiall science, setting the archers before, and himselfe with the noblemen in the maine battell, and put the Normans on both sides for wings. The French king also ordered his battels with the aduise of his captains.

The French
armie fled in the night.
Boheme.

Thus these two armies late two daies and two nights either in sight of other, without any great doing, except a few skirmishes, wherein the dukes light horsemen did vertie valiantlie. At length in the dead of the night (as ymiulie as might be) the French king brake by his campe, and fled to Wye. The duke of Bedford had much adoe to saue his people in the morning from pursuit of the French armie: but for that he mistrusted the Parisiens, he would not depart farre from that cite, and so returned thither againe. ¶ In this season pope Martin the sixt of that name, meaning to subdue the Bohemers that dissented from the church of Rome in matters of religion, appointed Henrie Beaufort Bishop of Winchester & cardinall of saint Cusbie, to be his legat in an armie that should invade the kingdome of Boheme, and to bring a power of men with him out of England. And because the warre touched religion, he licenced the cardinall to take the tenth part of euery spirituall dignitie, benefice, and promotion.

This matter was opened in the parlement house, and assented to: whereupon the bishop gathered the monie, and assembled foure thousand men & above, not without great grudge of the people, which daily were with tallages and aids wearied and soze burdened. As this bishop was come to Douer ready to passe the seas ouer into Flanders, the duke of Gloucester hauing receiued letters from the duke of Bedford, containing an earnest request to release him with some speedie aid of men of warre, was constrained to write vnto the bishop of Winchester, willing him in time of such need, when all stood vpon losse or gaine, to passe with all his armie toward the duke of Bedford, to assist him against his aduersaries; which thing done, and to his honour achieved, he might performe his iourne against the vngracious Bohemers. The cardinall (though not well contented with this countermand) yet least he should run into the note of infamie, if he refused to aid the regent of France in so great a cause, passed ouer with his power, and brought the same vnto his confine to the cite of Paris.

About the same season, the French king, in hope to be receiued into the townes of Campaigne and Beaunots (by reason of the fauour and good will which the inhabitants bare towards him) was come with an armie towards Campaigne. Whereof the duke of Bedford being aduertised, and hauing now his host augmented with the new supplie, which the cardinall had of late brought vnto him, marched forward with great speed toward the place where he vnderstood the French king was lodged: and coming to Senlis, he perceiued how his enimies were incamped vpon the mount Pilioll, betwene Senlis and Campaigne.

Here might either armie behold the other: whereupon for the auoiding of dangers that might insue, the camps were trenchd, and the battels pitched, and the fields ordered as though they should haue tried the matter by battell: but nothing was done except with skirmishes, in the which the Normans soze bered the Frenchmen; and therefore receiued great commendations & praises of the lord regent: who vndoubtedlie determined to haue giuen battell to his enimies if they would haue abidden it. But after the armies had thus lien ether in sight of other, for the space of two daies together, the French king not determining to aduenture in an open battell the whole chance of the game, least he might thereby receiue a perpetuall checkmate, in the night season remoued his campe, and fled to Crespie, though his number was double to the English armie. The duke of Bedford, seeing that the French king was thus cowardlie recoiled with all his power and armie, returned againe to Paris, euer suspecting the deceitfull faith of the Parisiens.

The bishop of Winchester, after that the French king was retreated backe, went into Boheme, and there did somewhat, though hostile after without any great praise or gaine he returned into England, more glad of his coming backe than of his aduancing forward. Anon after the pope vblegated him, and set an other in his place, wherewith he was nothing contented. On the first daie of November, being the daie of saint Leonard, king Henrie in the eight yeare of his reigne was at Westminster with all pompe and honour crowned king of this realme of England. In the same yere the French king was receiued into the towne of Campaigne, and hostile after were the townes of Senlis and Beaunots recovered to him. And the lord Langueuall took by stealth the castell of Aumarle, and drew all the Englishmen within it.

Also about the same time, the Frenchmen recovered the red castell Gallard south of the Englishmens hands, where the lord Barbacon was found in a dungeon, inclosed inclosed within a great grate of iron like to a little chamber, and withouth they brake open the grate: but Barbaſon would not come forth; because he had given his faith and promise to one Kingdon that was captaine of that fortreſſe for the king of England, to be true prisoner, untill the Frenchmen had sent to the ſame Kingdon (that was departed vpon ſuch covenants as they were agreed vpon at the deliuerie of that fortreſſe) willing him to come backe againe vpon ſafe conduct. Which at their earneſt request he did, and withall diſcharged the lord Barbaſon of his oath; and ſo then he came forth, and remained at his libertie, to the great reioyſſing of the Frenchmen, which iudged that he had bene rather dead than alive all that time of his impriſonment.

About the ſame time alſo the French king ſought by all meanes poſſible to breake the amitie betwixt the realme of England, and the houſe of Burgognie. Whereof the duke of Bedford hauing intelligence, thought it ſtood him vpon the more earneſtie to loke to his charge; and namelic as if were an anchorhold, he determined to prouide that he might defend and ſaſe keepe the duchie of Normandie, and therefore appointing the biſhop of Terrowen and Elie, named Leues of Lutzenburgh, chancelor for king Henrie of the realme of France, to remaine at Paris vpon the defence of that cite, with a conuenient number of Engliſhmen, he departed into Normandie, and coming to Rone, called a parlement there of the three eſtates of the duchie, in the which he declared manie things vnto them, touching the happie life, and great freedom which they might be aſſured to enjoy, ſo long as they continued vnder the Engliſh obedience: and therefore he exhorted them to abide conſtant in their allegiance, faith, and promise made and ſworne to his noble brother king Henrie the ſixt.

Whileſt the duke of Bedford was buſie to reteine the Normans in their due obedience, the French king departed from Senlis; and coming to the towne of ſaint Denis, found it in maner deſolate, ſo that he entered there without reſiſtance, and lodged his armie at Mount Martz and Amberuillers, nere vnto the cite of Paris; and from thence ſent John duke of Alanson, and his forcerelle Jone la Pucelle, with three thouſand light horſemen to aſſault the cite, and followed himſelfe, in hope to get it, either by force or treatie. But the Engliſh captaine euerie one keeping his ward and place aſſigned, ſo manfullie defended themſelues, their walles and towers, with the aſſiſtance of the Parisiens, that they repelled the Frenchmen, and threw downe Jone their great goddeſſe into the bottome of the towne ditch, where he lay behind the backe of an aſſe ſore hurt in the leg, till the time that ſhe (all filthie with urine and dirt) was dratone out by Guilſhard of Chienzone, ſervant to the duke of Alanson.

The French king, perceiuing that he could not preuaile in this enterpriſe, left the dead bodies behind him, and taking with him the wounded captaine, returned into Berrie. But in the meane waie, the inhabitants of Laigrie ſubmitted themſelues vnto him. The duke of Bedford being in Normandie, hearing of this ſudden attempt, with all haſt poſſible came to Paris, where he gaue manie great thanks, with high commendations vnto the captaine, ſouldiers and citizens for their aſſured fidelitie, great hardineſſe & manlie doing. Which his gentle words ſo encouraged the hearts of the Parisiens, that they ſware, promiſed and concluded, to be friends for euer to the king of England and his friends, and enemies alwaies to his foes and aduerſaries, making proclamation by this ſtile: Friends to B. Henrie, friends to the Parisiens, Enemies to England, enemies to Paris. Marie whether this was offered from their hearts, it is hard ſo to ſaie, for the ſequale of their acts ſeemed to proue the contrarie.

Some after theſe doings, came to Paris with a great companie Philip duke of Burgognie, and then vpon long conſultation had for the recouerie of their loſſes, it was agreed that the duke of Bedford ſhould raiſe an armie, & that the duke of Burgognie ſhould be his deputie, and tarie at Paris for the defence of the cite. The duke of Bedford then without any great reſiſtance recouered againe the towne of ſaint Denis, with diuerſe other fortreſſes. And after this he ſent the baſſard of Clarence to laie ſiege to the caſtell of Roſſie, the which (notwithſtanding the great ſtrength therof) after ſix moneths ſiege, was rendered vpon into his hands. During the ſiege of this caſtell, ſir Thomas Kiriell knight, with foure hundred Engliſhmen departed from Courneie in Normandie, and rode by Beaunois, ſpoiling and waſting the countie to the ſuburbes of Cleremont. Whereof the earle of that towne hauing aduertement, aſſembled all the men of warre of the garrisons adjoining, and with the ſame ſet forward to fight with the Engliſhmen, whom he found in a ſtreit place nere to Beaunois.

The earle of Cleremont, perceiuing that he could not hurt them with his men of armes, by reaſon of the ſtrength, came downe on foot with all his companie, and ſiercelie ſet on the Engliſhmen: but by the terrible ſhot of the Engliſh archers, the Frenchmen in the end were conſtrained to flee; and the Engliſhmen perceiuing the matter, ſtreight leapt on horſebacke and followed the chafe. In the which were taken two hundred prisoners, and theſe as manie ſlaine. The earle eſcaped by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe. At the ſame ſeaſon the earle of Suffolke beſieging the towne of Aumarle (whereof was captaine the lord of Rambures) after foure and twentie great aſſaults, had the towne and caſtell ſimplie to him rendered. Thus by little and little the Engliſhmen recouered manie townes which beſore they had loſt. Howbeit about the verie ſame time, the Frenchmen ſale the towne of Lauall, by treaſon wrought by a miller, which keeping a mill that ioined to the wall, ſuffered the French to paſſe through his mill into the towne. Shortly after alſo ſir Steuen de Gignolles, ſurnamed la Hire, toke by ſcaling the towne of Louiers in Normandie. The Engliſhmen in the cold moneth of December beſieged the towne of Laigrie in the which was the Pucelle, and diuerſe other good captaine.

[In the moneth of Maie 1430, with a valiant man in ſeats of armes on the duke of Burgognions ſide, one Franquet and his band of three hundred ſouldiers, making all towards the maintenance of the ſiege, the Pucelle Jone and a foure hundredes with hir did meet. In great courage and force did ſhe and hir people ſundrie times aſſaile him, but he with his (though much vnder in number) by meanes of his archers in good order ſet, did ſo hardilie withſtand them, that for the firſt and ſecond pulſe he rather loſt than won: Whereat this captaine ſtricken into a fretting chafe, called out in all haſt the garrison of Laigrie, and from other the ſorts thereabout, who thicke and threefold came downe with might and maine, in armour and number ſo far exceeding Franquets, that though they had done hir much hurt in hir horſemen; yet by the verie multitude were they oppreſſed, moſt in hir furie put to the ſword; & as for ſir Franquet that worthy captaine himſelfe, hir rage not appeaſed, till out of hand ſhe had his head ſtroken off: contrarie to all manhood (but ſhe was a woman, if ſhe were that) & contrarie to common right & law of armes. After this the duke of Burgognie accompanied with the earles of Arundell, and Suffolke, and the lord John of Lutzenburgh besieged the towne of Campieigne with a great puissance. This towne was well walled, manned, and bittelled, so that the besiegers were constrained to cast trenches, and make mines, for otherwise they saw not how to compasse their purpose. In the meane time it happened in the night of the Ascension of our Lord, that Poiton de Saintreilles, Jone la Pusell, and five or six hundred men of armes issued out by the bidge toward Pont-debier, intending to set fire in the tents and lodgings of the lord Waldo de Poitelle.

The books that he wrote.

In this yeare of our Lord, among diuerse notable men of learning and knowledge, one Richard Fleming, English borne, a doctor of diuinitie, resided in Oxford, did flourish: who by the prouidence of God grew in such fauour with this king Henrie the first, & the nobles nere about him, that he was preferred to the bishops see of Lincoln. This man founded Lincoln college in Oxford, in which vniuersitie he had bene a profitable student. Diuerse booke he wrote (as the vniuersitie librarie dooth beare witness) whereof these following haue bene seene vnder their names and titles; to wit: A protestation against the Spaniards, the Frenchmen, and the Scots, made in the generall counsell holden at Senes: one booke of the Etymologie of England; besides diuerse other treatises, as Gelnoro reporteth Ex bibliotheca Oxonijs, aforesaid.]

At the verie same time that Campieigne was besieged (as before is said) sir John of Lutzenburgh, with eight other gentlemen, chanced to be nere unto the lodging of the said lord Waldo, where they espied the Frenchmen, which began to cut downe tents, overthrow pavillions, & kill men in their beds: whereupon they with all speed assembled a great number of men, as well English as Burgognions, and courageously set on the Frenchmen, and in the end beat them backe into the towne, so that they fled so fast that one letted another, as they would haue entered. In the chase and pursute was the Pusell taken, with diuerse other, besides those that were slaine, which were no small number. Diuerse were hurt also on both parts. Among the Englishmen, sir John Pont-gomerie had his arme broken, and sir John Steward was shot into the thigh with a quarell.

Chroniques de Britaigne.

[As before ye haue heard somewhat of this damnable strange beginning and proceedings, so with the ending of all such miracle-mongers dooth (for the most part) plainelie decipher the vertue and power that they worke, by hir shall ye be aduertised what at last became of hir; cast your opinions as ye haue cause. Of hir louers (the Frenchmen) reporteth one, how in Campieigne thus besieged, Guillaume de Flaue the capteine hauing sold hir aforesaid to the lord of Lutzenburgh, vnder colour of halting hir with a band out of the towne towards their king, for him with speed to come and leaue the siege there, so gotten hir forth he shut the gates after hir, when anon by the Burgognians set upon and ouermatched in the conflict she was taken: marie yet (all things accounted) to no small maruell how it could come so to passe, had she bene of any deuotion or of true beleefe, and no false miscreant, but all holie as she made it. For earlie that morning she gat hir to saint James church, confessed hir, and receiued hir maker (as the booke termes it) and after setting hir selfe to a pillar, manie of the towne-men that with a five or six score of their children stood about there to see hir, unto them (quod she) God children and my deere friends, I tell you plaine one hath sold me, I am betrayed and shortly lie shall be deliuered to death; I beseech you praie to God for me, for I shall neuer haue more power to do service either to the king or to the realme of France againe.

With another booke, she was intrapt by a Picard capteine of Soissons, who sold that citie to the duke of Burgognie, and he then put it ouer into the hands of the lord of Lutzenburgh, so by that meanes the Burgognians appoched and besieged Campieigne, for succour whereof as damself Jone with hir capteins from Laignie was thither come, and daile to the English gaue manie a hot skirmish, so happened it one a daie in an outfallie that she made by a Picard of the lord of Lutzenburghs band, in the fiercest of hir fight she was taken, and by him by and by to his lord presented, who sold hir ouer againe to the English, who for witchcraft and sorcerie burnt hir at Rone. Tillet telleth it thus, that she was caught at Campieigne by one of the earle of Lignies soldiers, from him had to Beauneuoir castell, where kept a three months, she was after for ten thousand pounds in monie and three hundred pounds rent (all Turinois) sold into the English hands.

In which for hir pranks so vnrough and suspicious, the lord regent by Peter Chanchon bishop of Beauuois (in whose diocesse she was taken) caused hir life and beleefe, after order of law to be inquired vpon and examined. Wherein found though a virgin, yet first shamefullie reiecting hir sex abominable in acts and apparell to haue counterfeited mankind, and then all damnable faithlesse, to be a pernicious instrument to hostilitie and bloudshed in diuells witchcraft and sorcerie, sentence accordingly was pronounced against hir. Whowbeit vpon humble confession of hir iniquities with a counterfeited contrition pretending a carefull sorow for the same, execution spared and all mollified into this, that from thenceforth she should cast off hir vnnaturall wearing of mans abilliments, and keepe hir to garments of hir owne kind, abiure hir pernicious practises of sorcerie and witcherie, and haue life and leasure in perpetuall prison to bewaile hir misdoers. Which to performe (according to the manner of abuturation) a solemn obberie gladlie she toke.

But herein (God helpe vs) she fullie afore possessed of the foend, not able to hold hir in anie towardnesse of grace, falling straight waie into hir former abominations (and yet seeking to ech out life as long as she might) stak not though the shift were shamefull to confesse hir selfe a trumpet, and vnnaried as she was) to be withchild. For trial, the lord regents lentle gaue hir nine moneths spaie, at the end whereof she found herein as false as wicked in the rest, an eight daies after, vpon a further definitive sentence declared against hir to be relapse and a renouner of hir oth and repentance, was she thereupon deliuered ouer to secular power, and so executed by consumption of fire in the old market place at Rone, in the selfe same sted where now saint Michaels church stands, hir ashes afterward without the towne walls shaken into the wind. Now recounting altogether, hir passiorall bringing vp, rude without any vertuous instruction, hir campestrall conuersation with wicked spirits, whome in hir first salutation to Charles the Dolphin, she bittred to be our Lady, saint Katherine, and saint Annes, that in this behalfe came and gaue hir commandements from God hir maker, as she kept hir fathers lambs in the fields (where saints in warres among christen men were (be we sure) neuer so parcell patrons or partners to maintenance of horrible slaughters, rapines and bloudshed) hereto hir murderous mind in killing of Franquet hir owne prisoner, hir two yeares continuance in hir abominations and drablie mischief without anie hir trauell or motion betwene the princes for peace, hir relapse relapſe at laſt & falling againe into his abiured iniquities, by his virginitie (if it were anie) by his holie woordes, his fasting and praiers that they might be, ſith ſatan (after S. Paule) can change himſelfe into an angell of light, the deapler to deceiue.

Theſe matters may verie rightfullie denounce vnto all the world his execrable abominations, and well iuſtifie the iudgement he had, and the execution ſhe was put to for the ſame. A thing yet (God wot) verie ſmallie ſhadowed, and leſſe holpen by the verie trauell of the Dolphin, whoſe dignitie abroad ſoule ſpotted in this point, that contrarie to the holie degree of a right chriſten prince (as he called himſelfe) for maintenance of his quarrels in warre would not reuerence to prophane his ſacred eſtate, as dealing in diueliſh practiſes with miſbeleuers and witches, which malicie be full ſozlie ſalued (like one that to kill the ſtrong ſent of onions would cheate a clove of garlike) to a ſir and twentieth yeares after, he pact with pope Calixt the third, by whoſe mandat directed to his three delegats, the biſhops of Paris, Reſmes, and Conſtance, at the cathedrall church of Paris, in preſence of Jone (the puſels mother) John and Peter his brethren, the ſeuen and twentieth daie of November 1455, the validitie and goodneſſe of the proceſſe and ſentence vpon him was called in queſtion, and in great ſolemnitie ſit vpon.

Wherein the cauſe was ſo ſincerelie canuaſſed among them, that afterward, on the eight of Julie 1456, a quite contrarie ſentence was there declared: of effect, that this Jone (forſoth) was a damſell diuine, no fault in the Dolphin for his counſell and witcherie practiſes with him; the proceſſe, iudgement, and condemnation againſt him all wzong and iniurious. And for iuſtification and remembrance aſwell of his innocencie in life and death, as alſo of the ſinceritie of their later ſentence, a new croſſe in that old market to be reared. In this tale of Tillet is the further likened to Deboza, Tahell, and Judith, and vnto Romanee Clelia compared by Polydor, that ſhames not ſomewhat alſo to carpe at his iudgment, and much piſteth his paine. But what puritie or regard of deuotion or conſcience is in theſe writers trow yee, who make no conſideration of his heinous enormities, or elſe any difference betwene one ſtirred vp by mercie diuine, or naturall loue, and a damnable ſozcerer ſuborned by ſatan? And thus much of this gentle Jone, and of his good oratours that haue ſaid ſo well for him: now iudge as ye liſt.]

After the beſtowing of this Buſell in ſozt as yee haue heard, the ſiege ſtill continued before Campegne, and the duke of Bedford ſent to the duke of Burgogne lying at the ſiege, the earle of Huntingdon, and ſir John Robbert (two ſollie gentlemen, of no leſſe prudence to parle with the enimie, than purſuance to encounter them) with a thouſand archers (whoſe actiuitie, I warrant you, ſhod not then vpon the ſirſt trial) which dailie ſkirmiſhed with them within, and made ſuch baſtles & fortrefſes, that the towne had bene rendred into their hands, but that the duke of Burgogne departed from the ſiege to go into Babant, to receiue the poſſeſſion of that duchie, by the death of his couſin Philip the duke of that countie, as then departed this world.

Sir John de Lutzenburgh was left by the duke of Burgogne as generall of the ſiege before Campegne, the which he raiſed within a ſhort ſpace after, contrarie to the minds of the Engliſhmen, which were verie deſirous to haue lien there till the towne had bene rendered, which if the ſiege had bene continued but eight daies longer, muſt needs haue come to paſſe; by reaſon that peſtilence and famine had almoſt conſumed all the ſouldiers within the towne, ſo that it remained in maner without deſenſe. After the breaking vp of his ſiege, John duke of Norfolke toke againe the townes of Dampmartine, and the Chaſſe Spongaie, with diuerſe other townes. Alſo the earle of Stafford toke the towne of Bzin countie Robert, and from thence foraged all the countie to Sens, and after toke Duchnoie in Brie, Grand Puis, and Kampellon.

During this time, the Frenchmen on the other ſide toke Louiers, and Villeneuf. Then alſo did the towne of Melun rebell, and had ſuch aid of other townes adioining, that the Engliſh ſouldiers were ſaine to leaue Melun, Poiret, and Cozbell. Thus did things wauer in doubtfull balance betwixt the two nations Engliſh and French. But becauſe the Engliſh ſoze miſtruſted further danger, it was concluded, that king Henrie in his roiall perſon with a new armie ſhould come into France, partlie to viſit and comfort his owne ſubiects ther, and partlie either by feare or fauour (becauſe a child of his age and beautie doth commonlie procure them loue of elder perſons) to moue the Frenchmen to continue their due obediſſance towards him.

Wherefore after a great hoſt conuenient for that purpoſe aſſembled, and monie for maintenance of the warre readie gathered, and the realme ſet in an order vnder the gouernement of the duke of Gloceſter protector (which during the kings abſence appeared diuerſe riots, and puniſhed the offendours) the king with a great power toke ſhipping at Douer on ſaint Georges euen within night, and landed at Calis on the morrow being ſaint Georges daie, and ſundaie, by ſeuen of the clocke in the morning. He remained in Calis a good ſpace, and from thence he remoued to Rone, being there receiued with all triumph. He taried in that citie a long time, his nobles dailie conſulting on their great buſineſſe & weightie affaires.

In this kings time, & ſomewhat about this yeare, a certaine Wyet, whome a good honeſt widow had receiued into his houſe, and conceiued well of him in opinion, was by him mainteined of his owne purſe, & (as Polychronicon ſaith) ſhe found him of almes and ſoz Gods ſake. This charitable deed of hers deſerued a deuout mind to God ward, and a thankfull hart to him. But (good ſoule) how was ſhe recompenced? Euen murdered in his bed by the hands of that villaine whome ſo bountifullie ſhe ſuccoured, and motherlike tendered. Vnto which bloudie ſact (which was a preparatiue to a further miſcheefe byed in his vnaturall hart) he added another offence: ſoz when he had diſpatched the woman, viſing the riddance of hir to his aduantage, and as he had obtained oportunitie (to his thinking) he conuieced all that ſhe had a waie with him for his owne releſe. When being perſecuted with guiltineſſe of conſcience, which troubleth offendours with ceaſleſſe verations, and ſozceth them from place to place to ſeeke corners of euacion and ſhilt, he toke priuilege of holie church at ſaint Georges in Southwarke, where laſeng hands on the croſſe, as a ſhield of ſufficient ſafegard, he abiured this land, and by that meanes thought himſelfe free from afterclaps.

Neuertheleſſe, God (whoſe mercifull nature abhorreth the effuſion of mans blond) prepared a puniſhment for the malefactor, who paſſing through the ſuburbs of London, without Algate (the place where he had committed the murder) the women of the ſame pariſh and ſtreet (as it were intraged) came out with ſtones, ſlaues, kenell beeng, and other things, wherewith they ſo beſtwaſht him on all parts of his bodie, that they laid him a ſtretching, and rid him quite of life. In the working of this their teene they were ſo fell and fierce, that the conſtables with their aſſiſtants (which were no ſmall number) doing what they could by their authoritie and maine ſtrength, were not able to rescue him out of the womens hands; who had sworn in their hearts (as it seemed by the manner of their reuenge which was void of all mercie) to see the end of such a villaine as most unnaturallie had slaine a woman, a neighbour, a widow, a pittifull woman, a good neighbour, an honest widow; the wretch himselfe being a fugitiue, a stranger borne, a begger, and he to whome she shewed himselfe the staffe of his support. A singular ingratitude which nature abhorreth, law disalloweth, heauen disclaimeth, God detesteth, humanitie condemneth, and euerie good bodie to the verie death detesteth; as the old distichon excellentlie and with good sense noteth;

Damnant ingratus, sacrent illam quog, naturam.

But to returne to the affaires of king Henrie, who in the moneth of Nouember remoued from Rone to Montoile, and so to saint Denis, to the intent to make his entrie into Paris, and there to be sacred king of France. There were in his companie of his owne nation, his vncle the cardinall of Winchester, the cardinall and archbishop of Yorke, the dukes of Bedford, Yorke, and Suffolke, the earles of Warwicke, Salisburie, Oxford, Huntington, Omond, Poysaigne, and Suffolke. Of Gascoignes, there were the earles of Longuille and Parche, besides manie other noble men of England, Guien, and Normandie. And the chiefe of the French nation were the dukes of Burgognie, and Lewis of Lutzenburgh, cardinall and chancelor of France for king Henrie: the bishops of Beauuois and Poion, both peeres of France, beside the bishop of Paris, and diuerse other bishops; the earle of Wandemount, and other noble men, whose names were superfluous to rehearse. And he had in a gard about his person three thousand pice archers, some on horsebacke, and part on foot.

King Henrie
the sixt crowned in Paris.

Le Roier
historiall.

To speake with what honour he was receiued into the citie of Paris, what pageants were prepared, and how richlie the gates, streets, and bridges on euerie side were hangd with costlie clothes of arras & tapestrie, it would be too long a procelle, and therefore I doe here passe it ouer with silence. On the thienteenth daie of December, he was crowned king of France, in our ladie church of Paris, by the cardinall of Winchester, the bishop of Paris not being contented that the cardinall should doe such an high ceremonie in his church and iurisdiction. After all the ceremonies were finished, the king returned toward the palace, hauing one crowne on his head, and another borne before him; and one scepter in his hand, and the second borne before him. As touching other the totall seruices and princelie appointments, they are verie diligentlie & at large set out in the French chronicle of that time. This coronation of the king, Anglorum prelia as manie other good and memorable matters, so this also he hath noted, saing thereof in comelic breuitie and truth, as after followeth:

Aeterna fame paulo post rege sepulto,

Parisus diadema vias & compita circum

Iunior Henricus portat lepidissimus infans.

This high and tofous scass passed not without some spot of displeasure among the English nobilitie: for the cardinall of Winchester, which at this time would haue no man be equall with him, commanded the duke of Bedford to leaue off the name of regent, during the time that the king was in France, affirming the chiefe ruler being in presence, the authoritie of the substitute to be cleerlie derogate, according to the common saying; In the presence of the higher power, the smaller giveth place. The duke of Bedford took such a secret displeasure with this doing, that he neuer after fauoured the cardinall, but stood against him in all things that he would haue forward. This was the root (as some haue thought) of that diuision amongst the English nobilitie, where through their glorie within the realme of France began first to decline.

The next daie after the solempne feast of the kings coronation, were kept triumphant iusts and toyncis, in the which the earle of Arundell, and the bastard of S. Paule, by the iudgement of the ladies wonne the pize. The king kept open hall the space of five daies to all commers, and after (because the aire of Paris seemed contrarie to his pure complexion) by the aduise of his counsell, he remoued to Rone, where he kept his Christmass. But before his departure from Paris, the noble men as well of France and Normandie did to him homage, and the common people sware to him fealtie. In this meane time, sir Francis called the Aragoignois, a noble capteine of the English part in Normandie, took by force and policie the towne of Pontargis, with a great pize of treasure and prisoners, and put therein a garrison, leaving it well furnished with vittels and munition.

About the same time, the earle of Arundell, being truelie informed that the lord Boufasc marshall of France was come to Beauuois, intending to doe some feat in Normandie, assembled the number of three and twentie hundred men, and comming nere to the said towne of Beauuois, sent a great number of light horsemen to run before the towne, to traine out the Frenchmen within; the which issuing out and following the English horsemen vnto their stile, were so inclosed and fought with, that in maner all the number of them, save a few which fled backe into the towne with the marshall, were slaine or taken. Amongst other of the chiefe prisoners, that valiant capteine Ponton de Santrails was one, who without delaie was exchanged for the lord Talbot, before taken prisoner at the battell of Patate. There was also taken one called the shepheard, a simple man, and a filie soule; but yet of such reputation for his supposed holinesse amongst the Frenchmen, that if he touched the wall of any of their aduersaries towne, they beleued verelie it would incontinentlie fall downe.

The lord Talbot ransomed
by exchange.

The shepheard was taken.

This chance succeeded not fortunatlie alone vnto the English nation, for Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwicke had a great skirmish before the towne of Courte, where he discomfited and repelled his enemies: and beside those that were slaine, he took fortie horsemen, all being gentlemen of name and armes. Like chance happened to the friends of king Charles, towards the marches of Lorraine, where Reigner duke of Bar besieged the towne of Claude mont pertaining to the earle thereof named Anthoine, coufine to the same duke Reigner. This earle, before the dukes approaching, left a conuenient crue within the towne to defend it, and with all speed rode to the dukes of Bedford and Burgognie, being then at the foresaid great triumph at Paris, where he purchased such fauour at their hands, because he had euer taken their parts, that not onelie sir John Falstolfe was appointed to go with him, hauing in his companie sir hundred archers, but also the duke of Burgognies marshall named sir Anthoine Loolongon, accompanied with sixtine hundred other men of warre.

60

When the duke of Bar heard that his enemies were thus comming towards him, like a hardie capteine he raised his siege, and met face to face with the earle and his companie, betwene whom was a cruell and mortall battell. The horsemen of the French side endured long, but in conclusion the English archers so galled their horses, and so wounded the men, that the Barrois, Almaines, and other of duke Reigners side were compelled to flee. In the chase was taken

ken the duke of Bar, the bishop of Metz, the lord of Roquemaque, sir Gerard of Salsburgh, the Viscount Barrie, and two hundred other, beside three thousand which were slain.

In this luckie time also, no lesse occasion of victorie was offered to the Englishmen in an other part, if they could have used it with such circumspect warrenesse as had bene expedient. For Robert lord Willoughbie, and Matthew Gough, a valiant Welshman, with sixtene hundred Englishmen, laid siege to a towne in Anton called saint Senerine. Whereof Charles the French king being aduertised, sent with all speed the lord Ambrose de Loxe, with manie noble men to the succours of them within the towne, where of the same lord Ambrose was captaine: and therefore made the more hast to releue his deputie, and the other being more stoutly besieged, but yet staied at the towne of Beaumont, till his whole power might come to him.

The Englishmen aduertised of this intent of the captaine, came vpon him in the night, and found the Frenchmens watch so out of order, that a thousand men were entered into the campe before they were espied: by reason whereof the Englishmen found small resistance. But when the daie began to appeare, and that the sunne had set forth his bright beames abroad, that all things might be seene, the Englishmen giuen whole to spoile, followed not their enemies in chase, but being contented with their preie and gaite, began to retreat toward the siege againe, which the lord Willoughbie still maintained with a part of the armie.

But for the chance. The Frenchmen which were coming after, hearing by the noise of the people that some fraie was at hand, put spurres to their horses, and set on the Englishmen pestered with bag and baggage of the spoile and preie which they had gotten in the French campe. The other of the Frenchmen which before had fled, returned againe, and assisted their fellows: so that the Englishmen being taken out of order, were compelled to flee, of whom Matthew Gough and diuerse other were taken prisoners. And yet of the other part manie were slain, and a great number taken: amongst whom was the lord de Loxe, who (for all that the Frenchmen could doe) was kept, and not deliuered. The lord Willoughbie hearing of this mishap, raised his siege, and departed verie sore displeased in his mind, but could not remedie it.

About this season, Nicholas the cardinall of the holie crosse was sent into France, as a legat from Eugene the fourth as then bishop of Rome, to treat a peace betwene the Englishmen and Frenchmen. But when after great instance and labour made betwene the parties, he saw their obstinate and forward minds, nothing inclined to any agreement, he was so much at their hands by earnest sute, that a truce was granted to indure for six yeares to come: but as the same was hardlie granted, so was it of the Frenchmen soon and lightlie broken. For the baron of Durance newlie made earle of Dunois, toke by treason the towne of Chartres from the Englishmen, affirming by the law of armes, that stealing or buting a towne, without inuasion or assault, was no breach of league, amitie, or truce. In which towne he slew the bishop, because he was a Burgoniam. Whereby did new malice increase, and mostall warre began to be put in vie.

Whilste these things were doing in France, the cardinall of Winchester was come backe againe into England, to appease certaine commotions and sturres attempted by sundrie persons vnder colour of religion: but after that William Handeuille, and John Sharpe the chief authors thereof were agree-bended and executed by the gouernour and the kings iustices, the residue yielded and confessed their offences, whereof two articles were these (as some write) that priests should haue no possessions, and that all things by the order of charitie among christian people should be in common. Other thought their opinions were not such errors, but that their enemies spread abroad such rumors of them, to make them more odious to the people.

After that, a parlement was called by the duke of Glocester, in the which monie was assigned to be leuied, and men appointed, which should passe ouer into France to the aid of the duke of Bedford, for the maintenance of the warres: because it was suspected the truce would not long continue. During this parlement, James the king of Scots sent ambassadors to conclude a peace with the duke of Glocester, who (because the king was absent) referred the matter to the three estates. After long consultation, not without great arguments, a peace was concluded. When the parlement was ended, the cardinall well furnished with men & monie, departed out of England, and came to Rome to the king, to whom also reformed the duke of Bedford from Paris, to consult of things not vnlikelie to follow.

Herevpon a great councell was kept in the castell of Rome, and manie doubts moued, and few weightie things out of hand concluded. At length, after great disputation, with manie arguments ended, the dukes of Bedford and Yorke, and Edmund late earle of Mortaigne, and now (by the death of John duke of Summerfet, leauing behind him a sole daughter and heire, married to the earle, and called Margaret after the countesse of Richmond) attained to the name and title of duke of Summerfet, approved the reason of those, that held it expedient to haue an armie in a readinesse for defense, least the Frenchmen suddenlie should attempt any enterprise to the danger of the Englishmen, and losse of those townes and countries that were vnder them.

When all things were agreed, king Henrie came to Calis, from thence to Douer, and so by easie tourneys the one and twentieth daie of Februarie to London, where he was triumphantlie receiued, and richlie presented, as in the chronicles of Robert Fabian it maie at large appeare. After that the king was departed into England, the duke of Bedford regent of France, and captaine of Calis, taried behind in the marches of Picardie, where he was informed certaine souldiers of Calis grudging at the restraint of wolles, began to murmur against the king and his councell, to some danger of the towne. The duke vpon due examination had, caused diuerse to be put to death, and manie banished that towne and marches for euer.

In the meane time, the ladie Anne duchesse of Bedford departed this life at Paris, by whose death the fast knot of faithfull friendship betwixt the duke of Bedford and his brother in law the duke of Burgonie began somewhat to slacken. Shortly after, to wit, about the beginning of the next yeare 1433, the said duke of Bedford being thus a widower, through the perswasion of the lord Lewes of Lutzenburgh bishop of Teruine and Elie, and chancellor of France for king Henrie, agreed to marrie the ladie Jaquet, daughter to Peter earle of saint Paule, and neece to the said bishop, and to the lord John of Lutzenburgh.

The mariage was solemnized at Teruine with great triumph. Which ended, the duke with his new spouse (being about the age of seauentene yeares) came vnto Calis, and so into England, from whence in the moneth of August next he returned to Paris. The duke of Burgonie, though nothing pleased with this new alliance contracted by the duke of Bedford, with the house of Lutzenburgh, but yet not able to do any thing to let it; because of the marriage consummate yet he could find any power or knowledge to hinder it. Whil实现 these things were a doing, in some places the French souldiers of the Dolphins, lacking wages (as the time serued) took both Englishmen and Burgognians, ransoming and spoiling them at their pleasure. Herewith the regent much moued, prepared for warre after six moneths the truce had bene taken: and so the warre againe was renewed.

The Frenchmen brake the peace and take the town of Saint Valerie.

The Frenchmen anon as open truce-breakers, raised a cruie, and suddenlie take the towne of saint Valerie in Normandie, nere to the mouth of the riuer of Seine. An other armie, vnder the leading of sir Ambrose de Loe, wasted and destroyed all the countrie about Caen. The duke of Bedford on his part sent the earle of Arundell, the earle of Warwickes sonne, the lord Lisle Adam marshall of France for king Henrie, and twelue hundred men of warre with ordinance and munition to besiege the towne of Laigntie vpon the riuer of Mayne. The earle with shot of canon brake the arch of the bridge, and got from the Frenchmen their bulwourke, and set it on fire. Divers assaults were attempted, but the towne was well defended: for there were within it an eight hundred men of armes, besides other meane souldiers.

Laigntie besieged.

The duke of Bedford herewith gathered an armie of six thousand men, whereof were capitains; Robert lord Willoughbie, sir Andrew Wgard chamberlaine to the duke, sir John Saluaine bailiffe of Rone, sir John Pontgomerie bailiffe of Caen, sir Philip Hall bailiffe of Aernouill, sir Richard Kitchiffe deputie of Calis, sir Rafe Peuill, sir Rafe Standish, sir John Hanford, sir Richard Cuthin, sir Richard Harington bailiffe of Curreur, sir William Fulthorpe, sir Thomas Griffin of Ireland, David Hall, Thomas Strangwith, Leonard Dunsfons esquiers, and Thomas Gerard. All gentlemen of courage, and as forward to giue the French the foile, as the French for their liues to giue them the discomfiture. But vnto which side the victorie should befall, uncerteine it was before the trial of both their chanches had determined the doubt by the euent of the conflict.

The duke of Bedford furnished with this armie and companie of worthie capitains came to the siege before Laigntie, where he made a bidge of boats, and fought his ordinance so nere the towne, that to all people it seemed not long able to resist. But the earle of Dunois, otherwise called the bastard of France, with diuerse hardie capitains, as valiantlie defended as the Englishmen assaulted. At length the French king, perceiuing this towne to be the three corners here betwene the territories Burgognion, English, and French, and the losse thereof should turne him to irreuocable damage, sent the lord of Rieux, Poiton, the Hire, the lord Caluocourt, and six thousand men, with great plentie of vittels, to the intent either to raise the siege, or else to vittell the towne.

The Frenchmen made a brag, as though they would haue assailed the Englishmen in their campe, but when they perceiued the courage of the lord regent, and the desire he had to fight, they framed themselves so in order of battell, as though they could do all things, and yet in effect did nothing: but that whil实现 part of them maintained a skirmish, a sort of rude & rusticall persons were appointed to conueie into the towne thirtie oren, and other small vittels. But this sweet gaine was deuelie paid for, if the losse with the gaine be pondered in equal balance: for hauing regard to their 30 leane oren, in the skirish were slaine the lord Saintretelles brother to that valiant capteine Poiton de Saintretelles, also capteine John brother to the lord Caluocourt, and fiftie other noble and valiant personages.

The Frenchmen thus politike hauing done their feat, in the beginning of August, remoued their armie vnto Fort vnder Per, where, by a bidge of tuns they passed into the Ile of France. The duke of Bedford (like a wise pince) not minding to leaue the more in icopardie for hope of the lesse, nor the accident for the substance, raised his siege, and returned to Paris, nothing more minding than to trie his quarrell with dint of sword against the enimies, if they would thereto agree. And hereupon sent Bedford his herald to the lord Caluocourt and other capitains of the French armie, offering them battell and a pitched field within a conuenient time, and where they would appoint. The French capitains answered the English herald, that there was time to gaine, and time to lose: and for choice of times they would vse their owne discretions.

Shortlie after, Piers Aubeuense constable of the castell of Rone, corrupted with monie, suffered the marshall of France, with two hundred other, as persons disguised to enter the place by stealth: but they were some espyed, and driuen to the dungeon, where they were constrained to yeld themselves prisoners: of the which some were hanged, some beheaded, and some ransomed, at the pleasure of the regent. This pageant thus played, the lord regent sent the earle of saint Paule, and Robert lord Willoughbie, with a competent number of men to besiege the towne of S. Valerie, which the Frenchmen a little before had taken. This siege continued the space of thre weeks; at the end whereof the Frenchmen within yelded the towne, and departed with their horse and harnesse onelic to them saued.

The earle put there in garrison fresh and valiant souldiers, and appointed capteine there, sir John Aubenond. In the same towne (whether by infection of aire, or by corrupt vittels, which the townsmen did eat) a great pestilence shortlie after happened, which consumed within a small time two parts of the people. The earle of saint Paule, and the lord Willoughbie returning backe to the regent, were so fullie receiued, and within a while after, the earle departed from Paris to laie siege to the castell of Monchas. But being incamped nere the towne of Blangie, he by a sudden maladie departed this life, the last of August, leaving his seigniories to Elwes de Lutzenburgh his sonne and heire. Because this dead earle was father in law to the regent, solempne obsequies were kept for him both in Paris and in London.

In the meane season, the Frenchmen entering into high Burgognie, burnt, take, and destroyed diuerse townes; whereupon the Burgognians assembled a great armie, both to reuenge their quarrels, and to recouer their townes taken from them. So thome as to his friends the duke of Bedford sent the lord Willoughbie, and sir Thomas Kirrell, with a conuenient number of souldiers, which entering into the lands of Laonnois, were encountered with a great power of their enimies. But after long fight, the Frenchmen were ouerthrowne, and of them left dead in the field an hundred and fiftie horsemen, besides prisoners, which after vpon urgent cause were all killed.

Whil实现 these things happened thus in France, John lord Talbot gathered together a cruie of chosen men of warre in England, to the number of eight hundred, and sailed into Normandie, and passed by Rone to Paris. In his waie he took the strong castell of Joing betwene Beauuois and Gisors, and caused all the Frenchmen within to be taken and hanged, and after rased and defaced the castell. After he had rested himselfe a while at Paris, and taken advise with the counsell there, what waie it should be best for him to take, without prolonging time; he with the lord de Lisle Adam and others, departed from thence, having in their retinues sixtene hundred men of warre. And coming to the castell of Amboise, wherof was capteine sir Amadour de Chignols brother to the Wyre, they found it abandoned by them that had it in keeping, who were withdrawn to the towne of Creill.

Whither therefore the lord Talbot followed, who having in a skermish the said Amadour, he wan at length the said towne of Creill, and after the townes of Mont St. Parence, Beaufaile in Chinoie, la Rouge maison, Crespie in Alalois, & Cleremont in Beauvois, and after with great riches and good prisoners returned to Paris. Neither had the lord Talbot such good and prosperous successe alone, but the earle of Arundell also at the very same season took the castell of Somelme, & rased it to the ground, after he got by force the castell of Dozle, & from thence came to St. Seleine, where the lord Ambrose de Loe, being capteine, issued out and fought with the Englishmen so egerlie, that he drove them backe an arrow shot by fine force: but the earle so encouraged his men, that they gave a fresh onset upon the Frenchmen, and followed it so fiercely, that they slew a great number of them, and drove the residue into the towne.

After this victorie, he besieged Louiers, wherof was capteine the Wyre, and his brother, who rendered the towne without assault. Then the earle assembling together a great armie, returned againe to St. Seleine, & intreated the towne with a strong siege. When he had lien there almost thre moneths, evincing daie attempting or doing somewhat, he finally gave so fierce an assault, that by force he entered the towne, and slew John Alnaigne, and Guillian saint Albine, the chiefe captaines, and eight hundred other men of warre. The children of le seigneur de Loe were taken prisoners. The earle put new men of warre into the towne, and made capteine there sir John Cornetwall. After this, he before the strong towne of Billie pitched his campe. The inhabitants terrified at the losse of saint Seleine, delivered him pledges, upon condition; that if they were not rescued within thirtie daies next, then they (their lives saved) should render the towne into his possession: which offer was received.

The French king, being advertised hercof by a post, appointed (as some saie) Arthur earle of Richemont; as other write, John duke of Alanson with a great companie of men of warre to go to the rescue of this towne. But whether it was the earle or duke, certeine it is at his approaching to the siege, he incamped himselfe by a brooke side, over the which a man might have striden, & perceiving how stronglie the English were incamped against him, he thought it not for his profit to give battell; & so in the night season raised & went his waie without further attempt. When they within the towne knew that their succours failed, they rendered themselves to the mercie of the earle of Arundell, who gentlie received them, and leaving a garrison in the towne, departed to Paris, and in his waie took the castels of Pellale and saint Laurence. About this time the lord Willoughbie & sir Thomas Kirick, returning with great victorie out of Burgonie, passing by the towne of Louiers, lately reduced to the English obedience, furnished it both with men and munition.

Among so many good chances, some evil are accustomed to happen, or else the gainers would not know themselves. And so at this time it happened, that a great number of the common and rusticall people in Normandie dwelling by the sea coast, either provoked by the French king, or desirous of alteration and change (which thing the commons much covet and desire) made an insurrection, put on barres, and by force expelled certeine English garrisons out of their holds, publishing and proclaiming openlie, that their onelie purpose and intent was to expell and banish the whole English nation out of their countries and coasts. Wherefore it maie be likelie, that the blacke Norman will sooner become white, than the people bred in France will heartilie love an English boine. For it standeth not with their envious nature to alter their malicious manners; as the old pouverbe saith truelie of them:

These rebels thus fantastickly assembled, with all speed marched toward Caen, to the intent there both to increase their number, and also to consult what waie they should follow in their new begun enterprise. But the dukes of Booke and Summeret, then lieng in Normandie, having perfect knowledge hereof, immediatlie sent forth the earle of Arundell, and the lord Willoughbie with six thousand archers, and thirtie hundred light horsemen, to staie and keepe them from making any further progresse. The earle of Arundell appointed the lord Willoughbie, with two thousand archers, and certeine horsemen to go afore him, and lie in a skale within some covert place. Which done, the earle followed; & so keeping in the multitude at the backe, drove them before him as deere into a buckesale: and when the miserable wretches came nere to the skale, the earle made a token, whereat a gun shot off for a signe. Therewith the lord Willoughbie set on them before, and the earle behind, shooting so fiercely, that the poor creatures, wounded and galled with the shot of arrowes, threw awaie their harness, and cried out instantlie for mercie.

The earle of Arundell moved with compassion, caused his souldiers to staie from further slaughter, and apprehending those that were known to be stirrers and leaders of the rest, let the other returne home without further damage: but yet, per the souldiers could be brought backe under their standards, there were about a thousand of the rebels slaine. And this commotion thus appeased, upon inquirie of the principall offenders, such as were found guiltie were put to terrible executions; as they had well deserved. During which rebellion, Peter Rokeford and his companie gat by treason the towne of Diepe, and diverse other holds thereto adjoining. After the earle of Arundell had obtained so good successe in his enterprises (as partly ye have heard) he attempted another, which was the last worke and small labour of his living daies. For the duke of Bedford, being informed that his adversaries had gotten the towne of Rue, and therein put a garrison, which so vexed the countries of Ponthieu, Arthois, and Boulonois, sent word to the earle that he without delay should besiege the said towne.

The earle obeying his commandement assembled his people, and came to Courneie, where he heard tell how there was a castell nere to Beauvois called Gerberois, the which being fallen in decay, Charles the French king had appointed sir Stephan de Uignois, commonlie called the Wyre, to repaire and newlie to fortifie, because it was commodiouslie to serve as a countergarrison against the English townes and fortresses on those frontiers. The earle advertised hercof, and perceiving that this new building would be greatlie prejudiciall to the Englishmen, determined first to dispossesse his enemies of that place, supposing to find small resistance: but he was deceived. For there was the said Wyre, and three thousand men of warre with him. The erle comming thither, incamped himselfe with five hundred horsemen in a little close not farre from the castell.

The Frenchmen, perceiuing that the erle and his horses were wearie, and that his archers were not yet come, determined to set vpon him before the coming of his footmen, the which they knew to be little more than a mile behind. Wherefore for a policie, they set forth fiftie horsemen, as though there had bene no mo within the castell. The erle perceiuing this, sent forth sir Randolfe Standish to encounter them, hauing with him an hundred horses. The Frenchmen fought couragiously awhile, and suddenlie came out all the remnant, and slew sir Randolfe Standish and all his companie, and boldlie set on the erle and his band, which manfully resisted the Frenchmen, till at length the Wyre caused three culuerings to be shot off amongst the Englishmen, wherof one strake the erle on the ancle, and so brake his leg, that for paine he fell from his horse.

Then the Frenchmen entered amongst the Englishmen, toke the erle lying on the ground, with sir Richard Wodville, and sir Ioseph more, and there were slaine almost two hundred. The residue saved themselves as well as they might. The erle was caried to Beaunois, where of his hurt he shortly died, & was buried in the frier priours. He was a man of singular vertue, constancie, and grauitie, whose death in so troublous a season did sore appall the hearts of the English people. Thus oftentimes varied the chance of doubtful warre, so that one time the Englishmen got by assault, and yielded diuerse strong townes, castles, and piles: and at another season the French people, sometime by bargaine, sometime by assault obtained the same againe, or other in their stead.

The duke of Bourbon dieth at London.

About the moneth of June in this twelfth yeare, John duke of Bourbon and Auvergne, taken prisoner at the battell of Agincourt eightene yeeres past (as before ye haue heard) now paying his ranstone, which was eightene thousand pounds sterling, was taken with a most sore and grievous feuer, the which made an end of his life in the citie of London, on the same daie that was appointed for his departure towards France, whose corpse was interred in the grate friers of the same citie. This yeare also about the latter end of Maie, was a meeting appointed to be had at saint Omers betwixt the dukes of Bedford and Burgonie, for the qualifying of certeine displeasures and grudges betwixt them kindled and maintained by some flattering tale-tellers, who raising matters of reproch touching their honors, bred such grudges, that all lone betwixt them ceased, all affinitie reiected, and all old friendship for gotten; such enuie insuech where enmitie once hath princes hearts possessed.

W. P.

These two dukes come into the towne of saint Omers, the duke of Bedford being then regent of France, some, brother, and vnckle to kings, thought that the duke of Burgonie should haue come and visited him in his lodging. The duke of Burgonie on the other part, being lord and soueraine of the towne, iudged it as much vnmet for him to go to the regent where he was lodged. Holbeith by intreatie of friends, to meet in a place indifferent betwixt both their lodgings was appointed; which offer not accepted, both parties departed discontent, and neuer after saw no; communed togither. Thus by the proud disdain & enuious discord of these two high stomached princes, Bedford not minding to haue a nie pere, and Burgonie not willing to abtine a nie superior, shortly after England much lost, and Burgonie greatlie gained not, as by the sequelle may appeare.

The bastard of Orleans, called the erle of Daunois, the lord Bedford marshall of France, with other, in the beginning of this thirtieth yeare, toke the towne of St. Denis by treason, skitnished with them of Paris, and leauing behind them a great garrison, toke the towne of Holwone, and Pont saint Parent by composition. And at the same time was the towne of Pont Neuil taken by the sudden scaling of two fishermen, who entered by at a common priue standing in the wall. Thus warre continually lasted betwixt these two mightie nations, English and French, within the realme of France (than which therefore no countrie thought more miserable.) And though the poore people and inhabitants of the good townes and villages, sustained most losse in their substance, yet the men of warre oftentimes paid deare for the bargaine, being daily slaine, wounded, and taken prisoners: for warre seldom beareth anie other fruit.

[It may serue verie well here to recount, how somewhat before these dates, Martin the sixt, in the fiftieth yeare of his popedom, An. 1431, agreeing vpon a generall counsell to be holden at Basill the same yeare, did anon after decesse: whom Eugenie the fourth succeeding, and liking right well of the time and place, by his authoritie signified and sent with Julian Cesarine his legat, did confirme the choise. Whereupon as the counsell the ninetieth of Julie the same 1431 was there begun, and his holiness sone after aduertised how malapertlie his ghoellie children had imbusied themselves in chocking at their holie fathers faults, and about reformation of his church at Rome; his sublimitie therat highlie offended (for great cause it had) commanded his legat by and by to dissolue that synod, and in his name to appoint a new at Ferrara, and so come his waie: vnder colour forsooth how that place was meetest for the prelates of the Graie church, who had to confer with the Latine counsell about points of religion, wherein they long had remained at square.

But these Basillien clerks, there still fastlie contending themselves, so smallie regarded this summons of Eugenie (who then with his prelates, as the time was run on, vpon propagation from Ferrara kept an other counsell at Florence 1439) as by a confident countermand cited Eugenie & all his cardinals to come to them at their solemne set counsell at Basill. Which his supremaie (for so best became it, notwithstanding sundrie citations) utterlie contemning to do, they sone after like verte impious imps, first for contumacie accursed his holie fatherhood, then depriued him of his papacie, and out of hand chose another in his office, one Amedeus late duke of Savoye, who afore that time hauing giuen by his possessions & dignitie vnto his children, became an heremite in a monasterie of his owne building by mount Ceuenna in Sauoye nigh the lake Aeman, where he by title of Decanus militum Iesu Christi, and ten more of nobilitie with him, had settled themselves to liue.

The vertuous minded man thus chosen pope by spirituall counsell inueigled, lest the holie life (such as it was) that he had profess, toke the papacie vpon him the same 1439, and called Felix the sixt, which promotion yet he not long intored. For after, by his succellour Nicholas the sixts ambition, that had suborned emperour Frederike to be a worker in the matter, this little Amedeus was confined of his popes golden crowne for a cardinals felt hat. Then (good man) at last could he find, whether were nearer to christen profession, the life of a vertuous prince ruling in iustice, of a solitarie heremite vertuoullie occupied, of an impetuous pope that may know no pere, or of a licentious cardinal to liue as he list. This poore prince had experience of all, & then knew the the best: when well might he lament him, but too late repent him.

And in the fift yeare of this Basilien counsell that had a continuance of eleuen yeare (whereof an eight were run per felix was chosen, in which gentle remaining pope still, though of curst hart he neuer came at them) motion was made among the gillimund the emperour and other christen kings (who for appealing this schisme betwene the pope and his prelats, were all present by person or pproxie) that sith such horroz of bloodshed betwene the two nations continuallie so lamentable raged in France, some mediation might be made for accord: whereof one thing seemed to minister occasion of the moze hope, because the duke of Burgognie was willing (so that it were not of his owne sute) to returne and reconcile himselfe with the French king his mortall enemye and ancient aduersarie.]

Solemn
treatie of peace
at Brabant.

Whereupon by authoritie of this generall counsell, two graue prelats, the one Nicholas Albergat a Carthusian frier, intituled for pfect cardinall of the holie crosse; the other Hugh Lusignan a Cyprian, Creke, bishop cardinall of Venesse in Italie, came to the towne of Arras in Arthois, whither were sent from the king of England, Henrie Beauford cardinall of Winchester, Henrie archbishop of Poike, William de la Pole earle of Suffolke, and John Holland earle of Huntington, with diuerse other knights and esquieres. And for the French king were there present Charles duke of Bourbon, Lewis erle of Glendoune, Arthur of Britaine constable of France, the archbishop of Reimes, and sir Phillip Harecourt. The duke of Burgognie was there in proper person, accompanied with the duke of Guelders, and the earles of Estampes, Ligne, S. Paule, Namement, Peures, and Daniell sonne to the prince of Orange, with a great gard and a gallant companie.

Upon the date of the first session, the cardinal of S. Crosse declared to the thre parties the innumerable mischaues, that had followed to the whole state of the christen common-wealth by their continuall dissention and daily discorde, exhorting them for the honour of God, & for the loue which they ought to beare towards the advancement of his faith and true religion, to conforme themselves to reason, and to laie aside all rancor, malice and displeasure, so that in concluding a goodlie peace, they might receiue profit and quietnesse here in this world, and of God an euerslasting reward in heauen. After this admonition, and diuerse daies of communication, euerie partie brought in their demands, which were most contrarie, and farre from anie likelihood of comming to a good conclusion.

The Englishmen would that king Charles should haue nothing but what it pleased the king of England, and that not as dutie, but as a benefit by him of his mere liberalitie giuen and distributed. The Frenchmen on the other part would that k. Charles should haue the kingdome franklie and free, and that the king of England should leaue the name, armes, and title of the king of France, and to be content with the dukedomes of Aquitaine and Normandie, and to forsake Paris, and all the townes which they possessed in France, betwene the riuers of Soine and Loire, being no parcell of the duchie of Normandie. As he briefe, the demands of all parts were betwene them so farre out of square, as hope of concord there was none at all.

The cardinals seeing them so farre in sunder, minded not to dispute their titles, but offered them reasonable conditions of truce and peace for a season, which notwithstanding, either of stowardnesse, or of disdain on both parts, were openlie refused. Insomuch that the Englishmen in great displeasure, departed to Calis, and so into England. One writer affirmeth, that they being warned of a secret conspiracie moued against them, suddenly departed from Arras, and so returned into their countrie. But what cause so euer hindered their accord and unitie (sith this and that may be surmized) certene it is, that the onelie and principall cause was, for that the God of peace and loue was not among them, without whom no discorde is quenched, no knot of concord fastened, no bond of peace confirmed, no distracted minds reconciled, no true friendship mainteined: for had he bene among them, their dissenting and wastward willes had founded the sweet harmonie of amiable peace, which of all things that God hath bestowed vpon man is the verie best, and moze to be set by than manie triumphs, as the poet excellentie well saith:

pax optima rerum Quas homini nouisse datum: pax una triumphis Innumerus potior, pax custodire salutem Et cines agitare potens.

Sil. Ital. lib. 11.

Now whiles this treatie of peace was in hand, the lord Talbot, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Scales, with the lord Aile Adam, and five thousand men of warre, besieged the towne of saint Denis with a strong hand. The earle of Dunois hearing hereof, accompanied with the lord Rohac, and the lord Bueil, with a great compaignie of hoillement hastied thither, towards to raise the siege, and by the waie encountered with sir Thomas Kiriell, and Mattheu Cough, riding also toward saint Denis, betwene whom was a great conflict. But suddenly came to the aid of the Frenchmen the garrison of Pont Meulan, which caused the Englishmen to returne without anie great harme or damage: sauing that Mattheu Cough by foundering of his horse was taken, and carried to Pont Meulan.

* Or Goche.

In the meane time was the towne of saint Denis rendered to the Englishmen, the which raced the walles and fortifications, sauing the walles of the abbey, and of the towne called Menin. Shortly after the towne of Pontois, where sir John Kuppelle was capteine, rebelled; and by force the Englishmen were expelled, the inhabitants yielding themselves to the French king. This towne was small, but the losse was great, because it was the keie that opened the passage betwixt the cities of Paris and Rone. But now to returne to the communication at Arras, which after the departure of the English commissioners held betwixt the Frenchmen & Burgognians, till at length a peace was concluded, accorded, and sworn betwixt king Charles and duke Phillip of Burgognie, vpon certene conditions, as in the French histories moze plainlie appeareth.

S. Denis taken by the Englishmen,

A peace between Charles of France and the duke of Burgognie,

And after, the duke of Burgognie, to set a besse before the king of Englandes eyes, sent Thoisin Pore his chiefe herald to king Henrie with letters, excusing the matter by way of information, that he was constrained to enter in this league with k. Charles, by the daily outcries, complaints, and lamentations of his people; alledging against him, that he was the onlie cause of the long continuance of the wars, to the bitter impouering of his owne people, and the whole nation of France. Therefore sith he could not otherwise do, but partlie to content his owne people, and chesellie to satisfie the request of the whole generall counsell, was in manner compelled for his part to growe vnto a peace and amitie with king Charles.

He likewise wished that king Henrie, vpon reasonable and honozable conditions of agreement offered, should in no wise refuse the same: whereby the long continued warre at length might cease and take end, to the pleasure of almighty God, which is the author of peace and unitie: & hereto he promised him his aid and furtherance, with manie gaine words, which I passe over. The superscription of this letter was thus. [To the high and mightie prince, Henrie by the grace of God king of England, his welbelovéd couline.] Neither naming him king of France, nor his soueraigne lord, according as (ever before that time) he was accustomed to do. This letter was much marvelled at of the counsell, after they had throughlie considered all the contents thereof, & they could not but be much disquieted, so far forth that diuerse of them offended so much with the vntruth of the duke, that they could not temper their passions, but openlie called him traitor.

But when the rumor of the dukes revolting was published amongst the people, they left words, and fell to bestowing of stripes: for being pricked with these euill tidings, they ran in great outrage vpon all the Flemings, Hollanders, and Burgognions, which then inhabited within the citie of London, and the suburbs of the same, and slue and hurt a great number of them before they, by the kings proclamation, could be staied from such inuiouous doing: for the king nothing more minded than to saue innocent blood, and to defend them that had not offended. The officer at armes was willed to tell his maister, that it stood not with his honor to be enimie to the English nation; and that his dutie had bene to keepe his ancient truth and allegiſance, rather than to be occasion of new warre. And what a new reconciled enimie was in respect of an old tried friend, he might thorowlie find. [When the messenger with this answer was dispatched, and vpon consultation found, a matter standing both with good policie in forcing the proud subject to know his obedience, and also with great equitie to twitt a quarreller with such pinfars as wherewith afore he had nipt another, so was it anon brought about, that sundrie of his good townes and cities rebelled against him, whereby (lesse to his liking than to his deseruing) he was verie well made to bite of a chokepeare of his owne grafting.]

This yeare the fourteenth daie of September died John duke of Bedford, regent of France, a man both politike in peace, and hardie in warre, and yet no more hardie than mercifull when he had the victorie, whose bodie was with all funerall solemnities buried in the cathedrall church of our ladie in Rone, on the north side of the high altar, vnder a sumptuous and costlie monument. Which some when king Lewis the eleauenth, by certeine vndiscreet persons was counselled to deface, affirming that it was a great dishonour both to the king and to the realme, to see the enimie of his father and theirs to haue so solemne and rich a memorie: he answered saleng, What honour shall it be to vs, or to you, to breake this monument, and to pull out of the ground the dead bones of him, whome in his life neither my father nor your progenitors, with all their power, puissance, and friends were once able to make flee one foot backward; but by his strength, wit, and policie, kept them all out of the principall dominions of the realme of France, and out of this noble and famous duchie of Normandie: Wherefore I saie, first, God haue his soule, and let his bodie now lie in rest, which when he was alive, would haue disquieted the proudest of vs all. And as for the tome, I assure you, it is not so desecrat nor conuenient, as his honour and acts deserue, although it were much richer, and more beautiful.

The frost was so extreame this yeare, beginning about the nine and twentieth daie of Nouember, and continuing till the tenth of Februarie, that the ships with merchandize arriuing at the Thames mouth, could not come by the riuer: so their lading there saine to be discharged, was brought to the citie by land. After the death of that noble prince the duke of Bedford, the bright sunne in France toward Englishmen, began to be cloudie, and daile to darken, the Frenchmen began not onlie to withstande their obedience by oth to the king of England, but also tooke sword in hand & openlie rebelled. Notwithstanding all these mishaps could not anie thing abate the valiant courages of the English people: for they hauing no mistrust in God and good fortune, set vp a new saile, began the warre afresh, and appointed for regent in France, Richard duke of Bozke, sonne to Richard earle of Cambridge.

Although the duke of Bozke was worthie (both for birth and courage) of this honor and preferment, yet so disdained of Edmund duke of Summerſet being couſine to the king, that by all means possible he sought his hinderance, as one glad of his losse, and sozie of his well doing: by reason whereof, per the duke of Bozke could get his dispatch, Paris and diuerse other of the chiefeſt places in France were gotten by the French king. The duke of Bozke perceiving his euill will, openlie dissembled that which he inwardlie minded, either of them working things to the others displeasure, till through malice & diuision betwene them, at length by mortall warre they were both consumed, with almost all their whole lines and offspring.

The Normans of the countie of Caer, being heartened by the death of the duke of Bedford, began a new rebellion, slue diuerse Englishmen, robbed manie townes that were vnder the English obedience, and tooke the towne of Harfleur by assault, and diuerse other townes. But the lord regent being aduertised, sent forth the lord Scales, sir Thomas Riell, and the lord How, which so afflicted those rebels of Caer, that they slue aboue five thousand persons, and burnt all the townes and villages in the countie, not being walled: so that in that part was neither habitation nor tillage, for all the people fled into Britaine, and all the beasts of the countie were brought to Caudebecke, where a good shepe was sold for an English penie, and a Cow for twelue pence. Daile was skirmishing and fighting in euerie part, in so much that the lord Scales at the Rie beside Rone, discomfited the Hirc, and fiftene hundred valiant Frenchmen; of the which, aboue three hundred were taken prisoners, beside the gaine of seauen faire courſers.

Amongst other of the prisoners, were sir Richard Reginald de Fountaines, sir Alain Gerond, Alain Ponsate, and Gessie Grame, captaine of the Scots. But yet this victorie and others the like, staied not the Frenchmen from working treason daile, in so much that diuers townes turned to the part of R. Charles, and some were taken by practise, as Diepe, Bois, Vincennes, and others. So that here partlie was accomplished the prophesie of Henrie the sixt, giuen out in the ninth yeare of his reigne when he laie at siege before Meaur, that Henrie of Monmouth should lose all that Henrie of Monmouth had gotten (so they are named according to the place of their natiuitie) and this prediction was complet and full by that time the yeares of his regimēt were expired.

But here is one chiefe point to be noted, that either the disdaine amongst the chiefe peres of the realme of England (as yee haue heard) or the negligence of the kings counsell (which did not foresee dangers to come) was the losse of the whole dominion of France, betwene the riuers of Rone and Marne, and in especiall, of the noble citie of Paris. For where before, there were sent ouer thousands for defense of the holds and fortresses, now were sent hundreds, yea and scores, some rascals, and some not able able to draw a bowe, or carrie a bill: for the lord Willoughbie, and the bishop of Terwine, which had the governance of the great cite of Paris, had in their companie not two thousand Englishmen.

Which weakenesse king Charles well perceived, and therefore by authoritie appointed the constable, Arthur of Britaine, the earle of Dunois, the lords de la Roch, and Lisle Adam, with other valiant capitaine and men of warre, as well Burgogions as French, to go before Paris, trusting by favour of certaine citizens, with whome he had intelligence, to be lord of the cite, without great losse or battell. So these capitaine came before the cite of Paris. But perceiuing that all things succeeded not according to their expectation, they returned to Spont Partiz, and the next daie suddenlie set on the towne of saint Denis, and constrained the Englishmen that kept it, to flee into the abbeie, and into the tower Aenun. In this conflict two hundred Englishmen were slaine, the residue upon reasonable composition rendered by the place, and departed to Paris.

Thomas lord Beaumont, who of late was come to Paris with eight hundred men, issued forth with six hundred soldiers, intending to view the doings and number of the French armie; but suddenlie compassed about, within a small space was discomfited and taken, with him fourescore prisoners, beside two hundred slaine in the field, the remnant chased to the verie gates of the cite. The Parisiens, and especiallie the maister of the halles, and some of the uniuersitie, and Michael Lallier, and manie notable burgesses of the cite (who euer with an English countenance covered a French hart) perceiuing the weaknesse of the Englishmen, and force of the French; signified to the French capitaine their toward minds willing them with all diligence to come & receiue so rich a pize without anie difficultie, readie to be giuen and deliuered into their hands.

The constable delaing no time, came with his power, lodged by the charter house: and the lord Lisle Adam, approaching to the walles, shewed to the citizens a charter, sealed with the great seale of king Charles, by the which he had pardoned them their offences, and granted to them all their old liberties, and ancient priuileges, so that they would hereafter be to him true and obedient: which thing to them declared, they ran about the towne, crying; S. Denis, line king Charles. The Englishmen perceiuing this, determined to keepe the gate S. Denis, but they were deceived: for the cheines were drawne in euerie street, and women and children cast doونه stones and scalding water on the Englishmens heads, and the citizens in armour fought with them and chased them from street to street, and from lane to lane, and slue and hurt diuerse and manie of them.

The bishop of Terwine, chancelor there for king Henrie, the lord Willoughbie, and sir Simon Moruier, took great paine to appease the people: but when they saw that all auailed not, they withdrew into the basilie of saint Anthonie, which forresse they had well vittelled, and furnished with men and munitions. Whilest this rumor was in the towne, the earle of Dunois and others scaled the walles, and some passed the riuer by botes, and opened the gate of saint James, by the which the constable with his banner displayed, entered, at whose entrie the Parisiens made great ioy. The bishop and the lord Willoughbie, with their small companie, defended their forresse ten daies, looking for aid: but when they saw that no comfort appeared, they yielded their forresse, so that they and theirs, with certaine baggage, might peaceably returne to Rone. Thus was the cite of Paris brought into the possession of Charles the French king, through the vntrue demeanour of the citizens, who contrarie to their othe, and promised allegiance, like false and inconstant people, so revolted from the English.

After this glorious gaine, the Frenchmen besieged the towne of Craill upon Dife, whereof sir William Chamberlaine was capteine, the which with five hundred Englishmen issued out of the towne, and after long fight, discomfited his enemies, & slue two hundred, and took a great number prisoners: the remnant not liking the market, departed to Campaigne, and other townes adjoining. During which season, twelue burgesses of the towne of Sours sold it for monie vnto Poiton de Fantrailes. But he had not the castell deliuered, & therefore with all his power he besieged the same; whereof the lord Laibot being aduertised, sent for the lord Seales, and they both with eightene hundred men rescued the castell, took the towne, and discomfited their enemies, and slue of them about foure hundred persons.

Now according to the old saing (when the steel is stolen that the stable doze) the duke of Borke appointed at the last parlement to be regent of France (after that Paris, Saint Denis, Saint Germans in Laie, and diuerse other townes in France were taken and betraied for lacke of conuenient succours) was sent ouer into Normandie with eight thousand men, and in his companie, the earles of Salisburie, and Suffolke, and the lord Falconbridge, and diuerse other valiant capitaine. When he was landed, the earle of Salisburie besieged the castell of Chambois, which shortly was to him rendered. Then the duke removed to Rone, where he set good orders, and did great iustice to the countrie; wherefore the Normans in their chronicles highlie extoll him for that point. Howbeit they saie, that he gat by long siege the towne and abbeie of Jecampe, and did none other notable act, during the time of his rule and gouernment.

In this fourteenth yeare, the duke of Burgognie determined by the aduise of his counsell, to attempt the winning of Calis. The prouision was wondrous great which was made for the atchiuing of this enterprize: whereof sir John Katcliffe, deputie of the towne of Calis, hauing perfect intelligence, aduertised king Henrie, and his counsell, who incontinently sent thither the earle of Mortaigne, sonne to the duke of Summerfet, and the lord Camois, with fiftene hundred men, and great foison of vittels, that issued out of Calis, and came before Grauelin, where they were encountered with a great number of Flemings, who were shortly discomfited, foure hundred of them slaine, and six score taken prisoners. Within two daies after, the Englishmen dyaue by fine force the lords of Warren and Wado to the barriers of Aro, and discomfited their whole companie, to the number of fiftene hundred, slue seauen valiant capitaine, and took manie gentlemen prisoners.

The duke of Burgognie, remaining still in his former purpose, assembled together, of Flemings, Picards, Hollanders, and Venetours, a great armie, to the number of fortie thousand, so well armed, so well vittelled, so well furnished with ordinance, and garnished in all things, that they thought and blazed amongst themselves, that the Calissians would leaue their towne desolate, and flee for their safegard, hearing onelic of the dukes approach: but they reckoned without their host; and so paid a dearer shot than they looked for. Now when this mightie armie was past the water of Grauelin, the duke intending to begin his feats, assaulted the little pore castell of Die, which hauing in it but fiftie soldiers, whereof twelue sold their liues deuelie; the remnant (compelled by necessitie) yielded themselves to the dukes mercie.

The duke set into France too late.

The duke of Burgognie prepared an armie against Calis.

The duke of Burgognie with fortie thousand men.

mercie. Which to please the Sautois (being of number most puissant in all the armie) liberallie gaue to them, both the castell and prisoners, who (rude & cruell people) not onelic rased the castell, but also hanged nine and twentie of the captiues, and had so done with the residue, if the duke, offended at their crueltie, had not willed a staie.

After this feat done, the Picards besieged the castell of Harke, & gaue thre assaults to it. The Englishmen within, being in number two hundred and sir, vnder the gouernement of their capteine sir John Geddin, valiantlie defended the place; untill at length, despairing of succours, they yeldded themselves (their liues & lims saued.) The castell of Harke being thus deliuered, was rased to the ground. Then the duke, accompanied with the duke of Cleues, the earle of Effampes, the lords of Wantoing, Croie, Crisquie, Huniers, and manie other barons and knights, with his great armie, came before Calis, & placed his siege about the same, most to his aduantage: he gaue thre assaults, and gained nothing by them, but constrained to keepe them further off. At the first assault, the hire which was come to see the duke of Burgonie, was sore wounded and hurt. A coling card it was also vnto them, still to see ships arrived in the haven out of England, openlie before their faces, laden with vittels, munition and men.

Calis besieged by the duke of Burgonie.

The duke on a daie riding about to victu the situation of the towne, to the intent to take his most aduantage (either by assault or otherwise) was quickelie espied, and with the shot of a canon, a trumpetter, which rode next before him, and thre horses in his companie were slaine out of hand. The lord of Croie, and a conuenient number with him, was appointed to besiege the castell of Guisnes, where he got little profit, and did lesse harme. Whereouer, for the better aduancing of his enterprisse, the duke minded to stop by the haven; so that no succours should enter there. Herevpon, he caused foure great hulkes to be fraught with great square stones, cemented and joined together with lead, to the intent they should lie still like a mount, and not seuer in sunder.

The dukes enterprisse to bar the haven.

These ships, with the residue of the dukes manie, were conueied into the mouth of Calis haven, and at a full sea, by craft and policie, were sonke downe to the ground. But whether God would not that the haven should be destroyed, either the conueiers of the hulkes knew not the verie channell; these foure great ships, at the low water, late openlie vpon the sands, without hurting the rode or channell. Which when the souldiers perceived, they issued out of the towne, brake the ships, and caried both the stones and timber into the towne. An other deuill the duke had, which was the building of a strong bassile vpon a little mountaine, which he furnished with foure hundred men, and much artillerie, that did impeach the Englishmen from issuing forth of the towne, to their great displeasure.

Whilost these things were aduoyng, there came to the duke an herald called Penbroke, belonging to the duke of Glocester, who declared to the duke of Burgonie, that the protector of England his maister (if God would send him wind & weather) would giue him battell, either there, or in anie other place within his owne countrie, where he would appoint, and that with speed, if God vouchsafed him wind and weather. The duke answered the herald; Sir, saie to your maister, that his challenge is both honorable and reasonable: howbeit, he shall not need to take the paines to seeke me in mine owne countrie, for (God willing) he shall find me here, till I haue my will of the towne, ready to abide him and all the power he can bring. After the herald had receiued this answer, he was highlie cheered, and had a cup and an hundred guildens to him giuen in reward, and so he returned to Calis.

After whose departure, the duke called a counsell in the chiefe pailioun of the Sautois, about this message of the English herald, where it was determined with great courage, that they would abide the battell, if the duke of Glocester came to offer it. Whilost this great matter was in consultation, the Calisians, not well content with the bassile which the duke had newlie builded, issued out of the towne in great number, part on horsebacke and part on foot. The former ran to assault the bassile, and the horsemen went betwene the armie & the assailants, to stop the aid and succours that might come. Vpon the sounding of the alarme, the duke himselfe in person was comming on foot, to releue his men: but being kept backe a space by the English horsemen, in that belate of time, the bassile was wone by fine force, and eight score persons of those that kept it slaine, beside the residue which were taken prisoners, and led to Calis, with all the ordinance and artillerie, to the high displeasure of the duke and his prudent counsell. The next daie after, there sprang a rumour in the armie (no man could tell how) that the duke of Glocester with a great puissance was already imbarshed, and would arrive at the next tide. The same night the duke fled awaie, and sent in all hast to the lord of Croie, to raise his siege before Guisnes, which tidings were to him verie ioious, for he neither got nor saued. So these two capteins departed, leaving behind them, both ordinance, vittels, & great riches. The French writers (to saue the honor of the duke of Burgonie) saie, that there was a certaine discord and commotion amongst the Flemings and Dutch nation, affirming, that the great lords and the Picards (whome the Frenchmen greatly extoll) would betraie and sell the Flemings and their friends, and that for the same cause in a great furie they cried; Home, home: and would not farrie for anie request that the duke could make, and so by their misgouernance, the duke was inforced to raise his siege, and to depart. The Flemish authors affirme the contrarie, saieing, that they were ready to abide the coming of the duke of Glocester: but the duke of Burgonie fearing to be intrapped betwene the English armie without, and the garrison within the towne of Calis, fled awaie in the night, giuing to them no warning thereof before, so that for lacke of time, and conuenient space to lade and carrie their stuffe, and being commanded vpon the sudden to dislodge with all speed, they left behind them their vittels, tents, and other things, to their great losse and detriment.

Howseuer the matter was, the truth is, that he fled the six and twentieth daie of Iulie, in the night. And the next daie in the morning, the duke of Glocester landed in Calis haven, & straight went into the campe, where his enimies the night before were lodged, and there he found manie faire peeces of ordinance, and speciallie one called Digeon: so named, after the chiefe towne of Burgonie; beside paulions, wine, beere, meale, and innumerable vittels. The duke of Glocester, seeing his enimies recoiled, hauing in his companie sixe and twentie thousand men, entered into Flanders, burning houses, killing such as made resistance, destroying the countrie on euerie part, setting fire in the townes of Popperinch, Bailenell, and others. Also, they wasted the suburbs of diuerse closed townes, and after passed by New castell, Aimesure, and Alon chapel: and then entering into Artois, they came to Arques and Blaudesques, setting fire in euerie part where they came. Thus they passed by saint Omers, and finally by Arde returned to Guisnes: and so to Calis at the six weeks end, with great booties of cattell and riches.

In all this their iournie, they had but small store of bread, which caused much faintnesse and diuerse diseases in the armie, whereof a greater number died than did of the enimies sword: and yet the Flemings write, that they of Bruges distressed the number of two thousand Englishmen in this iournie. Holbeist, the French writers affirme, that the Englishmen lost more of their companie in the marches about Ard, than they did in all other places where they had bene before, hauing passed through the parties of Flanders, without incounter, or any damage done to them by the enimies. After that, the duke of Gloucester returned into England, where he was advertised, that James king of Scots had besieged the castell of Rochesburgh with thirtie thousand men: but the capitaine thereof, sir Rafe Croic ascended it so manfully, for the space of twentie daies, that king James being then advertised, that the earle of Northumberland was comming to fight with him, fled with no lesse losse than dishonour, and mough of both.

Shortlie after that the duke of Burgonie had bene before Calis, at the desire of princes, a truce for a time was moued to be had betwene the king of England: the said duke. For which cause were sent to Crandin for the king of England, Henrie Beaupond cardinal of Winchester, John lord Spotsbiate duke of Northfolke, Humfre earle of Stafford, and diuerse other well learned & honorable personages. And for the duke of Burgonie, there appeared the duchesse his wife, the bishop of Arras, the lord of Croic, and diuerse other. At this treatie, a truce was taken for a small time, and for a lesse obserued, which was concluded betwene the king of England, and the duchesse of Burgonie (interlacing the duke and his name.)

Some thinke, that the king of England would neuer enter in league with him, bicause he had broken his promise, oth, and writing sealed to him, and to his father. Other imagined this to be done of a cautell, to cast a mist before the French kings eyes, to the intent he should beleue that this feat was wrought by the duchesse, without assent or knowledge of the duke or his counsell; and so he was not bound to accomplish anie act or thing done in his wiues treatie. Thus may you see, that princes sometime with such vaine glosses and scornfull expositions will hide their doings, and cloke their purposes; to the intent they would not either be espied, or else that they may plucke their heads out of the collar at their pleasure. But (as the common opinion goeth) he which is a promise-breaker escapeth not alwaies with impunity. For it is well seene by dallie and usuall euents both in princes and priuat persons, that for violating their faith, and breaking of promise, manie discommodities arise, and inconueniences not a few do follow. To the due keeping whereof the heathen bare such a religious conference, that a prophane man in respect of others, preferreth it before sacrifice, the sentence is of great excellencie out of a pagans mouth:

About this season, quene Katharine mother to the king of England departed out of this life, and was buried by hir husband in the abbey of Westminster. The duchesse of Bedford also, sister to Lewis erle of Daule, more for affection than increase of honour, without counsell of hir friends, married a lustie young knight, called sir Richard Woodville, to the great displeasure of hir vnckle the bishop of Exerwine, and the earle hir brother. This sir Richard was made baron of Rivers, and after earle, and had by this ladie manie noble sonnes, and faire daughters, of the which one was the ladie Elizabeth, after quene of England, by reason the was married vnto Edward the fourth. ¶ Whilist this marriage was a celebrating, Jane late quene of England, and before duchesse of Britaine, daughter to the king of Nauarre, and wife to king Henrie the fourth, died at the manor of Hawering, and was buried by hir husband at Canturburie. ¶ About the same time, deceased also the countesse of Martholke, and Henrie archbishop of York.

In this yeare also, the duke of Summerfet, accompanied with the lords of Fauconbridge, Talbot, sir Francis Surien, the Aragonnois, Matthew Cough, Thomas Paulet, Thomas Harrington, Walter Limbrike, John Sedding, William Watton esquiers, and Thomas Hilton bailiffe of Rone, with a great companie of the English partie, besieged the towne of Harflue (latelie before gotten by the Frenchmen) both by water and land: the capitaine within the towne was one sir John d'Esouteville, hauing his brother Robert with him, and a sir hundred good fighting men. The assailants cast trenches, and so fortified themselves in their campe and lodgings, that when the earles of Glouc and Dunois, the valiant bastard of Bourbon, the lord Caluicourt, and other famous capteins, with a foure thousand men, sent to the rescue of them within, came before the towne, they could not succour their friends, nor annoie their enimies by anie meanes they could deuise; so for feare to lose honour, they returned backe againe, with much trauell and little profit.

The capteins within the towne perceiving they could not be aided, did shortlie after render the towne to the duke of Summerfet; who after committed it to the keeping of Thomas Paulet, William Limbrike, Christopher Barber, and George saint George, which manie yeares (till the diuision began in England) manfully and valiantlie defended both the towne and the haue. James king of Scots murdered.
Abr. Fl. ex
Polychr.

Normandie, he not onlie lost this towne of Hardue, but also the citie of Rone, and the whole duchie of Normandie, whereas now (being but a deputie) he got it to his high praise and glorie. In this yeare was James king of Scots murdered by certeine traitors of his owne subiects (such in his bedchamber by night, which king (saith Polychr.) had borne prisoner in England fiftene yeares, the murderers of whom being afterwards taken, were terrible executed.)

The lord Talbot besieged Tankerville, and after foure moneths had it simple to him rendered. This towne was no great gaine to the Englishmen, for in the meane season, the French king in his owne person besieged the strong towne of Montreuil fault Porre; whereof Thomas Gerard being captaine, more for desire of reward, than for feare of enemies, sold the towne to the French king, and had of him great gifts and intertainment, as afterwards was openlie knowne. This towne had bene rescued of the French king fought withall, if one chance had not happened. For the duke of Borke about that time was discharged of his office, and the earle of Warwike preferred to the same, so that the duke of Borke, lying as then at Rone, would haue gladlie rescued the towne, if his authoritie had not surreassembled; and the earle of Warwike could not come in time, for the wind was contrarie to him.

warwike
made regent
of France.

This present yeare was a parlement holden at Westminster, in the which manie god and profitable acts for the preservation of concord at home, and defense against the enemies abroad, were ordeined and decreed. Arthur of Britaine constable of France, and John duke of Alanson, were sent by the French king into Normandie, with a great armie, to besiege the towne of Auranches, standing vpon the knop of an hill: where after they had laien a certeine space without gaine, the lord Talbot with a valiant compaignie of men came thither, and offered the enemies battell. Which when they at all hands refused, the lord Talbot perceluing their faint harts, raised his field, and in the open sight of them all, entered into the towne, and the next daie issued out; and finding the Frenchmen riding abroad to destroe the plaine countie, he compassed them about, and slue manie of them, and toke diuerse prisoners. Although the Frenchmen got neither honor nor profit by this tourne, yet they enterprised a greater matter, as the winning of Rone, in so much that Houston de Sautreils, and the Vire, with manie other notable captaine, hauing promise of certeine burgesies of that citie to haue entrie made them, secretlie in the night came forward to a towne called Hise or Hys, not past foure leagues from Rone, and there lodged.

The lord Talbot, the lord Scales, and sir Thomas Kirieall hearing of their approach, set out of Rone at midnight, and with great paine came to Hise so couertlie in the morning, that the French suddenly surprised and set vpon, like men all amazed ran awaie and fled. In the chase were taken the lord of Fontaines, sir Alcine Seron, sir Elwes de Balle, and threescore knights, and esquiers, beside others; and there were slaine two hundred and more. The Vire escaped verie narrowlie, by swiftnesse of his horse, though not vnbwounded. The Englishmen returned to the towne of Hise, and found there great number of horses and other baggages, which they iouslie brought with them to Rone.

Anno Reg. 16.
The earle of warwike regent came into France.

On the first daie of Nouember this present yeare, the earle of Warwike, as regent of France, passed the sea, after he had bene seuen times shipped and unshipped, and landed at Bomslue with a thousand fresh souldiers, and came to Rone, and then the duke of Borke returned into England. Betwene the change of these two captaine, the duke of Burgognie (which foze enuied the glorie of the Englishmen) besieged the towne of Crotoy, with ten thousand men and more, hauing with him great plentie of guns and goodlie ordinance. The earle of Warwike aduertised hereof, sent the lord Fauconbridge, sir Thomas Kirieall, sir John Spantgonerie, Thomas Lambzike, Thomas Chandois, David Hall, and diuerse other knights and esquiers, and an host of five thousand men, which passed the river of Some, beside the towne of Saint Valerie, wading in the water by to the chin, so that were they to rescue their felowes.

When the duke of Burgognie was informed of the approaching of the lord Talbot, he with all his power (sailing foure hundred, which were left in a baskille by him there newlie builded) fled to Abule, the baskille was some gaine by the Englishmen, and those within either slaine or taken. After this, the lord Talbot sent to the duke of Burgognie, signifying that except he would come forth, and bide by a battell, he would bitterlie wast his countie of Picardie. According whereunto (the duke of Burgognie (saying) he burnt townes, spoiled and slue manie people in Picardie. But for all those his doings, the duke of Burgognie appeared not, but got him from Abule to Amiens, so that the lord Talbot abode twentie daies full in Picardie and Arthois, destroying all afore him, and after returned vntouched. In the meane season, sir Thomas Kirieall had gotten all the dukes carriages and ordinance, and left as much bittell in the towne of Crotoy, as would serue six hundred men a whole yeare, and conueied the residue to the earle of Warwike, who highlie praised them for their hardie doings.

After this, Henrie earle of Portaigne, sonne to Edmund duke of Summer set, arrived at Chierburgh with foure hundred archers, and thre hundred speares, and passed through Normandie, till he came into the countie of Maine, where he besieged a castell called saint Anian, in the which were thre hundred Scots, besides Frenchmen. This castell he toke by assault, slue the Scots, and hanged the Frenchmen, because they were once sworne English. After this he got also another castell, two miles from saint Julians, called Alegerche, which was shortlie after recovered; and the lord of Camelvois, which came to the rescue of the same, in the meane waie was intrapped and taken. Thus slowe the victorie, sometime on the one part, and sometime on the other. For about the same time the townes of Meaur in Brie, and saint Susan were sold and deliuered to the French part, by the vntrust of the burgesies and inhabitants of the same townes, about the latter end of this sixteenth yeare.

This yeare (by reason of great tempests) raging winds, and raine, there rose such scaritic, that wheate was sold at thre shillings foure pence the bushell, wine at twelue pence the gallon, bassalt at fourtene pence the bushell, and malt at thirteene shillings foure pence the quarter, and all other graines at exorbitant prices above the oid rate. Wherevpon Steuen Bzowne (saith Polychronicon) at the same season maior of London, tendering the state of the citie in this want of breadcorne, sent into Bzule certeine ships, which returned laden with plentie of rie: wherewith he did much good to the people in that hard time, speciallie to them of the citie, where the want of come was not so extreme as in some other places of the land, where the poore distressed people that were hungerbitten, made them bzed of ferne roots, and bysed other hard shifts, till God provided remedie for their penurie by good successe of husbandrie.)

In the moneth of June, the earle of Huntington (as Steward of Guisen) with two thousand archers, and foure hundred speares was sent into Calceigne, as a supplie to the countie and commons of the same; for the king of England and his counsell were informed, that the earle of Dunois laie in the frontiers of Holowse secretly, by rewards and faire promises practising to procure diuerse townes in Guien to become French. Wherefore this earle (like a politike warrior) altered not onelie the capteins in euerie towne and citie, but also remoued the magistrates, and changed the officers from towne to towne, and came to raine; so that by this meanes, the earle of Dunois at that time lost both trauell and cost.

That heere
passeth.

In the same moneth also, sir Richard Wodville, sir William Chamberleine, sir William Drieto, and sir William Storie, with a thousand men, were sent to stake the townes in Normandie, which at that time had therof great need: for the English captaine had small confidence in the Normans, and not too much in some of their own nation. For that harlot byberie, with hir fellow countenances, ran so fast abroad with French crownes, that hard was it to remaine incorrupted. In this yeare, the Dolphin of France alied with John duke of Alanson, and John duke of Burgogne, rebelled against his father king Charles: but in the end, by wise persuasions, and wittie handling of the matter, the knot of that seditious faction was dissolved, and the king with his sonne, and the other confederates openlie and apparantlie pacified. The Englishmen taking advantage of this domesticall division in France, raised an armie, and recovered againe diuerse townes, which had bene surprised from them before, and prepared also to haue recou-ered the citie of Paris, till they heard of the agreement betwixt the father and the sonne, and then they left off that enterpryse.

Ponthoife recovered by the English.

In November of this yeare, there was such a great frost, and after that so deepe a snow, that all the ground was couered therewith, and all the ditches frozen. Which whether put the Englishmen in hope to recover againe the towne of Ponthoife, by the French king gotten before, by corrupting with monie di-uerse burgeses of the towne. Whereupon the Englishmen clothed all in white, with John lord Clifford their capteine, came in the night to the ditches, passed them without danger by reason of the frost, scaled the walles, slue the watch, and toke the towne, with manie possible prisoners. After the regaining of this towne, the lord Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwicke died in the castell of Hone, from whence conueied into England, he was with sollemne ceremonies buried at his college of Warwicke, in a verie faire and sumptuous sepulchre.

Anno Reg. 19.

Enguierant de Montreiller.

About the beginning of Lent, the duke of Summerfet, and the lord Talbot, with other captaine and men of warre to the number of two thousand, which they had assembled in the marches of Normandie towards Hone, marching forward towards Picar-die, passed ouer the riuer of Some; and through the towne of Montreuil, came before the fortreffe of Folleulle, which the duke besieged, whilst the lord Talbot entered further into the countrie. After that the duke had mounted his great artillerie, and began to batter the hold, the capteine within chanced to be slaine with a shot of the same artillerie, & shortly after, the batterie being still continued, the rest of the men of warre that serued vnder him yelded the place, in which the duke left a competent garrison of soldiers, which afterwards soe indamaged the countrie.

This done, the duke followed the lord Talbot, who was already entered a good waie within the coun-trie of Santhois, and now joining their powers together, they came to a fortreffe called Lihons in Santhois, which was also rendered vnto them, after they had burnt the church, which the countrie people had against them, and would not yeld it, till they were fired out, burnt, and slaine, to the number of three hundred. After the fortreffe was deliuered into their hands by composition, the duke with his power laie there about ten daies, sending diuerse troops of his men of warre abroad into the countrie, which spoiled the same, toke the fortreffe of Herbonnieres, and the lord thereof within it, who for his ransom, and to haue his subiects and house saued from spoile and fire, compounded with his takers for a thousand saluz of gold, which he paid to them. Finally, after the duke of Summerfet, and the lord Talbot with their power, had laine in Lihons about ten daies, they departed from thence, and returned into Normandie, without anie impeachment.

After the death of the earle of Warwicke, the duke of Poike was againe made regent of France, which accompanied with the earle of Drenford, the lord Bourchier called earle of Ewe, sir James of Mon-mond, the lord Clinton, sir Richard Wodville, & di-uerse other noble men, sailed into Normandie. So foe whose arrivall, the French king soe greued with the taking of the towne of Ponthoife, assembled a great armie, and besieged the said towne himselfe in person, inuironing it with bassiles, trenches, and ditches, beating the walles and bulwarks with shot of great ordinance, and giuing thereunto diuerse great and fierce assaults. But John lord Clifford, like a valiant capteine, defended the towne so manfullie, that the Frenchmen rather lost than wone.

The duke of Poike at his landing receiued true aduertisement of this siege, whereupon he sent for the lord Talbot, and a great number of soldiers, and so came nere to the towne of Ponthoife, and there incamped himselfe; who therewith sent word to the French king, that thither he was come to giue him battell, if he would come out of his strength and ba-ssiles. But the French king by aduise of his coun-cell, determined not to venture his person with men of so base degre, but meant to keepe his ground, bidding the lord regent to enter at his perill, and in the meane season did what he could to stop the passage of the riuer of Dife, so that no vittels should be brought to the English armie by that waie, in hope so to cause them to recule backe.

The duke of Poike, perceiving that the French king minded not to fight, purposed to passe ouer the riuer of Dife, and so to fight with him in his lodging.
Whereupon he remoued his campe, and appointed the lord Talbot and other, to make a countenance, as they would passe the riuer by force at the port of Beaumont: and appointed an other companie in boates of timber and leather, and bridges made of cords and ropes (whereof he had great plentie caried with him in chariots) to passe ouer beneath the abbie.
Whilst the lord Talbot made a crie, as though he would assault the gate, certeine Englishmen passed the water in botes, and by a bridge of cords ouer, so that a great number of them were got to the other side, per the Frenchmen were aduised what had happened. When they saw the chance, they ran like mad men, to haue stopped the passage, but it was too late: for the most part of the Englishmen were got ouer, in so much that they chased their enemies backe, and slue sir Guiliam de Chastell, nephew to the lord Caneguie du Chastell, and diuerse others.

The Frenchmen seeing their euill hap irreuer-rable, returned to the French king, and told him what had chanced: whereupon he doubting to be assailed to his disadvantage, thought not good longer to tarrie, but with all speed removing his ordinance into the bassile of saint Martin, which he had newlie made, dislodged in the night from Ponthoison, and went to Poisse, leaving the lord de Cotignie admerall of France, with three thousand men to keepe the bassile.

bastile. If he had taried still at Hanbussou, the lord Talbot which had passed the riuer of Wisse in two small leather botes, had either taken or slaine him the same night. The Englishmen the next daie in good order of battell came before the towne of Ponthoisse, thinking there to haue found the French king, but he was gone; and in his lodging they found great riches, and much stuffe which he could not haue space for to carrie awaie for feare of the sudden invasion.

Then the duke with his power entred into the towne, and sent for new vittels, and repaired the towers and bulwarks about the towne, & diuerse times assaulted the bastile of the Frenchmen, of the which he made no great accompt, because they were not of power either to assault or stop the vittels or succours from the towne. After this, the duke intending once againe to offer the French king battell, left behind him at Ponthoisse for capteine there, sir Ceruais Clifton, sir Nicholas Burdet, Henrie Chandos, and a thousand soldiers, and therewith remouing with his whole armie, came before Poillie, where he set himselfe and his men in good order of battell ready to fight. There issued out some of the French gentlemen to skirmish with the Englishmen, but to their losse: for diuerse of them were slaine, and foure valiant horsemen taken prisoners. The duke perceiuing the faint hearts of the Frenchmen, and that they durst not encounter in field with the English power, dislodged from Poillie, and came to Spaunt, and some as yet to Hone.

Anno Reg. 20.

slaine.

When the regent and the lord Talbot were returned againe into Normandie, the French king considering how much it should rebound to his dishonour to let rest the towne of Ponthoisse in his enemies hands, sith he had bene at such charges and travaile about the winning thereof, he instantly assembled all his puissance. And returning suddenly into Ponthoisse, he first by assault got the church, and after the whole towne, took the capteine, and diuerse other Englishmen, and due to the number of foure hundred, which sold their liues dearely: for one French writer affirmeth, that the French king lost there three thousand men; and the whole garrison of the Englishmen was but onelie a thousand. Among other that were slaine here of the defendants, was sir Nicholas Burdet knight, chiefe butler of Normandie. After this hot tempest, the weather began somewhat to war more calme: for king Henrie and king Charles agreed to send ambassadors to comen of some good conclusion of peace: so that king Henrie sent the cardinal of Winchester, with diuerse other noble personages of his counsell to Calis, with whome was also sent Charles duke of Orleans yet prisoner in England, to the intent that he might be both author of the peace, and also procurer of his owne deliuerance.

The French king sent the archbishop of Reims, and the earle of Dunois: and the duke of Burgonie sent the lord de Creuqueur, and diuerse other. All these met at Calis, where the duke of Orleans courted received the earle of Dunois (his ballard brother) thanking him greatly for his paines taken in governing his lands & countie, during the time of his captiuitie and absence. Diuerse communications were had, as well for the deliuerance of the duke as for a small peace; but nothing was concluded, saving that an other meeting was appointed, so that in the meane season the demands of either partie might be declared to their soueraine lords and maisters: and hereupon the commissioners brake vp their assembly, and returned into their countries. The Englishmen (as the French writers record) required not onelie to possesse peaceable the two duchies of Aquit-taine and Normandie, discharged of all reloit, superoixite, & souereigntie against the realme of France, the kings and gouernours of the same; but also to be restored to all the townes, cities, and places, which they within thirtie yeeres next before gone and past, had conquered in the realme of France. Which request the Frenchmen thought verie unreasonable, and so both parties, minding rather to gaine or saue than to lose, departed for that time, as yet haue heard.

After this meeting thus prozaged, Philip duke of Burgonie, partly moued in conscience to make amends to Charles duke of Orleans (as yet prisoner in England) for the death of duke Leues his father, whome duke John, father to this duke Philip, cruellie murdered in the citie of Paris; and partly intending the aduancement of his neece, the ladie Marie, daughter to Adolfe duke of Cleue (by the which alliance, he trusted, that all old rancor should cease) contrived waies to haue the said duke of Orleans set at libertie, upon promise by him made to take the said ladie Marie into wife. This duke had bene prisoner in England euer since the battell was fought at Agincourt, upon the daie of Crispine and Crispinian, in the yeare 1415, and was set now at libertie in the moneth of Nouember, in the yeare 1440, paying for his ransome foure hundred thousand crownes, though other saie but three hundred thousand.

The cause why he was detained so long in captiuitie, was to pleasure thereby the duke of Burgonie: for so long as the duke of Burgonie continued faithfull to the king of England, it was not thought necessarie to suffer the duke of Orleans to be ransomed, least upon his deliuerance he would not cease to seeke meanes to be reuenged upon the duke of Burgonie, for the old grudge and displeasure betwixt their two families, and therefore such ransome was demanded for him as he was neuer able to pay. But after the duke of Burgonie had broken his promise, and was turned to the French part, the counsell of the king of England deuised how to deliuer the duke of Orleans, that thereby they might displeasure the duke of Burgonie. Which thing the duke of Burgonie perceiuing, doubted what might follow if he were deliuered without his knowledge, and therefore to his great cost practised his deliuerance, paid his ransome, and ioined with him amitie and alliance by marriage of his neece.

This duke being now deliuered, and speaking better English than French, after his arriual in France, repaired to the duke of Burgonie, and according to his promise and conuention, married the ladie Marie of Cleue, in the towne of saint Omers, on whome he begat a sonne, which after was French king, and called Leues the twelfe. [Festered fores Lewis the twelfth.] That ranke inward, as they may perchance be palli- at by sleight of surgerie; so seldome come they to found cure, but often do burst out againe to greater paine and perill of patient than euer afore: and so befell it betwixt these two noble houses of Orleans and Burgonie, who for all this marriage and plausible peace (that continued a twentie yeares) fell out yet after at square vnattenable: their children and cousins, to the great inquieting of much part of christendome, speciallie in the times of king Francis the first, and his sonne Henrie the second, heires of the house of Orleans. For John earle of Angoulesme, uncle to this duke Charles, begat Charles, father to the said king Francis: which earle John had bene as pledge in England for the debt of Leues duke of Orleans, from the last yeare of king Henrie the fourth, till that now his nephew being deliuered, made shift for monie, and ransomed him also, and at at length restored him to his countrie.

In the beginning of this twentieth yeare, Richard duke of Poike, regent of France, and gouvernour of Normandie, determined to invade the territories of his enemies both by sundrie armies, and in severall places, and thereupon without delaye of time he sent the lord of Willoughbie with a great crue of soldiers to destroye the countrie of Amiens, and John lord Talbot was appointed to besiege the towne of Diepe; and the regent himselfe accompanied with Command duke of Summerfet, set forward into the duchie of Anjou. The lord Willoughbie, according to his commission, entred into the countrie of his enemies in such wise upon the sudden, that a great number of people were taken yer they could withdraw into any place of safegard.

The Frenchmen in the garrisons adjoining, affrighted with the clamour and crye of the poore people, issued out in good order, and manfully fought with the Englishmen. But in the end, the Frenchmen seeing their fellows in the forefront slaine downe, and kild without mercie, turned their backs, and fled: the Englishmen followed, and slew manie in the chase; and such as escaped the sword, were robbed by the earle of saint Paule, who was comming to aid the Englishmen. In this conflict were slaine about six hundred men of armes, and a great number taken. The dukes of Poike and Summerfet likewise entered into Anjou and Maine, and there destroyed townes, and spoiled the people, and with great prizes and prisoners repaired againe into Normandie, whither also the lord Willoughbie withdrew, after his valiant enterpryse achieved (as before ye haue heard) with rich spoiles and good prisoners.

The duke of Summerfet upon further baliance, entered into the marches of Britaine, and toke by force assault a towne named la Cerche, appertaining to the duke of Alanson, spoiling and burning the same. This done, he went to Bonzaie, where he sojourned two moneths, sending forth daillie his men of war to destroye the countries of Anjou, Craonnois, and Chatraconnois. The French king sent the marshall Laolach with foure thousand men to resist the invasions of the duke of Summerfet, which marshall intended to have set on the duke in his lodgings in the dead time of the night: but that (as by a wife and hardie captaine) well foresene, he marched forward, and met the Frenchmen halfe the waie, and after long fight, discomfited them, slew an hundred of the marshalls men, and toke three score and two prisoners, whereof the chiefe were the lord Dauphine, sir Leves de Buell, all the other (almost) were knights and chiquiers.

After this encounter, the duke toke the towne of Beaumont le vicount, and manned all the fortresses on the frontiers of his enemies, and with rich booties and prisoners returned againe to the duke of Poike. In this meane time the lord Talbot, besieging the towne of Diepe, inuironed it with deepe trenches; building also upon the mount Paulet a strong and noisome bastile. But at length perceiving the towne to be strongly defended, and that he lacked such furniture of men, vittels, and ordinance, as was necessarie for the winning of it, he deliuered the custodie of the bastile, with the gouernance of the siege to his bastard sonne, a valiant yong gentleman, and departed to Rone for aid, monie, and munition. The French king advertised hereof, sent his sonne the Dolphin of Vienne with the earle of Dunois, and fifteen thousand men to raise the siege from Diepe.

Three daies they assailed the bastile, in the which six hundred Englishmen were inclosed, and at length because powder and weapon failed them within, the Frenchmen won it, and toke the bastard Talbot prisoner, with sir William Betsow, and sir John Kephleie, which shortly after were redeemed. The other English souldiers, seeing the bastile wone by the Frenchmen, stood all a daie in good order of battell, and in the night following, politikelie saued themselves and returned to Rone, without losse or damage. In the assaulting of the bastile, the Frenchmen saie, they slew two hundred Englishmen; and denie not but that they lost five hundred of their owne men, besides those that were hurt. Whilist these things were a doing, Philip duke of Burgognie made sharpe warre against the earle of saint Paule, in taking from him his townes and castels, that made him to renounce his allegiance towards and promised to the king of England, and returned to the French part.

The English captaine in Guien besieged the strong towne of Tartas, belonging to the lord Daubryeth their old and ancient enemy. The towne perceiving that it was not able to resist the force of the Englishmen any long time, toke appointment, that the towne should remaine neuter. For assurance thereof, they deliuered Cadet the sonne of the lord de la Bzeth in pledge, upon this condition; that if the said lord de la Bzeth would not assent to the agreement, then he should signifie his refusal to the English captaine within three moneths next ensuing, and he to haue his pledge, and they to do their best. The French king, at the request of the lords of Guien, caused the lord de la Bzeth to signifie his disagreement unto the earle of Huntington, as then lieutenant to the king of England in the duchie of Aquitaine. And therewith to gratifie the lords of Guien, he assembled an armie of threescore thousand men, & came to Tholouse, and so to Tartas, to whome the chasteins of the towne, seeing no succours comming from the king of England, rendered the towne: and Cadet de la Bzeth, which was left there as a pledge, was also deliuered.

The French king, after the yielding of Tartas, removed to saint Seuerine, which towne he toke by force, slew three hundred persons, and toke sir Thomas Kampston prisoner. After this, he came to the citie of Arques, toke a bulworke by force, and had the towne yielded to him by composition. The captaine, which was the lord of Montferrant, departed with all the English crue to Burdeaur, where he found the earle of Longuille, the Capdau de Weuse, and sir Thomas Kampston, which was a little before deliuered. After this, the fortresses of the Rioll and Permandie were also yielded to the French king: who notwithstanding at length was constrained for lacke of vittels (which were cut off by the Englishmen, that laie abroad in diuerse fortresses for the purpose) to breake up his armie, & to retire into France. And then after his departure, the Englishmen recovered againe the citie of Arques, & the other townes by the French king gained, and toke prisoner his lieutenant called Reginald Guilliam the Burgognion, and manie other gentlemen, and all the mean souldiers were either slaine or hanged.

While the French king was in Guien, the lord Talbot toke the towne of Couchet, and after marched toward Galliardon, which was besieged by the bastard of Dileance, otherwile called the earle of Dunois: which earle hearing of the lord Talbots approach, raised his siege, and saued himselfe. The Frenchmen a little before this season, had taken the towne of Cureur by treason of a fisher. Sir Francis the Arragonois hearing of that chance, apparelled six strong fellows, like men of the countrie, with sacks and baskets, as carriers of coine and vittels, and sent them to the castell of Cornill, in the which diuerse Englishmen were kept as prisoners, and he with an ambush of Englyshmen late in a ballie nyght to the fortreffe.

The six counterfet husbandmen entered the castell unsuspected, and streight came to the chamber of the captaine, & laing hands on him, gaue knowledge to them that laie in ambush to come to their aid. The which suddenlie made forth, and entered the castell, slue and toke all the frenchmen, and set the Englyshmen at libertie: which thing done, they set fire in the castell, and departed to Rome with their bootie and prisoners. This exploit they had not atchiued peradventure by force (as hapilie they mistrusted) and therefore by subtiltie and deceit sought to accomplish it, which meanes to vse in warre is tollerable, so the same warre be lawfull; though both fraud & bloodshed otherwise be forbidden euen by the instinct of nature to be put in practise and vse; and that doth the poet insinuat in a proper sententious verse, saieng:

Quid, i. de art.

Frans ubi sit, vacuas cedis habete manus.

I note breach betweene the duke of Gloucester, and the bishop of Winchester.

But now to speake somewhat of the doings in England in the meane time. Whylest the men of war were thus occupied in martiall feates, and daile skirmishes, within the realms of France: ye shall vnderstand, that after the cardinall of Winchester, and the duke of Gloucester, were (as it seemed) reconciled either to other, yet the cardinall, and the archbishop of Yorke ceased not to do manie things without the consent of the king or of the duke, being (during the minoritye of the king) gouernor and protector of the realme, whereas the duke (as god cause he had) greatlie offended, therevpon in writing declared to the king, wherein the cardinall and the archbishop had offended both his maiestie, and the lawes of the realme. This complaint of the duke of Gloucester was contained in foure and twentie articles, which chieslie rested, in that the cardinall had from time to time, through his ambitious desire to surmount all others in high degrees of honor and dignitie, sought to enrich himselfe, to the great and notorious hinderance of the king, as in defrauding him not onelie of his treasure, but also in doing and practising things greatlie preiudiciall to his affaires in France, and namelie by setting at libertie the king of Scots, vpon so easie conditions, as the kings maiestie greatlie lost thereby, as in particularities thus followeth.

A complaint made to king Henrie the sixt, by the duke of Gloucester, vpon the cardinall of Winchester.

These be in part, the points and articles, which I Humfre duke of Gloucester, for my truth & acquittall, said late, I would giue in writing (my right redoubted lord) vnto your highnesse, aduertising your excellencie, of such things in part, as haue bene done in your tender age, in derogation of your noble estate, and hurt of both your realmes, and yet be done and used daile.

2 First, the cardinall then being bishop of Winchester, toke vpon him the state of cardinall, which was naied and denaied him, by the king of most noble memorie, my lord your father (whome God assoile) saieng that he had as lefe set his crowne beside him, as he him weare a cardinals hat, he being a cardinall. For he knew full well, the pride and ambition that was in his person, then being but a bishop, should haue so greatlie extolled him into more intollerable pride, when that he were a cardinall: and also he thought it against his freedome, of the cheefe church of this realme, which, that he worshipped, as dylie as euer did prince, that blessed be his soule. And howbeit, that my said lord your father (whome God assoile) would haue agreed him to haue had certeine clearks of this land cardinals, and to haue no bishoprikes in England; yet his intent was neuer to do so great derogation to the church of Canturburie, to make them that were his suffragans, to sit about their ordinarie and metropolitan. But the cause was that in generall, and in all matters which might concerne the weale of him, and of his realme, he should haue proctors of his nation, as other kings Christen had, in the court of Rome, and not to abide in this land, nor to be in anie part of his counceils, as bene all the spirituall and tempozall, at parlements and other great counceils, when you list to call them. And therefore, though it please you to do him that worship, to set him in your priue counsell after your pleasure: yet in your parlement, where euery lord both spirituall and tempozall, hath his place, he ought to occupie but his place as a bishop.

3 Item, the said bishop, now being cardinall, was assoiled of his bishoprike of Winchester, wherevpon he sued vnto our holie father, to haue a bull declaratorie, notwithstanding he was assumpt to the state of cardinall, that the se was not void, where in deed it stood void by a certeine time, yet the said bull were granted; and so he was exempt from his ordinarie, by the taking on him the state of cardinall, and the church bishoprike of Winchester, so standing void, he toke againe of the pope (you not learned thereof ne knowing whereby he was fallen into the case of prouision) so that all his god was lawfullie & clerelie possessed to you my right doubted lord, with more; as the statute declareth plainelie for your aduantage.

4 Item, it is not vnknown to you (doubted lord) how thorough your lands it is noised, that the said cardinall and the archbishop of Yorke had and haue the gouernance of you, and all your land, the which none of your true liege men ought to vsurpe nor take vpon them. And haue also estranged me your sole vncle, my cosine of Yorke, my cosine of Huntington, and manie other lords of your kin, to haue anie knowledge of anie great matter, that might touch your high estate, or either of your realmes. And of lords spirituall, of right, the archbishop of Canturburie should be your cheefe counsellor, the which is also estranged and set aside. And so be manie other right sad lords, and well aduised, as well spirituall as tempozall, to the great hurt of you my right doubted lord, and of your realmes, like as the experience and workes shewen clerelie and euidentlie, more harme it is.

5 Item, in the tender age of you, my right doubted lord, for the necessitie of an armie, the said cardinall lent you foure thousand pounds vpon certeine iewels, pised at two and twentie thousand markes, with a letter of sale, that and they were not quited at a certeine daie, you should lese them. The said cardinall seeing your monie readie to haue quited your iewels, caused your tresuroz of England, at that daie being, to paie the same monie, in part of an other armie, in defrauding you my right doubted lord of your said iewels, keeping them yet alwaie to his owne vse, to your right great losse, and his singular profit and auant.

6 Item, the said cardinall, then being bishop of Winchester, and chancelour of England, deliuered the king of Scots, vpon certeine appointments (as maie be shewen) presumptuouslie, and of his owne authoritie, contrarie to the act of parlement. I haue heard notable men of law say, that they neuer heard the like thing done among them: which was to great a defamacion to your highnesse, and also to wed his nece to the said king, whom that my lord of notable

notable memorie, your father, whome God assoile, would neuer haue so deliuered. And there as he should haue paid for his costs forty thousand pounds, the said cardinall, chancellour of England, caused you to pardon him thereof ten thousand marks, whereof the greater summe he paid you, right a little, what, I report me to your highnesse.

7 Item, where the said cardinall lent you, my redoubted lord, great and notable summes, he hath had and his assignes, the rule and profit of the port of Hampton, where the customers bene his seruants, where (by likelihood and as it is to be supposed) standing the these merchant of the woole of your land, that you be greatlie defrauded, and vnder that rule, what woole and other merchandizes haue bene shipped, and maie be from time to time, hard is to estimate, to the great hurt and preiudice of you my right doubted lord, and of all your people.

8 Item, howbeit that the said cardinall hath diuerse times lent you great summes of monie, since the time of your reigne, yet his loane hath bene so deferred and delaied, that for the most part, the conuenable season of the imploying of the good lent was passed. So that little fruit or none came thereof, as by experience both your realmes haue sufficientlie in knowledge.

9 Item, where there was setwels and plate pressed at cleuen thousand pounds in weight, of the said cardinall, forfeited to you my right redoubted lord, he gat him a ressozement thereof for a loane of a little parcell of the same: and so defrauded you wholie of them, to your great hurt, and his auaille, the which god might greatlie haue eased your highnesse, in sparing as much of the poore commons.

10 Item, the cardinall being scott of my said lord your father (whome God assoile) against his intent, gaue Elizabeth Beauchampe, three hundred markes liuelihod, where that his will was, that and she were wedded with in a yeaer, then to haue it, or else not, where in deed it was two or three yeaers after, to your great hurt, and diminishing of your inheritance.

11 Item, notwithstanding that the said cardinall hath no maner of authoritie nor interest in the crowne, nor none maie haue by anie possibilitie, yet he presumeth and taketh vpon him in partie, your estate to fall, in calling before him, into great abusion of all your land, and derogation of your highnesse, which hath not bene seene nor vsed in no daies heretofore, in greater estate than he is, without your expresse ordinance and commandment.

12 Item, the said cardinall, nothing considering the necessitie of you my right doubted lord, hath sued a pardon of fines, that he should paie for the church of Winchester, for terme of his life, giuing thereby occasion to all other lords spirituall, to draine their god will for anie necessitie, to grant anie fine: and so to laie all the charge vpon the tempozaltie, and the poore people.

13 Item, by the gouernance and labour of the said cardinall, and archbishop of Poike, there hath bene lost and dispended much notable and great good, by diuerse ambassadors sent out of this realme. First to Arras, for a feigned colourable peace, where as by likelihood it was thought and supposed, that it should neuer turne to the effectuall auaille of you my right doubted lord, nor to your said realmes: but vnder colour thereof, was made the peace of your aduersarie, and the duke of Burgognie. For else your partie aduersarie, & the said duke, might not well haue found meanes nor waies to haue communed together, nor to haue concluded with other their confederations and conspirations made and wrought there, then, at that time, against your highnesse, whereby you might haue (right doubted lord) the greater partie of your obissance, as well in your realme of France, as in your duchie of Normandie, and much other thing gone greatlie, as through the said colourable treatie, & otherwise, since the death of my brother of Bedford (whome God assoile.)

14 Item, now of late was sent an other ambassadour to Calis, by the labour and counsell of the said cardinall, and archbishop of Poike, the cause wherof the beginning, is to me your sole uncle, and other lords of your kin and counsell unknowen, to your great charge, and against the publike good of your realme, as it openlie appeareth. The which god if it be imputed for the defense of your lands, the merchandizes of the same might haue had other course, and your said lands not to haue stand in so great mischance as they doe.

15 Item, after that, to your great charge, and hurt of both your realmes, the said cardinall & archbishop of Poike went to your said towne of Calis, and diuerse lords of your kin, and of your counsell in their fellowship, and there, as there was naturall warre betwene the duke of Orleans, and the duke of Burgognie, for murder of their fathers, a capitall enimitie like to haue induced for euer: the said cardinall and archbishop of Poike licenced and suffered the said duke of Orleans, to intreat and common apart with the counsell of your said aduersaries, as well as with the duchies of Burgognie: by which meane the peace and alliance was made betwene the two dukes, to the greatest fortifying of your said capitall aduersaries that could be thought, and consequentlie (my dere redoubted lord) to your greatest charge, and hurt to both your realmes. Vnder colour of which treatie, your said aduersaries in meane time wan your citie of Meaur, and the countrie thereabout, and manie diuerse roades made into your duchie of Normandie, to the great noisance and destruction of your people, as it sheweth openlie.

16 Item, the said archbishop of Poike, sent with other into this your realme from the said cardinall, after communication had with your aduersarie partie, at your said towne of Calis, made at his coming into your notable presence at Windsor, all the suasions and colour, all motions in the most apparant wise that he could, to induce your highnesse to your agrement, to the desires of your capitall aduersaries, as I saw there in your noble presence of his writing, at which time (as I vnderstand) it was his singular opinion, that is to saie: that you should leaue your right, your title, and your honour of your crowne, and nomination of you king of France, during certeine yeaers, & that you should vtterlie absteine you and be content onelie in writing, with Rex Anglia, &c. to the great note of infamie that euer fell to you or anie of your noble progenitours, since the taking of them first, the said title and right of your realme and crowne of France. To which matter in your presence there, after that it had liked your said highnesse, to aske mine aduise there vpon, with other of your blood and counsell: I answered and said, that I would neuer agre me thereto to die therfore, and of the same disposition I am yet, and will be while I live in conseruation of your honour, and of your oth made vnto your said crowne, in time of your coronation there.

17 Item, the said cardinall and archbishop of Poike, haue so laboured vnto your highnesse, that you should intend to a new date of convention, in March or Aprill next comming, where it is noised to be more against your worship than with it. And where it was euident to all the world, that the rupture and breaking of the said peace, should haue fallen heretofore, of your aduersarie partie; because of the great intrusions. Note by that meanes it is like peradventure to be laid vnto the verie great slander of you my doubted lord, like to come to none other purpose nor effect, than other conuersions haue done afore time: and so by subtilties and counsell of your said enemies, your land (they in hope and trust of the said treatie, not knightlie nor puissantlie purueied for) shall be like vnder the colour of the same treatie to be burnt vp and destroyed, lost, and utterly lie turned from your obseruance.

18 Item it is said, that the deliuerance of the said duke of Gloucestre, is utterly appointed by the mediation, counsell, and stirring of the said cardinall and archbishop of Yorke; and for that cause diuerse persons bene come from your aduersaries, into this your realme, and the said duke also brought to your citie of London. Where as my lord your father (whom God assoile) perishing so greatlie the inconueniences, and harme that might fall, onlie by his deliuerance, concluded, ordeined, and determined in his last will, utterly in his will to be, his conquest in his realme of France. And yet then it is to be done, by as great deliberation, solemnitie and suertie, as may be deuised or thought. And seeing now the disposition of your enemies, and what aid they haue gotten against you there, aswell vnder the colour of the said treatie, as otherwise; what may or ought to be thought or said, for that labouring the said duke (all things considered) by such particular persons, the lords of your blood not called thereunto, I report me vnto your noble grace and excellencie, and vnto the said wise true men of this your realme.

19 Item, where that euerie true counsellor, speciallie vnto anie king or prince, ought of truth and of dutie, to counsell, promote, increase, prefer, and aduance the weale and prosperitie of his lord: the said cardinall, being of your counsell (my right doubted lord) hath late purchased of your highnesse, certeine great lands and liuelode: as the castell and lordship of Chiche in Wales, and other lands in this your realme, vnto which I was called suddenly, and so in eschewing the breaking and losse of your armie then againe, seeing there other remedie, gaue thereunto mine aid: not thinking that who that euer labour red moued or stirred the matter first vnto your lordship, counselled you neither for your worship nor profit.

20 More, the said cardinall hath you bound apart, to make him a sure estate of all the said lands, by Easter next coming, as could be deuised by anie learned counsell; or else that suertie not made, the said cardinall to haue and reioy to him, and his heirs for euermore, the lands of the duchie of Lancaster, in Dorsetshire, to the value of seven or eight hundred marks by yeare. Which thing seemeth right strange and vnseene, and vnhard waies of anie liege man, to seke vpon his Soueraigne lord, both in his inheritance and in his iewels and goods. For it is thought, but if right and extreme necessitie caused it, there should not ought no such things to be done: from which necessitie God (for his mercie) euer preferue your noble person. Therefore my redoubted lord, seeing that ye should be so counselled, or stirred to leaue your crowne and inheritance in England; and also by fraud and subtil meanes, as is afore rehearsed, so to lose your iewels: in my truth and in mine acquit (as me seemeth) I may not nor ought not counsell so great an hurt to you and to all your land.

21 Item, it is not vnknown to you my right doubted lord how oftentimes I haue offered my seruice, to and for the defence of your realme of France, and duchie of Normandie, where I haue bene put thereto by the labour of the said cardinall, in preferring other after his singular affection: which hath caused a great part of the said duchie of Normandie, aswell as of your realme of France to be lost, as it is well known. And what god (my right doubted lord) was lost on that armie that was last sent thither, which the earle of Poitiers, your counsell of France, hath well & chereleie declared to your highnesse here before.

22 Item, my right doubted lord, it is not known, that it had not bene possible to the said cardinall, to haue come to his great riches, but by such meanes, for of his church it might not rise, and inheritance he had none. Therefore my right doubted lord, sith there is great god behouefull at this time, for the weale and safeguard of your realmes, the pouertie, necessitie, & indigence of your liege people; in highnesse vnderstand, like it vnto your noble grace, to consider the said lurre of the said cardinall, and the great deceits that you be receiued in by the labour of him & of the archbishop, aswell in this your realme as in your realme of France and duchie of Normandie, where neither office, liuelode, nor capteine may be had, without so great god given vnto him, whereby a great part of all the losse that is lost, they haue bene the causers of; for who that would giue most, his was the price, not considering the merits, seruice, nor sufficiency of persons. Furthermore, it is greatlie to be considered, how, when the said cardinall had forfeited all his goods, because of promise, as the statute therevpon more plainelie declareth; by hauing the rule of you my right doubted lord, purchased himselfe in great defraudation of your highnesse, a quarter of pardon, the which god and it had be well governed, might manie yeares haue suffeined your warres, without anie tallage of your poore people.

23 Item, my redoubted lord, whereas I wrote much thing for the weale of you and of your realmes, peradventure some will saie and vnderstand, that I would or haue written by waie of acusement of all your counsell, which God knoweth, I do not: for your highnesse may well see, that I name them that be causers of the said inordinate rule. Therefore, considering that the said cardinall and archbishop of Yorke bene they, that pretend the gouernance of you, and of your realmes and lordships: please it vnto your highnesse, of your right wisenesse to estrange them of your counsell, to that intent, that men may be at their freedom, to say what they thinke of truth.

24 For truth, I dare speake of my truth, the poore dare not do so. And if the cardinall and the archbishop of Yorke, may afterward declare themselves, of that is, and shalbe said of them; you my right doubted lord may then restore them againe to your counsell, at your noble pleasure.

When the king had heard the accusations thus laid by the duke of Gloucester against the cardinall, he committed the examination thereof to his counsell, whereof the more part were spirituall persons; so that what for feare, and what for fauour, the matter was winked at, and nothing said to it: onelie faire countenance was made to the duke, as though no malice had bene conceiued against him. But beneuolence will break out, & inward grudge will some appeare, which was this yeare to all men apparent: for diuers secret attempts were aduanced forward this season against this noble man Humfreie duke of Gloucester a far off, which in conclusion came so nere, that they bereft him both of life and land; as shall hereafter more plainelie appeare.

For first this yeare, dame Eleanor Cobham, wife to the said duke, was accused of treason; for that she by sorcerie and inchantment intended to destroy the king, to the intent to aduance hir husband vnto the crown.

croffed. Upon this, he was examined in saint Stephens chappell before the bishop of Canturburie, and there by examination and disputation open penance in three open places within the citie of London. [Polychronicon] said: the was intoned to go through the chappell with a taper in his hand, and after that aduoged to perpetuall imprisonment in the Isle of Man, under the keeping of sir John Stanley knight. At the same season were arrested, arraigned, and aduoged gillie, as moers to the duchesse, Thomas Southwell priest, and canon of St. Stephens at Westminister, John Hym priest, Roger Woling, broke a cunning necromancer (as it was said) and Margerie Jordanne, surnamed the witch of Eie.

The matter laid against them, was for that they (at the request of the said duchesse) had deuised an image of warre representing the king, which by their force by little and little continued, intending thereby in conclusion to waste and destroye the kings person. Margerie Jordanne was burnt in Smithfield, and Roger Woling, who was drawne to Tiborne, and hanged and quartered; talking vpon his death that there was neuer anie such thing by them imagined. John Hym had his pardon, and Southwell died in the Tower the night before his execution. [for (saith Polychr.) he did prophesie of himselfe that he should die in his bed, and not by iustice.] The duke of Gloucester bare all these things patiently, and said little. Edward sonne to the duke of Burke was borne this yeare the nine and twentieth of Aprill at Rone, his father being the kings lieutenant in Normandie. In this yeare was a great fraie in Fleetstreet in the night time, betwene gentlemen of courts and inhabitants of London; insomuch that much blood was spilt, diuerse slaine outright, and some mortallie wounded; besides great harme otherwise done and suffered.]

Upon the daie of the translation of saint Edward, on the twelfth of October, vpon which daie the maior and his brethren for the yeare following, and daie when the commoners of the citie, after their ancient custome had chosen two aldermen, such as before had bene sherriffes of London and of Middlesex, namely Robert Clopton draper, and Rafe Holland tailor, and them presented by name vnto the maior and his brethren, then sitting in the vtter chamber where the maiors courts be kept, to the intent that the said maior and his brethren might chuse one of the said two, such as they thought most necessarie and worshipfull for the roime; the said maior and his brethren choosing Robert Clopton, brought him after done vpon his right hand towards the hall. Where of some certaine tailors there present were aware, and said that Rafe Holland was not chosen, anon they cried; Nay, nay; not this, but Rafe Holland. Wherevnto the old maior being assonshen, stood still vpon the faire, and commanded them to keepe silence, and so held on his waie to the east end of the hall, where he sat him downe, and his brethren about him. In the meane time, the said tailors continued their crye, and incensed others of base trades of the citie (as simple persons) to take their part, and to crye as fast as they, not proffering to cease their misrule for all that the maior could saie, no nor yet when the maiors sergeant at armes had cried Oyes. Herevpon the maior, to appease the rumor, sent downe the sherriffes, and commanded them to take the offenders, and send them to the goale; which precept was fulfilled, about twelue or thirteene of the principall committed to Newgate, where some of them abode a long time imprisoned; and others that were fined set at libertie. This is reported by Polychronicon, but in somewhat a differing manner.]

pulse of the French king, attached in the duchie of Guen, and therefore doubting some other the like attempt, they sent thither sir William Woodville with eight hundred men, to strengthen the frontiers, and further; set forth a proclamation, that all shipp which would transport anie coine, cheafe, or other victuels thither, should paie no manner of custome or tallage; which licence caused the countrie of Aquitaine to be well furnished of all things necessarie. About this season John the ballant lord Talbot for his approved prowesse and wisdom, as well in England as in France, both in peace and warre so well tried, was created earle of Shrewsburie, and with a compaignie of three thousand men sent againe into Normandie, for the better defence of the same.

This yeare died Robert de Belesme bishop of Ely, being the true and identitish that intoid that place; who came to the same after this manner. After the death of Philip Morgan bishop of that see, the monks of Ely chose for their pastor Robert de Belesme bishop of London; but he died at saint Oles before his confirmation; neither possessed the honour thereof. Wherevpon the king directed his letters to the count of Ely, to make election of Thomas Audborne (bishop of S. Davids in Wales) for their bishop. But they contrarie thereto (taking it now for a custome, hauing so often used it before, as did well appeare) made choise of Thomas Bourchier (borne of a noble house, sonne to the countesse of Stafford, chancellor of Drenford, and bishop of Worcester) to succeed Philip Morgan. Which Bourchier, the king (offended with the monks for the little regard had to his request) utterlie refused, and would not admit him vnto that place. Wherevpon there were bulls procured from Eugenius the fourth (then bishop of Rome) which were sent into England to confirme the election of the said Bourchier.

But he wiselie fearing to fall into the dangerous statute of Excommunicate, durst not receiue or execute the tenor of the popes commandement. By reason whereof, least the see might otherwise remaine void, (if speedie remedie were not prouided) the king did in commendam bestow the bishopricke of Ely vpon this Lodowike Litchburne archbishop of Rone, by office, Card. A. Gerinat. Cancellar. Frantisc. Northman, and kinsman to the said king. Which done, Eugenius (when he saw no other remedie) did reuoke his bulls made before to Thomas Bourchier, in the yeare of Christ 1437. This Lodowike remaining bishop six yeares and so manie moneths, died in the yeare as before, the eighteenth of September, at his manor of Hatfield, whose bowels were buried in the said church; his hart was caried to Rone, and there honourablie intombed, and his bodie was committed to the earth; in the church of Ely, betwene two marble pilloirs next to the altar of the reliques.]

In this yeare died in Guen the countesse of Comminges, to whome the French king and also the earle of Arminache pretended to be heire, in so much that the earle entred into all the lands of the said ladie. And because he knewe the French king would not take the matter well, to haue a Roulard for an Adverser; he sent soleinne ambassadours to the king of England, offering him his daughter in marriage, with promise to be bound (beside great summes of monie, which he would giue with hir) to deliuer into the king of Englands hands, all such castles and townes, as he or his ancestors deined from him within anie part of the duchie of Aquitaine, either by conquest of his progenitors, or by gift and deliuerie of anie French king; and further to aid the same king with monie for the recouerie of other citie's within the same duchie, from the French king; or from anie other person that against king Henrie

Anno Reg. 22.

The diet at Tours for a peace to be had betwene England and France.

This offer seemed so profitable and also honorable to king Henrie and the realme, that the ambassadors were well heard, honourable received, and with rewards sent home into their countrie. After whome were sent for the conclusion of the marriage into Cuten, sir Edward Hall, sir Robert Ros, and John Grafton deane of S. Severines, the which (as all the chonographers agree) both concluded the ma-riage, and by priorie affied the young ladie. The French king not a little offended herewith, sent his eldest sonne Leues the Dolphin of Vienne into Rouergue with a puissant armie, which toke the earle and his youngest sonne, with both his daughters, and by force obtained the countries of Arminacke, Louvergne, Rouergue, and Poulemonois, beside the cities Seuerac & Cadec, chasing the bastard of Arminacke out of his countries, and so by reason hereof, the concluded marriage was deferred, and that so long that it neuer toke effect, as hereafter it may appeare.

In this yeare was an act made by authoritie of the common counsell of London, that upon the sun-daie no manner of thing within the franchises and liberties of the said citie should be bought or sold, neither vttils nor other thing. It was also enacted by the same common counsell with full consent, and ratified by the authoritie of the law-makers, that no artificer or handicrafts man should bring his wares, commodities, or woorke, unto any person or persons to be worne or occupied on that daie: because it was iudged a foule profanation thereof. And peoples minds giuen to couetousnesse, make no exception of times or places in a case of aduantage and gaine. In consideration whereof, and for the suppressing of this abuse, this law was ordeined and made: the force whereof did principallie extend to tailors and shomakers (who as on that daie bring home their garments and shoes to the parties for whome they are made) and likewise to all other occupations and trades. But this ordinance (saith mine author) was to good for so bad an age, and therefore died within a short time after the magistrate had giuen it life.

On Candlemasse eue this yere by lightning in a tempest that fell with claps of thunder at afternone, Pauls steeple was set on fier in the middell of the spere or chappell in the vert timber woorke, which was quenched by the painfullnesse of diuerse persons, and specialie by the diligent labour of a priest of Bow in Cheape. Howbeit the same was thought unpossible to be quenched, but that the grace of God was chefe woorker in the same. This steeple hath diuerse times bene ouerthrowne and defaced, partlie by winds, and partlie by lightning, as may be obserued in the reading of this volume: yea when the same hath bene repaired by the choicest woorkemen, and of the substantiallest stufte, and all meanes (that God with the deepe deuile of man) bled to make it so sure that it might continue, as a monument of perpetui-tie for posteritie to wonder at and admire. But to returne to the historie.

Whilist England was inquieted (as you haue heard) and France by spoile, slaughter, and burning force defaced (a mischance in all places much lamented) therefore to agree the two puissant kings, all the princes of christendome trauelled so effectiuaillie by their oratours and ambassadours, that a diet was appointed to be kept at the citie of Tours in Touraine; where for the king of England appeared William de la Pole earle of Suffolke, doctor Adam Spolins keeper of the kings priuie seale, also sir Robert Ros, and diuers other. And for the French king were appointed Charles duke of Brabant, Leues de Bourbon earle of Wandosme, great maister of the French kings household, Piers de Belle Neward of Poitou, and Bertram Beaulieu lord of Bresignie.

There were also sent thither ambassadours from the emper, from Spaine, from Denmarke, & from Hungarie; to be mediators betwixt the two princes. The assenbly was great, but the cost was much greater, inasmuch that currie part for the honour of their prince and praise of their countrie, set forth themselves, as well in fairs as apparell, to the vttermost. Many meetings were had, and many things moued for a small peace; but in conclusion, by reason of many doubts which rose on both parties, no full concord could be agreed upon; but in hope to come to a peace, a certaine truce, as well by sea as by land, was concluded by the commissioners for eighteen moneths, which after ward againe was prolonged to the peace of our Lord 1449.

In treating of this truce, the earle of Suffolke aduertising somewhat upon his commission, without the assent of his associates, imagined, that the next waie to come to a perfect peace, was to contriue a marriage betwene the French kings kinswoman, the ladie Margaret daughter to Reiner duke of Anjou, and his soueraine lord king Henrie. This Reiner duke of Anjou named himselfe king of Sicill, Naples, and Jerusalem, hauing onlie the name and title of those realmes; without any penie, profit, or foot of possession. This marriage was made strange to the earle at the first, and one thing seemed to be a great hinderance to it; which was, because the king of England occupied a great part of the duchie of Anjou, and the whole countrie of Spaine, appertaining (as was alledged) to king Reiner.

The earle of Suffolke (I cannot saie) either corrupted with bribes, or too much affectioned to this unprofitable marriage, condescended, that the duchie of Anjou and the countrie of Spaine should be deliuered to the king the brides father, demanding for his mariage neither penie nor farthing: as who would saie, that this new affinitie passed all riches, and excelled both gold and pretious stones. And to the intent that of this truce might insue a small concord, a date of entervies was appointed betwene the two kings in a place conuenient betwene Chartres and Rone.
When these things were concluded, the earle of Sulfolke with his companie returned into England, where he forgot not to declare what an honourable truce he had taken, out of the which there was a great hope that a small peace might grow the sooner for that honorable marriage, which he had concluded, omitting nothing that might extoll and set forth the personage of the ladie, or the nobilitie of his kindred.

But although this marriage pleased the king and diuerse of his counsell, yet Humfre duke of Glou-ster protector of the realme was much against it, alledging that it should be both contrarie to the lawes of God, and dishonorable to the prince, if he should breaks that promise and contract of marriage, made by ambassadours sufficientlie thereto instructed, with the daughter of the earle of Arminacke, upon conditions both to him and his realme, as much profitable as honorable. But the dukes words could not be heard, for the earles doings were onlie liked and allowed. So that for performance of the conclusions, the French king sent the earle of Wandosme, great maister of his house, and the archbishop of Reims first peere of France, and diuerse other into England, where they were honorable received; and after that the instruments were once sealed and deliue-red on both parts, the said ambassadours returned againe into their countries with great gifts and rewards.

When these things were done, the king both for honour of his realme, and to assure to himselfe mo friends, created John Holland earle of Huntington duke of Excester as his father was: Humfre earle of Stafford was made duke of Buckingham: and Henrie earle of Marwike was cleved to the title of duke of Marwike, to whome the king also gave the castell of Bristowe, with the Ile of Jerneise, and Carneseie. Also the earle of Suffolke was made marquesse of Suffolke, which marquesse with his wife and manie honorable personages of men and women richlie adorned both with apparell & Jewels, having with them manie costlie chariots and gozgeous horsemen, sailed into France for the conuenience of the nominated queene into the realme of England. For king Keiner his father, for all his long stile had to thort a purre to send his daughter honorable to the king his spouse.

Anno Reg. 23.
1445

This noble companie came to the citie of Tours in Touraine, where they were honorable received both of the French king and of the king of Sicill. 20 The marquesse of Suffolke as procurator to king Henrie, espoused the said ladie in the church of saint Martins. At the which marriage were present the father and mother of the bride; the French king himselfe, which was uncle to the husband; and the French queene also, which was aunt to the wife. There were also the dukes of Aicance, of Calabze, of Aianfon, and of Britaine, seaven earls, twelue barons, twen-tie bishops, beside knights and gentlemen. When the feast, triumph, bankets and iusts were ended, the ladie was deliuered to the marquesse, who in great estate conueied hir through Normandie unto Diepe, and so transported hir into England, where she landed at Portsmouth in the moneth of Aprill. This ladie excelled all other, as well in beautie and fauour, as in wit and pollicie, and was of stomack and courage more like to a man than a woman.

the sixt.

This marriage seemed to manie both infortunate and unprofitable to the realme of England, and that for manie causes. First, the king had not one penie with hir; and for the fetching of hir, the marquesse of Suffolke demanded a whole fifteenth in open parlement. And also there was deliuered for hir the duchie of Anion, the citie of Mans, and the whole countie of Amaine, which countries were the verie states and backstanes to the duchie of Normandie. And furthermore, the earle of Arminacke toke such displeasure with the king of England for this marriage, that he became vnder enemy to the crowne of England, and was the cause that the Englishmen were expelled out of the whole duchie of Aquitaine.

But most of all it should seeme, that God was displeased with this marriage: for after the confirmation thereof, the kings friends fell from him, both in England and in France, the lords of his realme fell at diuision, and the commons rebelled in such foze, that finally after manie fields foughten, and manie thousands of men slaine, the king at length was deposed, and his sonne killed, and this queene sent home againe, with as much miserie and sorow as she was receiued with pompe and triumph: such is the instabilitie of worldlie felicitie, and so wauering is false flattering fortune. Which mutation and change of the better for the worse could not but ne-tie and sting hir with pensiuensse, yea and anie other person that fouer, that hauing bene in good estate, falleth into the contrarie: thereto the saying of the poet giueth credit, in these fewe words following;

Quem res plus nimio delectauere secunda, Mutata quatiunt.

Ouid. 2. de art.

This yeare, after the deceasse of Henrie Chicheleie archbishop of Canturburie, succceeded John Stafford in that see, being translated from Bath and Wells.
He was the thirteene and one archbishop, as Polydore noteth. During the time of the truce, Richard duke of Yorke and diuerse other capteins repaired into England, both to visit their wiues, children, and friends, and also to consult what should be done, if the truce ended. For the which cause a parlement was called, in the which it was speciallie concluded, that by gods foresight Normandie might be so furnished for defense before the end of the truce, that the French king should take no aduantage through want of timelie provision: for it was knowne, that if a peace were not concluded, the French king did prepare to imploie his whole puissance to make open warre. Whereupon monie was granted, an armie le-uiued, and the duke of Summerfet appointed to be regent of Normandie, and the duke of Yorke thereof discharged.

Anno Reg. 24.

1446

The duke of Summerfet
made regent
of Normadie, and the duke of Yorke discharged.

I haue scene in a register booke belonging sometime to the abbeie of saint Albons, that the duke of Yorke was established regent of France, after the deceasse of the duke of Bedford, to continue in that office for the tearme of five yeares; which being expired, he returned home, and was iustfullie receiued of the king with thanks for his good seruice, as he had full well deserued in time of that his gouerne-ment: and further, that now when a new regent was to be chosen and sent ouer, to abide vpon safe-gard of the countries beyond the seas as yet subiect to the English dominion, the said duke of Yorke was estones (as a man most meet to supplie that roune) appointed to go ouer againe, as regent of France with all his former allowances.

The duke of Yorke appointed to charge againe.

But the duke of Summerfet still maligning the duke of Yorkes aduancement, as he had sought to hinder his dispatch at the first when he was sent ouer to be regent, as before we haue heard: he likewise now wrought so, that the king reuoked his grant made to the duke of Yorke for enioieng of that office the terme of other five yeeres, and with helpe of William marquesse of Suffolke obtained that grant for himselfe. Which malicious deling the duke of Yorke might so euill beare, that in the end the heate of displeasure burst out into such a flame, as consumed at length not onelie both those two noble personages; but also manie thousands of others, though in diuers times and seasons, as in places hereafter (as occasion serueth) it shall more euidentlie appeare. But now to returne to the parlement.

The appointment disapoin-
ted, and pointed to the mar-quesse of Suffolke.

The marques of Suffolke, supposing all men had as well liked his doings (during the time of his legation in France) as himselfe, the second daie of June

The marques of Suffolke request.

June in the first session of this parlement, in the higher house openlie, eloquentlie, and boldlie declared his paine, trauell, and diligence susteined in his said legation, as well for the taking and concluding an abstinence of warre, as in the making of the marriage; remembreing them also that the said truce expired the first of Aprill next, except a small peace, or a further truce were concluded in the meane season: and therefore he aduised them to prouide and foresee things necessarie for the warre (as though no concord should succeed) least happilie the Frenchmen perceiving them vnproouided, would take their aduantage, and agree neither to peace nor amitie; sateing vnto them further, that sith he had admonished the king and them according to his dutie, if anie thing happened otherwise than well, he was thereof innocent and guiltlesse, and had acquitted himselfe like a true and louing subiect, and a faithfull counsellour, praieng the lordes to haue it in remembrance.

Likewise on the morow after, he descended into the common house, accompanied with certeine lordes, and there declared the same matter to the knights, citizens, and burgesses, praieng the commons for his discharge, that as well all his doings and proceedings in the kings affaires beyond the sea, as also his aduertisement and counsell opened to the lordes and commons now together assembled, might be by the king and them inacted and inrolled in the records of the parlement. Whereupon the next daie after, the speaker William Burghleie, and the companie of the lower house, repaired vnto the kings presence, sitting amongst the lordes of the upper house, & there humbly required that the request of the marquess might be granted. And so likewise the lordes made the like petition kneeling on their knees, insomuch that the king condescended to their desires: and so the labours, demeanours, diligences, and declarations of the said marquess, together with the desires not onlie of the lordes, but also of the commons, as well for the honour of him and his posteritie, as for his acquittal and discharge, were inacted and inrolled in the records of the parlement.

By the quenes meanes hostile after also was the said marquess aduanced so in authoritie, that he ruled the king at his pleasure, and to his high preferment obtained the wardships both of the bodie and lands of the countesse of Warwicke, and of the ladie Margaret sole hetre to John duke of Summerset, which ladie was afterwarde mother to king Henrie the seauenth: and besides that, caused the king to create John de Foix, sonne vnto Gaston de Foix, earle of Longuile, and the Capdau de Beuse earle of Kendall, which John had married his niece, and by his procurement the king elected to the order of the garter the said Gaston, and John his sonne, giuing to the sonne towards the maintenance of his degree, lands and castles, amounting to the summe of one thousand pounds, which lands, name, and stile the issue and line of the said earle of Kendall at this daie haue and inioy.

These things being thus in doing, the French king, seeing that the towne of Mans was not deliuered according to the appointment taken by force of the marriage, raised an armie for to recouer the same. Whereof the king of England being aduertised (least the breach of the truce should come by him) caused the towne to be deliuered without anie force.

This yeare was a great commotion in Norwiche against the prior of the place. At length the citizens opened the gates to the duke of Norfolke, who came thither to appease the matter, though at the first they would not suffer him to enter. The chiefe offenders were (according to their demerits) grauously punished and executed, and the mayor was discharged of his office, and sir John Clifton was made gouernour there, vntill the king had restored the citizens to their ancient liberties. This commotion was begun for certeine new exactions which the prior claimed and took of the citizens, contrarie to their ancient freedom. But herein a wrong taken for getting of right was worthilie corrected.

In the foure and twentieth yeare of this kings reigne, the prior of Raimaine appeached the earle of 10 Dymond of treason. For triall thereof the place of combat was assigned in Smithfield, & the barriers for the same there readie pitcht. Wherbeit, in the meane time a doctor of diuinitie, named master Gilbert Worthington, parson of saint Andzeus in Holborne, and other honest men, made such lute with diligent labour and paines-taking to the kings counsell, that when the daie of combat approached, the quarrell was taken into the kings hands, and there ended. In the same yeare also, a certeine armourer was appeached of treason by a seruant of his owne. For proue thereof a daie was giuen them to fight in Smithfield, insomuch that in conflict the said armourer was overcome and slaine; but yet by misgouerning of himselfe. For on the morow, when he should come to the field fresh and fasting, his neighbours came to him, and gaue him wine and strong drinke in such excessive sort, that he was therewith disempered, and reeled as he went, and so was slaine without guilt. As for the false seruant, he liued not 30 long unpunished; for being conuict of felonie in court of assise, he was iudged to be hanged, and so was at Tiburne.

Whilist the warres betwene the two nations of 40 England & France ceased (by occasion of the truce) the minds of men were not so quiet, but that such as were bent to malicious reuenge, sought to compasse their prepened purpose, not against foren foes and enemies of their countrie, but against their owne countrie men, and those that had deserved verie well of the common-wealth: and this speciallie for ouermuch mildnesse in the king, who by his authoritie might haue ruled both parts, and ordered all differences betwixt them, but that in deed he was thought to soft for gouernour of a kingdome. The quene contrariwise, a ladie of great wit, and no lesse courage, desirous of honour, and furnished with the gifts of reason, policie, and wisdome; but yet sometime (according to hir kind) when she had bene fullie bent on a matter, suddenly like a weather cocke, new 50 table and turning.

This ladie disdaining that hir husband should be ruled rather than rule, could not abide that the duke of Glocester should do all things concerning the order of weightie affaires, least it might be said, that she had neither wit nor stomach, which would permit and suffer hir husband being of most perfect age, like a yong pupill to be gouerned by the direction of an other man. Although this toy entered first into hir braine thorough hir owne imagination, yet was 60 she picked forward to the matter both by such of hir husbands counsell, as of long time had borne malice to the duke for his plainnesse vsed in declaring their vntuth (as partlie ye haue heard) and also by counsell from king Keiner hir father, aduising that she and the king should take vpon them the rule of the realme, and not to be kept vnder, as wards and mised orphans.

What needeth manie words? The quene persuaded by these meanes, first of all excluded the duke of Glocester from all rule and gouernance, not prohibiting such as she knewe to be his mostall foes to inuent and imagine causes and grieues against him and his, insomuch that by hir procurement, diuerse noble men conspired against him. ters affirme the marquesse of Suffolke, and the duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe, not unprouced by the cardinall of Winchester, and the archbishop of Yorke. Diuerse articles were laid against him in open counsell, and in especiall one; That he had caused men abridged to die, to be put to other execution, than the law of the land assigned. Suerlie the duke verie well learned in the law ciuill, detesting malefactors, and punishing offenses in severity of iustice, gat him hatred of such as feared condigne reward for their wicked doings. And although the duke sufficientlie answered to all things against him objected: yet because his death was determined, his wisdom and innocencie nothing auailed.

But to avoid danger of tumult that might be raised, if a prince so well beloued of the people should be openlie executed; his enemies determined to worke their feats in his destruction, yet he should haue anie warning. For effecting whereof, a parliament was summoned to be kept at Berrie, whither resorted all the peeres of the realme, and amongst them the duke of Gloucester; which on the second daie of the session was by the lord Beaumont, then high constable of England, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and others, arrested, apprehended, and put in ward, and all his seruants sequestred from him, and thirtie two of the chiefe of his retinue were sent to diuerse prisons, to the great admiration of the people. The duke the night after he was thus committed to prison, being the foure and twentieth of Februarie, was found dead in his bed, and his bodie shewed to the lords and commons, as though he had died of a palfie, or of an imposthume.

The duke of Gloucester
was found.

But all indifferent persons (as saith Hall) might well vnderstand that he died of some violent death. Some iudged him to be strangled, some affirme that an hot spit was put in at his fundament, other write that he was smothered betwene two featherbeds, and some haue affirmed that he died of verie greafe, for that he might not come openlie to his answer. His dead corpe was conueied to saint Albons, and there buried. After his death, none of his seruants suffered: although fine of them, to wit, sir Roger Chamberlaine knight, Middleton, Herbert, Arsele esquires, and Richard Pecham gentleman, were arrested, condemned, and draynen to Tisborne, where they were hanged, let downe quicke, and stripped to haue bene bowelled and quartered; but the marques of Suffolke comming at that instant brought their pardons, shewed the same openlie, and so their liues were saved.

Deale of Gloucester
Cromwell.

Some thinke that the name and title of Gloucester hath bene vnluckie to diuerse, which for their honours haue bene created by creation of princes to that title and dignitie, as Hugh Spenser, Thomas of Woodstocke, sonne to king Edward the third, and this duke Humfreie: which three persons by miserable death finished their daies; and after them king Richard the third also duke of Gloucester in ciuill warre slaine. So that this name duke of Gloucester is taken for an unhappie title, as the proverbe speaketh of Seings horse, whose rider was cuer unhorsed, & whose possessor was cuer brought to miserie. But suerlie, by the pittifull death of this noble duke and politike gouernour, the publike wealth of the realme came to great decay, as by sequelle here may more at large appeare.

[Of times it hapneth that a man in quenching of smoke, burneth his fingers in the fire:] so the queene in casting how to keepe hir husband in honoz, and hir selfe in authoritie, in making awaie of this noble man, brought that to passe, which she had most cause to haue feared, which was the deposing of hir husband, & the decay of the house of Lancaster, which of likelihood had not chanced if this duke had liued: for then durst not the duke of Yorke haue attempted to set forth his title to the crowne, as he afterwards did, to the great trouble of the realme, and destruction of king Henrie, and of manie other noble men beside. This is the opinion of men, but Gods iudgements are vnsearchable, against whose decre and ordinance preuaileth no humane counsell.

But to conclude of this noble duke: he was an bright and politike gouernour, bending all his indures to the aduancement of the common-wealth, verie loning to the poore commons, and so beloued of them againe; learned, wise, full of courtesie, void of pride and ambition (a vertue rare in personages of such high estate) but where it is most commendable. But sith the praise of this noble man deserueth a large discourse, and meet for such as haue cunning how to handle the same (sith the ornaments of his mind were both rare & admirable, the feats of chivalrie by him commended and atchieued valiant and fortunate, his grauitie in counsell, and soundnesse of policie profound and singular, all which with a traine of other excellent properties linked together, require a man of manifold gifts to aduance them according to their dignitie) I refer the readers vnto maister Foxes booke of Acts and Monuments. Onlie this I ad, that in respect of his noble indowments, and his demeanor full of decencie, which he daile vfed, it seemeth he might well haue giuen this prettie poesie,

In this sixt and twentieth yeare of the reigne of this king, but in the first of the rule of the queene, I find nothing done worthy of reherfall within the realme of England; but that the marquesse of Suffolke, by great fauour of the king, & more desire of the queene, was created to the title and dignitie of duke of Suffolke, which he a short time inioied. For Richard duke of Yorke being greatlie alled by his wife to the chiefe peeres and potentates of the realme, beside his owne progenie, perceluing the king to be no ruler, but the whole burthen of the realme to rest in direction of the queene, & the duke of Suffolke, began secretlie to allure his friends of the nobilitie; and priuillie declared vnto them his title and right to the crowne, and likewise did he to certeine wise gouernours of diuerse cities and townes. Which attempt was so politikelie handled, and so secretlie kept, that prouision to his purpose was ready, before his purpose was openlie published; and his friends opened themselves, yet the contrarie part could them espie: for in conclusion all hostlie in mischief burst out as ye may hereafter heare.

Yorke remering about his title to the crowne.

During these doings, Henrie Beauford bishop of Winchester, and called the rich cardinall, departed out of this world, & buried at Westminister. He was son to John Duke of Lancaster, descended of an honorable linage, but borne in hast, more noble in blood than notable in learning, haucie in stomach, and high of countenance, rich aboue measure, but not verie liberall, disdainfull to his kin, and dreadfull to his lozers, preferring monie before friendship, manie things beginning and few performing, sating in malice and mischief; his insatiable countenance and hope of long life made him both to forget God, his prince, and himselfe. Of the getting of his goods both by power legantine, and spirituall bribery, I will not speake; but the keeping of them, which he chiefelie gathered for ambitious purpose, was both great losse to his naturall prince and native countrie: for his hidden riches might haue well holpen the king, and his secret treasure might haue relieved the communitie, when monie was scant and charges great.

The death of the bishop of Winchester &
his description.

[Of this catholike clerke such were the deeds, W. P.

Lib. 23. that with king and ech estate else (saith Polydor) the lighter was the losse, because as for his hat he was a prelate proud enough, so for a bishop was there a better sone set in his rowne. One William Patin, son and heire to Richard his father, and eldest brother to John that deceased deane of Chichester, and to Richard that lived and died at Walslo in Derbysheire. This William was a person by parentage bozne a gentleman, for vertue and learning first consecrate bishop of Winchester, then anon after for wisdom and integritie chosen lord chancellor of England: wherein his prudence made eminent, in warlike wielding the weight of that office at those daies, which were so dangerous for all estates to live in.

His vertuous disposition was right apparant, and it were but by this the godlie erection of that worthe worke, Spagdalene college in Driford, a plot right aptlie chosen out for studie at first, with strength and workmanship sone after builded according, in proportion beautifull outward, and for vse verie commodious within, sorted into a faire mansion for the president, severall and meet for a man to that office of worship and grauntie, and also into other rooms for the fellows, officers, and yonger students. Not without a vertuous remembrance of the verie tenderlings, who might appeare to be toward and teachable; whereof part to be trained by in the diuine science of musike inslie reported in a distichon, that the vse of it commendable seruing by sweet harmonie to praise God in church, and for delectable recreation to a gentlemanlike mind any where else: and part of these yonger ones to be taught the grammar in a faire schoule well appointed therefore, out of which as out of a nurserie of it owne, for supplement certeine to keepe full the number, these budlings at need from time to time to be dulie deriued and dyalwen.

Gaudia superum res sit mortalibus illis, Integra que reseat; musici sola reseat:

Now somewhat in casting vpon this deuout mans deuote and compasse; to consider the companie of students there, that in severall sciences and sundrie professions are not a few; then their assigned studies and exercises in them, their steps in rising & reward for diligence, from the lowest logician to the highest degrees of doctrine in scholes, their officers in house, their orders for gouernance in manners, in safeguard of health and helpe in sicknesse: and that chiefest is, the reuenues certeine for prouision & maintenance of all, it may be a question not easie to answer: whether at first in this founders meditation vpon such a worke were a mind more magnifike, or a more amplitude of abilitie after in so absolute a forme to performe it, or else a profounder wisdom for perpetuitie into so perfect an order in all points to haue firmitie.

It was a fashion at those daies, long also afore, & since, from a learned spirituall man to take alwaie the fathers surname (were it neuer so worshipfull or ancient) and giue him for it the name of the towne he was borne in: and so was Richard Pottingham a learned siter minozite in king Edward the seconds daies called of Pottingham where he was bozne; John Dineie a learned monke in those daies also, named of an Island wherein he was borne nie Gloucester; of Barton in Lincolnshire one William Barton in Richard the seconds reigne, for that time a famous doctor and chancellor of Driford; Walter Dille, of Dille in Suffolke a learned Carmelite frier, confessor to the duke and duchesse of Lancaster in king Henrie the fourths reigne; Richard Hampole of a towne in Dorsetshire, a pious doctor, and after a vertuous heremit in king Henrie the sixts daies.

And after this sort manie hundred more that had their names so altered: as euen in like maner vnto this reuerend prelat in the prime of his towardnesse was changed his fathers surname Paten to Wainfleet of the towne where he was borne in Lincolnshire: a matter right proueable adwell by the records of the house there extant, as by a faire deed remaining among other his proper evidences, in the hands of the worshipfull maister Thomas Stanhaw esquier, the quenes maiesties remembrancer in the eschequer at Westminister. And as the names of Germin, German, Germin, are but for one name though dinerlie wressed, and all to remember Germanie, the countrie their ancestors came from; and also as Jute, Jud, and Chute, are all but for the race of Jutes, one of the three first Germanic nations that came in with Hozlus and Hengist; and Caltrap, Caltrop and Calthorp was all but for Calthorp (that signifieth a cold towne) how euer it be otherwise wressed: euen so Paten, Patin, Patten, or Patent, is but a mention of the old Saron name, that trulie at first was Patan; of Pate, the sole of the foot, and thereof Patan to signifie flat footed, as among the Latines they were called Plautus or Plancus: so Cicero of a chiche or tare; Palones, Lablones and Labient, well nosed and lipt; & manie moze after that sort in manie tongs else so deriued.

That right manie students skilfull in the profoundest sciences and learned tongs, manie venerable clerks, who in most weightie causes with singular wisdom, successe and faith, haue serued their prince and countrie this college hath brought forth: hereto that manie toward wits it still to haue, hath had the good hap (which happilie yet to it doth retaine) may here with modestie a litle be touched, neither to comparison that were contentious folie, nor yet to such glozie that cannot be but vaine, but onlie in storie to mind, how vnto purposes vertuousslie deuided and wiselie pursued, Gods goodnesse alwaies giueth cheuing and thurst according.]

In this sevenen and twentieth yeare of king Henries reigne, as witnesse the English chronicles, a knight of France called sir Lewes de Bueil challenged an esquier of England, named Rafe Chalons, to trial of certeine feats of warre. Herevpon (as was thought conuenient) a date was appointed them to make proue thereof; the place also was assigned of their meeting, to wit, at a towne in France called Maunt or Maunce, where the French king at the same time was personallie present. But fortune (saith mine autho) was to Chalons so fauourable, and leaned so much to his side, that he ran the French knight through with the point of his fatal spear:

The English esquier seeing the infortunate event of this trial to fall to the shame of the challenger, was so far from reioysing at his ouerthrow, that he was touched with christian compassion, & moyned for his enemie, for whome also he kept an obsequie as if he had bene his owne naturall brother, and descended of the same parents. For which mercifull motions of mind inwardlie working, and outwardlie appearing, he was of the king greatlie commended. But doubtfull it is, whether the other, if he had succumbed, and got the vpper hand, would haue had the like reuerend care of the Englishmans dead bodie, as to haue boughsafed it a solemne interment.]

As the affaires in France now were neither well looked to, nor the gouernours there well aduised, an English capteine called sir Francis Surienne, named the Aragonois, of the countrie where he was bozne, a man for his wit and actiuitie admitted into the order of the garter, took by scaling suddenlie in the night of the euen of our ladie daie in Lent, a towne on the frontiers of Normandie, belonging to the duke of Britaine called Fougiers, spoiling the same, and killing the inhabitants. ratne, being hereof aduertised, sent word by the bishop of Meines to the French king, beseeching him of his aid and counsell in the matter.

The French king forthwith sent his caruer John HUART, and John Cosinct one of the maisters of his requests to the king of England: and to the duke of Summerset he dispatched Peter de Fontaines the maister of his house. To which messengers answer was made aswell by the king as the duke, that the fact was done without their knowledge. And for the truce to be kept, and not onelie restitution, but also amends to be made to the duke of Britaine, a daie of diet was appointed to be kept at Louiers, where the commissioners on both parts being assembled, the Frenchmen demanded amends, with no small recompense. The Englishmen answered, that without offense, nothing by iustice ought to be satisfied; affirming the doing of sir Francis Surinnes to be onelie his act, without consent either of the king of England, or of the duke of Summerset his lieutenant and regent.

guile.

But whiles with long delaie they talked of this matter at Louiers, certeine Frenchmen by aduertisement of a wagoner of Louiers, understanding that the towne of Pont de Larch was but slenderlie manned; the wagoner laded his wagon and passed forward, hauing in his companie two strong varlets clad like carpentars, with great ares on their shoulders. And hereto is seigneur de Bresse with a chosen companie of men of armes, lodged himselfe in ambushment nere to the gate of St. Andreu, and capteine Floquet, accompanied with sir James de Cleremont, and another great companie prailie lurked vnder a wood toward Louiers. When all things were appointed for the purpose, earlie in a morning about the beginning of October, the wagoner came to the gate, and called the porter by name, praiesing him to open the gate, that he might passe to Rone, and returne againe the same night.

The porter (which well knew the voice of his customer) took little heed to the other two companions, and so opened the one gate, and sent another fellow of his to open the foremost gate. When the chariot was on the draw-bridge betwene both the gates, the chariot-maister gaue the porter monie, and for the nonce let one pece fall on the ground: and while the porter stooped to take it vp, the wagoner with his dagger strooke him in at his throat, so that he cried for no helpe, and the two great lubbers slue the other porters, and with their ares cut the axeltre of the wagon, so that the draw-bridge could not be shottlie drawen vp. This done they made a signe to capteine Floquet, which with all speed entered the towne, slue and took all the Englishmen: and amongst other, the lord Fauconbridge capteine of the said towne was taken prisoner. The losse of this place was of no small importance, being the verie keie and passage ouer the riuer of Seine, from France into Normandie, being distant from Rone onelie foure leagues.

When request was made to haue it restored againe to the Englishmen, answer was made, that if they restored, to the duke of Britaine, the towne of Fougieres with conbigne amends for the damages done there, the towne of Pont Larch should then be againe deliuered, or else not. And thortlie after, in hope of like successe the French king assembled an armie, and diuiding the same in three parts, got by surrender (after sundrie assaults, and losse of diuerse of his men) the townes of Louiers, & Gerbois, whereof William Harper was capteine. Also the towne, castell, and great tower of Verneuill in Perche were rendered into the French kings hands, after twentie daies of respit granted, to see if rescues would haue come. The French writers affirme the towne to be taken by assault.

Thus was the warre renewed befoze the terme of truce fullie expired, & the English captiues brought to their wits end, what with appealing daile rumors within the townes; and what with studie how to recouer castles lost and taken: for while they studied how to keepe and defend one place, foure or five other turned to the French part. The chiefe cause of which reuolting was, for that it was blowen abroad thorough France, how the realme of England, after the death of the duke of Glocester by the seuerall factions of princes was diuided in two parts; and that William de la Pole latelie created duke of Suffolke, and diuerse other, which were the occasion of the said duke of Glocesters death, bered and oppressed the poore people, so that mens minds were not intentiue to outward affaires: but all their studie giuen to keepe off wrongs offered at home.

The king little regarding the matter, & the queene led by euill counsell, rather furthered such mischiefes as daile began to grow by ciuill discord, than sought to reforme them: so that the Normans and Gascoignes understanding in what state things stood here, turned to the French part, as hereafter it may appeare. About the same time also, began a new rebellion in Ireland; but Richard duke of Yorke being sent thither to appease the same, so asswaged the furie of the wild and sauage people there, that he wan him such fauour amongst them, as could neuer be separated from him and his linage, which in the sequelle of this historie may more plainelie appeare.

The Frenchmen, hauing perfect understanding of the vncertainesse of the realme of England, displayed their banners, and set forth their armies, and in short space got by yielding Constance, Cisors, castell Galliard, Montean de Pere, saint Lo, Feslampe, Newcastle, Tonque, Mauleon, Argenton, Lisseur, and diuerse other townes and places within the countrie of Normandie. Likewise in Guien was the towne of Haulisson rendered to the earle of Foix. These townes were not yielded voluntarielie by the English souldiers: but they were compelled thereto by the inhabitants of the townes, which hauing intelligence of the feeble estate of the realme of England, rose against the captiues, opened the gates to the enemies, or constrained them to render vpon composition. By which inforcement was the rich citie of Rone deliuered: for suerlie the duke of Summerset and the earle of Shrewsburie had well kept that citie, if they had bene no more bered with the citizens, than they were with their enemies.

For after that the French king had giuen summons to the citie, the inhabitants straightwaies did not onelie deulfe which waie they might betraie the citie, but also put on armour, and rebelled openlie against their captiues: who perceiving the vnruth of them, and their owne danger, retired into the castell or palace, where (for a certeine space) with arrowes & handguns they sore molested the vntrue citizens. But at length, understanding the great puissance of the French king at hand, and despairing of all aid and succour, they yielded vpon condition; that with all their goods and armour they should safelie depart to Caen, and that certeine townes should be deliuered by a day. And till the same townes were rendered, the earle of Shrewsburie and the lord Butler, sonne to the earle of Dymond, were left behind as pledges, which were sent to the castell of Cursur, because they sore feared the malice of the citizens of Rone.

The Frenchmen, following the successe in hand, came to Harfue, and fiercelie assaulted the walles: but by the high prowesse and vndanted beliancie of the capteine, sir Thomas Curson, they were to their great losse manfullie by him repelled, and beaten. The Frenchmen learning this by this great perill, left their scaling, and deuised daile how to batter the walles, & make the breaches reasonable for them to enter. This siege long continued to the great losse of both parties. When sir Thomas Curson saw no likelihood of gaine, but great apperance of present losse, he fell at composition with the enimies, and so departed with all his goods. After which towne rendered, the fustresse of Hunsue was vpon like composition yielded. And beside these townes surrendered in Normandie, the duke of Britaine recovered a game Fougiers, saint James de Beuron, and diuerse other.

In the meane season the king of England sent into Normandie (with a new supplie of a thousand five hundred men) a right valiant capteine called sir Thomas Kiriell, who ioining himselfe with other English capteins recovered the townes of Lisieure and Talongnes, and hauing with him powder sufficient (as he toke it) to keepe the fields, he departed the twelue of Aprill from Talongnes, meaning to passe towards Baieur, and after to Caen. But the eighteenth daie of the same moneth, he was incountered at a place called Formignie betwixt Carenten and Baieur, by the earle of Cleremont, & other French men with Scots. At the first onset, the Englishmen receiued their enimies with such manhood, that the Frenchmen were driuen backe, and the Englishmen toke from them two culuerings.

But yet in the end, by the coming of the constable of France, Arthur de Britaine earle of Richmond, who brought with him two hundred or twelue score men of armes, and an eight hundred archers or demilances, the Englishmen were discomfited, put to flight, and slaine, to the number of three thousand, seauen hundred, three score and thirtene, as Enguerant noteth, beside prisoners, of whome there were diuerse personages of account, as the said sir Thomas Kiriell himselfe, sir Henrie Robertie, sir Thomas Dyeu, sir Thomas Kirklie, Christopher Auberton, Arpell, Helice, Alengour, Zennequin, Clacquier, Gobart, Caleuille, and sundrie other. Sir Robert Aier, and sir Matthew Cough that valiant Welshman, and manie other escaped so well as they might, some to Baieur, some to Caen, and other to other places as best they could.

After this overthrow obtained, the French king assembled an armie roiall, and coming before Caen, besieged it on all sides: and after making his approaches, fiercelie assailed the walles. But the duke of Summerfet, and the other capteins within the towne, manfullie withstood their enimies, shewing both force and great policie in defending and beating backe the assailants. The French king, perceiving he could not preuaile that waie, sent for all his great ordinance to Paris, which being brought, he daile shot at the wals, and did some hurt: but to the castell which stood on a rocke, and in it a dungeon vnable to be beaten downe, he did no harme at all.

Though the duke of Summerfet was the kings lieutenant, yet sir Dauid Hall, as capteine of this towne for his maister the duke of Booke owner thereof, toke vpon him the chiefe charge. Sir Robert Aier was capteine of the castell, and sir Henrie Kadford capteine of the dungeon. Daile the shot was great, but moze terrible than hurtfull: fauing on a daie a stone shot into the towne, fell betwene the orichesse of Summerfet, and his children, which being amazed with this chance, besought his husband kneeling on his knees, to haue mercie and compassion of his small infants, and that they might be deliuered out of the towne in safegard. Which intretie made with teares and submission, that eare could but listen to, what heart but yerne at; vnlesse both eare and heart were made of flint or marble, or heluen out of a hard rocke, and so void of all passions, of all remorses, of all affections belonging to humanitie?

The duke pitifull, moued with the sorrow of his wife, and loue of his children, rendered the towne against the mind of sir Dauid Hall, whose counsell and faithfull diligence (in acquitting himselfe to answer the trust committed to him by his maister) if others had followed; the French had sustained more trauell and losse, yet they should haue so easilie attained their purpose. The conditions of the surrender were, that the duke of Summerfet and his might depart in safegard with all their gods and substance. Sir Dauid Hall with diuerse of his trustie friends departed to Chierburgh, and from thence sailed into Ireland to the duke of Booke, making relation to him of all these doings, which thing kindled so great a ranco in the dukes heart and stomach, that he neuer left persecuting the duke of Summerfet, vntill he had brought him to his fatall end & confusion. Such is the nature of ranco and malice, of wrath and anger, which furthereth the hands even of weaklings, on them to weake their teene, with whome they are offended & pricked to reuengment, as the poet saith:

After the obtaining of Caen, the earle of Cleremont besieged the citie of Lisieure, whereof was capteine Matthew Cough with three hundred Englishmen, who in the end deliuered that towne, vpon condition, that he and his people might depart to Chierburgh. Then was Jalais besieged, whereof were capteins for the earle of Shrewsburie (that was the owner) Andrew Trollop, and Thomas Cotton esquires, who being in despaire of all succors, agreed to deliuer it vpon two conditions. The one was, that the earle their maister, which remained in pledge for the performance of certeine appointments, concluded at the deliuerie of Rone (as ye haue hard) should be set at libertie. The other, that if they were not rescued within twelue daies, that then they and theirs should depart with armes, and all their gods moveable, whither it pleased them.

At the daie appointed, the towne was rendered, and so likewise was the towne of Dampfont vpon the semblable agreement. Now rested onlie English the towne of Chierburgh, whereof was capteine one Thomas Conuillie, which suerlie as long as victuels and munition serued, defended the towne right manfullie: but without hope of repaire, consumed, and he els destitute of all comfort and aid, vpon a reasonable composition, yielded the towne, and went to Calis, where the duke of Summerfet and manie other Englishmen then sojourned. Thus was Normandie lost clerelie out of the Englishmens hands, after it had continued in their possession the space of thirtie yeares by the conquest of Henrie the first.

In this duchie were an hundred strong townes and fortresses, able to be kept and holden, beside them which were destroyed by the warres; and in the same is one archbishopricke, and six bishoprics. Some saie that the Englishmen were not of puissance either to man the townes, as they should haue bene; or to inhabit the countrie, which was the cause they could not keepe it. Other saie, that the duke of Summerfet for his owne peculiar lucre, kept not halfe the number of souldiours for which he was appointed and allowed, but put the wages in his purse. But the chiefe and onlie cause vndoubtedlie, was the diuision within the realme, euerie great man desiring rather to be reuenged on his foe at home, than on the common enimie abroad, as by that which followeth you may plainelie perceiue.

manie, the cruell enemies among manie (as by ciuill warre and sedition insuing appeared) soe viced the bitter ruine of this reame at home. One was presumption in gouernance, by some that were most vnmeet to rule, as the queene with hir priuie counsellors and minions; then the deadiie malice and pride, with insatiable couetise in the states both spirituall and temporall; and lastlie the generall grudge of the people, for the vniuersall smart that through misgouernment euerie where they suffered; who thus forueried with the peise of burthens too heauie for them anie longer to beare.]

Wherewith perceiving how (through want of prudent wisdom in the gouernour) all things went to wracke, as well within the realme as without; they began to make exclamation against the duke of Suffolke, charging him to be the onelie cause of the deliuerie of Anion, and of Spaine, the chiefe procuror of the duke of Glocesters death, the verie occasion of the losse of Normandie, the swallower vp of the kings treasure, the remouer of god and vertuous counsellours from about the prince, and the aduancer of vicious persons, and of such as by their doings shewed themselves apparant aduersaries to the common-wealth.

The queene hereat doubting not onelie the dukes destruction, but also hir owne confusion, caused the parliament before begun at the Blackfriars, to be adourned to Leicester, thinking there, by force and rigour of law, to suppress and subdue all the malice and euill will conceiued against the duke & hir. At which place few of the nobilitie would appeare: wherefore it was againe adourned to Westminster, where there was a full appearance. In the which session the commons of the nether house put vp to the king and the lords manie articles of treason, misprision, and euill demeanour, against the duke of Suffolke: the effect whereof with his answers here insucth.

Articles proponed by the commons against the duke of Suffolke.

First they alleged that he had traitorously excited, prouoked, and counselled John earle of Dunois, Bertram lord Presignie, William Casinet, enemies to the king, and friends and ambassadours to Charles, calling himselfe French king, to enter into this realme; and to leaue warre against the king and his people, to the intent to destroye the king and his friends, and to make John his sonne king of this realme, marieng him to Margaret, sole heire to John duke of Summerset, pretending and declaring hir to be next heire inheritable to the crowne, for lacke of issue, of the kings bodie lawfullie begotten.

Item, the said duke, being of the kings priuie and nere counsell, allured by great rewards and faire promises, made by the said earle of Dunois, caused the king to deliuer and set at libertie, Charles duke of Orleans, enemy to the king, and the kings noble father: which deliuerance was prohibited by expresse words, in the last will of the kings most victorious father.

Item, that before the departing of the said duke of Orleans, the aforesaid duke of Suffolke traitorously said cleauing to Charles called the French king, counselled, prouoked, and intised the said duke of Orleans, to moue the same king to make warre against England, both in France and Normandie. According to which procurement & counsell, the said French king hath recouered the whole realme of France, and all the duchie of Normandie, and taken prisoners the earle of Arquesburie, the lord Fauconbridge, and manie other valiant captiues. These three articles aforesaid he denied, either for fact or thought.]

Further it was alleged, that he being ambassadour for the king of England, to Charles calling himselfe the French king, promised to Reiner king of Sicill, and to Charles d'Angiers his brother, enemies to the king, the release of Anion, with the deliuerance of the countie of Spaine, and the citie of Gaunt or Gans, without the knowledge of the other ambassadours with him accompanied. Which promise, after his returne, he caused to be performed, to the kings disinheretance and losse irrecoverable, and to the strength of his enemies, and sablishment of the duchie of Normandie. To this article he answered, that his commission was to conclude, and doe all things according to his discretion, for the obtaining of a peace: & because without deliuerie of those countries, he perceived that the truce could not be obtained, he agreed to the release and deliuerance of them.]

Also they had great cause to iudge by the sequel, that the said duke being in France in the kings seruice, and one of the priuiest of his counsell there, traitorously declared and opened to the captiues and conductors of warre, appertaining to the kings enemies, the kings counsell, purruance of his armies, furniture of his townes, & all other ordinances, whereby the kings enemies (instructed aforesaid by his traitorous information) haue gotten townes and fortresses, and the king by that meanes depriued of his inheritance.

Item, the said duke declared to the earle of Dunois, to the lord Presignie, and William Cornet ambassadours for the French king lieng in London, the priuities of the kings counsell, both for the prouision of further warre, and also for the defense of the duchie of Normandie: by the disclosing whereof, the Frenchmen knowing the king secrets, defeated the kings appointments, and they obtained their purpose.

Item, that the said duke, at such time as the king sent ambassadours to the French king, for the intreating of peace, traitorously before their coming to the French court, certified king Charles of their commission, authoritie, and instructions: by reason whereof, neither peace nor amitie succeeded, and the kings inheritance lost, and by his enemies possessed.

Item, the same duke said openly in the Star-chamber before the lords of the counsell, that he had as high a place in the counsell-house of the French king, as he had there: and was as well trusted there as here, and could remove from the French king the priuiest man of his counsell, if he would.

Item, when armies haue bene prepared, and souldiers readie waied to passe over the sea, to deale with the kings enemies: the said duke, corrupted by rewards of the French king, hath restrained & staied the said armies to passe anie further.

Item, the said duke being ambassadour for the king, compassed not in the league (as the kings allies) neither the king of Aragon, neither the duke of Britaine: but suffered them to be compassed on the contrarie part. By reason whereof, the old amitie of the k. of Aragon is estranged from this realme, and the duke of Britaine became enemy to the same: Giles his brother, the kings sure friend, cast in strong prison, and there like to end his daies.]

All these objections he utterly denied, or faintlie auoided: but none fullie excused. Diuerse other crimes were laid to his charge, as enriching himselfe with the kings goods and lands, gathering together and making a monopolie of offices, fees, wards, and farmes, by reason whereof, the kings estate was greatlie diminished and decayed, and he and his kin highlie exalted & enriched: with manie other points, which because they be not notable nor of great force or strength, I omit and overpasse.

The duke of Suffolke committed to the Tower.

Blowbeard
capitaine of the rebels.

The quene, which intierlie loued the duke, doubting some commotion and trouble to arise, if he were let go unpunished, caused him for a colour to be committed to the Tower: where he remained not past a moneth, but was againe deliuered and restored to the kings fauour, as much as euer he was before. This doing so much displeased the people, that if politike prouision had not bene, great mischefe had immediatlie ensued. For the commons in sundrie places of the realme assembled together in great companies, and chose to them a capteine, whome they called Blowbeard: but per they had attempted anie enterprise, their leaders were apprehended; & so the matter pacified without anie hurt committed.

After this outrage thus asswaged, the parlement was adiourned to Leicester, whither came the king and quene in great estate, and with them the duke of Suffolke as chiefe counsellour. The commons of the lower house, not forgetting their old grudge, besought the king, that such persons as assented to the release of Anion, and deliuerance of Haine, might be duly punished. And to be priuie to that fact, they accused as principall, the duke of Suffolke, with John bishop of Salisbury, and sir James Fines, lord Sate, and diuerse others. When the king perceived that there was no remedie to appease the peoples furie by anie colourable waies, shortlie to pacifie so long an hatred, he first sequestred the lord Sate being treasurer of England, and other the dukes adherents from their offices and homes, and after banished the duke of Suffolke, as the abhorred rodd and common noiance of the whole realme, for tearme of five yeares, meaning by this exile to appease the malice of the people for the time, and after (when the matter should be forgotten) to reuoke him home againe.

The suspected death of the duke of Suffolke.

But Gods iustice would not that so ingratiuous a person should so escape: for when he shipped in Suffolke, intending to transport himselfe over into France, he was encountered with a ship of warre, appertaining to the duke of Gloucester, constable of the Tower of London, called the Nicholas of the Tower. The capteine of that barke with small fight entered into the dukes ship, and perceiving his person present, brought him to Dover road, and there on the one side of a cocke bote caused his head to be stricken off, and left his bodie with the head lying there on the sands. Which corpes being there found by a chapleine of his, was conueied to Wilingfield college in Suffolke, and there buried. This end had William de la Pole duke of Suffolke, as men iudge by Gods prouidence; for that he had procured the death of that good duke of Gloucester, as before is partly touched.

Cocke Cades rebellion in Kent.

Some after an other disquiet befell here. Those that fauoured the duke of Yorke, and wished the crowne vpon his head, for that (as they iudged) he had more right thereto than he that ware it, procured a commotion in Kent on this manner. A certeine yong man of a goodlie stature and right pregnant of wit, was intitled to take vpon him the name of John Mortimer cosine to the duke of Yorke (although his name was John Cade, or (of some) John Perd-all) [an Irishman as Polychronicon saith] and not for a small policie, thinking by that surname, that those which fauoured the house of the earle of March would be assisstant to him. And so in deed it came to passe (as in such cases there is no breeder of a boile but he shall find adherents enow, no lesse forward to further his pernicious enterprise by their solehardines, than himselfe was in the plot of his deuisse) though in fine (as it is the vnluckie lot of such tumults) their attempts were withstood, and their offense duly rewarded, as in processe of the storie shall more at large appeare; according to the wisemens sentence:

This capteine assembling a great companie of tall personages, assured them, that the enterprise which he toke in hand, was both honourable to God and the king, and profitable to the whole realme. For if either by force or policie they might get the king and quene into their hands, he would cause them to be honourable vfed, and take such order for the punishing and reforming of the midemeanours of their bad counsellours, that neither officers should hereafter be demanded, nor once anie impositions or taxes be spoken of. The kindly people moued at these perswasions & other faire promises of reformation, in good order of battell (though not in great number) came with their capteine vnto the plaine of Blackheath, betwene Eltham and Greenwich, and there kept the field more than a month, pilling the countrie about; to whome the citie of London at that time was verie fauourable. And the said capteine (as I find recorded saith John Stow) sent for such citizens of London as it pleased him to command to repaire vnto him, vnder letters of safe conduct, as followeth.

Ab. Fl. c.
L. S. 63.

The safegard and signe manuell of the capteine of Kent, sent to Thomas Cocke draper of London, by the capteine of the great assemble in Kent.

By this our writing insealed, we grant & will permit trulle, that Thomas Cocke of London draper, shall come in good suertie and in safegard to our presence, without anie hurt of his person; and so auoid from vs againe at his pleasure, with all other persons assigned at his denomination with him comming in likewise.

The commandement by the capteine of Kent, sent vnto Thomas Cocke aboue said.

For your instruction, first ye shall charge all Lumbards and strangers, being merchants, Genowais, Venetians, Florentines, and others, this daie to draw them together; and to ordeine for vs the capteine, twelue harnesses complet of the best fashion, foure & twentie brigandins, twelue battell axes, twelue glaues, six hoesles with saddle and bridle completlie harnesses, and a thousand markes of readie monie. And if this our demand be not obserued & done, we shall haue the heads of as manie as we can get of them.

And to the intent the cause of this glorious capteins comming thither, might be shadowed vnder a cloke of god meaning (though his intent nothing so) he sent vnto the king an humble supplication, assuring that his comming was not against his grace, but but against such of his counsellours, as were louers of themselves, and oppressors of the poore commonalrie; flatterers of the king, and crinicks to his honor; suckers of his purse, and robbers of his subiects; partiall to their friends, and extreame to their enemies: thorough bydes corrupted, and for indifferencie doing nothing. ¶ Here, because a full report of this infurcation maie passe to the knowledge of the readers; it is necessarie to set downe the articles of the commons complaints touching the premises, 10 whereof a copie was sent to the parlement then holden at Westminster, with their bill of requests concerning abuses to be reformed.

The complaint of the commons of Kent, and causes of their assemblie on the Blackheath.

Inprimis, it is openlie nossed that Kent 20 should be destroyed with a roiall power, made a wild forrest, for the death of the duke of Suffolke, of which the commons in Kent were neuer gilty.

Item, the king is stirred to lue onelie on his commons, and other men to haue the reuenues of the crowne, the which hath caused pouertie in his ex-cellencie, and great painments of the people, now late to the king granted in his parlement.

Item, that the lords of his roiall blood bene 30 put from his daile presence, and other meane persons of lower nature exalted and made chiefe of his privie counsell, the which stoppeth matters of wrongs done in the realme from his excellent audience, and maie not be redressed as law will; but if bydes and gifts be messengers to the hands of the said counsell.

Item, the people of this realme be not paid of debts owing for stufte and puruicance taken to the use of the kings household, in vndowing of the said peo- 40 ple, and the poore commons of the realme.

Item, the kings mensall seruants of household, and other persons, aske daile goods and lands, of impeached or indicted of treason, the which the king granted anon, yet they so indangered be consulted.
The which causeth the receivers thereof to forge labours and meanes applied to the death of such people, so approached or indicted, by subtill meanes, for coue-lits of the said grants: and the people so impeached or indicted, though it be vnttrue, maie not be committed to the law for their deliuerance, but held still in prison, to their vttermost vndowing & destruction, for couenents of goods.

Item, though diuerse of the poore people and commons of the realme, haue neuer so great right, truth, and perfect title to their land: yet by vnttrue claime of inuicement made vnto diuerse states, gentles, and the kings mensall seruants in mainte-nances against the right, the true owners dare not hold, claime, nor pursue their right.

Item, it is noised by common voices, that the kings lands in France bene aliened and put awaie from the crowne, and his lords and people there destroyed with vnttrue meanes of treason; of which it is desired, inquiries thorough all the realme to be made how and by whome; & if such traitors maie be found gilty, them to haue execution of law without anie pardon, in example of others.

Item, collectors of the fifteenth penie in Kent be greatlie bered and hurt, in paieng great summes of monie in the exchequer, to sue out a writ called Quorum nomina, for the allowance of the barons of the ports, which now is desired, that hereafter in the lieu of the collectors, the barons aforesaid maie sue it out for their ease at their owne costs.

Item, the shiriffes and vnder-shiriffes let to farme their offices and bailiwicks, taking great suertie therefore, the which causeth extortions done by them and by their bailiffes to the people.

Item, simple and poore people that vse not hunting, be greatlie oppressed by indictments feined & done by the said shiriffes, vnder-shiriffes, bailiffes, and other of their assent, to cause their increase for paieng of their said farme.

Item, they retorne in names of inquests in writing into diuerse courts of the king not summoned nor warned, where through the people daile lese great summes of monie, well nigh to the vttermost of their vndowing: and make leue of amercements called the greene war, moze in summes of monie than can be found due of record in the kings books.

Item, the ministers of the court of Douer in Kent ber and arrest diuerse people thorough all the shire out of Castle ward, passing their bounds and libertie vied of old time, by diuerse subtill and vnttrue meanes and actions falselie feined, taking great fees at their lust in great hurt of the people on all the shire of Kent.

Item, the people of the said shire of Kent, maie not haue their free election in the choosing of knights of the shire: but letters bene sent from di-uerse estates to the great rulers of all the countrie, the which imbrace their tenants and other people by force to chose other persons than the commons will is.

Item, whereas knights of the shire should chose the kings collectors indifferentlie without any byde taking, they haue sent now late to diuerse persons, notificng them to be collectors; whereupon gifts and bydes be taken, & so the collectors office is bought and sold extortionously at the knights lust.

Item, the people be soze bered in costs and labour, called to the sessions of peace in the said shire, appearing from the furthest and vttermost part of the west vnto the east; the which causeth to some men five daies iournie: whereupon they desire the said apperance to be diuided into two parts; the which one part, to appeare in one place; an other part,

The requests by the capteine of the great assemblie in Kent.

Inprimis, desireth the capteine of the commons, the welfare of our soueraigne our king, and all his true lords spirituall and temporall, desiring of our said soueraigne lord, and of all the true lords of his coun-cell, he to take in all his demaines, that he maie reigne like a king roiall, according as he is bozne our true and chistian king annointed: and who so will saie the contrarie, we all will lue and die in the quarrell as his true liege men.

Item, desireth the said capteine, that he will auoid all the false progente and affinitie of the duke of Suff-folke, the which bene openlie knowne, and they to be punished after the custome and law of this land, and to take about his noble person the true lords of his roiall blood of this his realme, that is to saie, the high and mightie prince the duke of Bozke, late exiled from our said soueraigne lords presence (by the motion and stirring of the traitorous and false disposed the duke of Suffolke and his affinitie) and the mightie princes & dukes of Worcester, Buckingham, and Suffolke, and all the earles and barons of this land: and then shall he be the richest king chistian.

Item, desireth the said capteine and commons punishment vnto the false traitors, the which contributed to the death of the duke of Suffolke.

ued and imagined the death of the high, mightfull and excellent prince the duke of Glocester, the which is too much to rehearse; the which duke was proclaimed as traitor. Upon the which quarrell, we purpose all to live and die upon that that it is false.

Item, the duke of Crecester, our holie father the cardinall, the noble prince the duke of Warwicke, and also the realme of France, the duchie of Normandie, Gascoigne, and Giron, Amou, and Spaine, were delivred and lost by the meanes of the said traitors; and our true lords, knights, and esquires, and manie a good peoman lost and sold per they went, the which is great pitie to heare, of the great and greivous losse to our souveraigne lord and his realme.

Item, desireth the said capteine and commons, that all extorsions used daillie among the common people, might be laid downe, that is to saie, the greene war; the which is falselie used, to the perpetuall destruction of the kings true commons of Kent. Also the kings Bench, the which is too greivous to the shire of Kent, without provision of our souveraigne lord and his true counsell. And also in taking of wheat and other graines, beafe, mutton, & all other vittels, the which is importable to the said commons, without the breafe provision of our said souveraigne lord and his true counsell, they maie no longer beare it. And also unto the statute of labourers, and the great extorsioners, the which is to saie the false traitors, Sleg, Cromer, Ale, and Robert C.

These billes when the counsell had well perused, they did not onelie disallow and condemne them and the authors, as proud and presumptuous; but also persuaded the king rather to suppress those rebels by force, than by faire promises. Whereupon the king removed from Westminster unto Chenevich, from whence he would have sent certeine lords with a power to have distressed the Kentishmen, but the men said to their lords they would not fight against them that laboured to amend the common-weale: therefore the lords were bounden to leave their purpose. And because the Kentishmen cried out against the lord Saie the kings chamberline, he was by the king committed to the Tower of London. Then went the king againe to London, & within two daies after went against the Kentishmen with sixtene thousand men well prepared for the war: but the said Kentishmen fled the night before his comming into the wood countrie neere unto Senocke. Whereupon the king returned againe to London.

The queene (that bare rule) being of his retrain advertised, sent sir Humfreie Stafford knight, and William his brother, with manie other gentlemen, to follow the Kentishmen, thinking that they had fled: but they were deceived, for at the first skirmish both the Staffords were slaine, & all their companie discomfited. The kings armie by this time comen to Blackheath, hearing of this discomfiture, began to murmur amongst themselves: some wishing the duke of York at home to aid the capteine his cousin: some industriellie coueting the overthrow of the king and his counsell: other openly crying out on the queene and his complices.

This rumor published abroad, caused the king and certeine of his counsell (for the appeasing thereof) to commit the lord Saie treasurer of England to the Tower of London; and if other (against whome like displeasure was borne) had bene present, they had bene likewise committed. Jacke Cade upon victorie against the Staffords, apparelled himselfe in sir Humfries bugardine set full of guilt nailes, and so in some glorie returned againe toward London; divers idle and vagarant persons out of Suffe, Surrie and other places, still increasing his number.

Thus this glorious capteine, garded with a multitude of rustical people, came againe to the plaine of Blackheath, & there stronglie incamped himselfe: to whome were sent from the king, the archbishop of Canturburie, and Humfreie duke of Buckingham, to common with him of his graces and requests.

These lords found him sober in talke, wise in reasoning, arrogant in hart, and stiffe in opinion; as who that by no means would grant to dissolve his armie, except the king in person would come to him, and assent to the things he would require. The 12. upon the presumptuous answers & requests of this villanous rebell, beginning almost to doubt his owne mentall servants, as his unknownen subjects (which spared not to speake, that the capteins cause was profitable for the common-weale) departed in all hast to the castell of Killingworth in Warwicke shire, leaving onlie behind him the lord Scales to keepe the Tower of London. The Kentish capteine being advertised of the kings absence, came first into Southwarke, and there lodged at the white hart, prohibiting to all his retinue, murder, rape, and robbery; by which colour of well meaning, he the more allured to him the harts of the common people.

After that, he entred into London, cut the ropes of the draw bridge, & strooke his sword on London stone; saying, Now is Mortimer lord of this citie. And after a glosing declaration made to the maior touching the cause of his thither comming, he departed againe into Southwarke, and upon the third daie of Julie he caused sir James Fines, lord Saie, and treasurer of England, to be brought to the Guildhall, and there to be arraigned: who being before the kings iustices put to answer, desired to be tried by his peers, for the longer delaie of his life. The capteine perceiving his dilatorie plea, by force took him from the officers, and brought him to the standard in Cheape, and there (before his confession ended) caused his head to be stricken off, and pitched it upon an high pole, which was openlie borne before him thorough the streets.

And not content herewith, he went to Spileend, and there apprehended sir James Cromer then shiriffe of Kent, and sonne in law to the said lord Saie, causing him likewise (without confession or excuse heard) to be beheaded, and his head to be fired on a pole: and with these two heads this bloudie wretch entred into the citie againe, and as it were in a spite caused them in euerie street to kisse together, to the great detestation of all the beholders. After this succeeded open rapine, and manifest robbery in diuerse houses within the citie, and speciallie in the house of Philip Halpas alderman of London, and diuerse other; ouer and beside ransoming and fining of diuers notable merchants, for the suretie of their lives and goods; as Robert Horne alderman, which paid five hundred marks. He also put to execution in Southwarke diuerse persons, some for breaking his obedience, and other being of his old acquaintance, lest they should betwixt his base linage, disparaging him for his usurped surname of Mortimer.

The maior and other the magistrates of London, perceiving themselves neither to be sure of gods, nor of life well warranted, determined to repell and keepe out of their citie such a mischievous castie and his wicked companie. And to be the better able so to do, they made the lord Scales, and that renowned capteine Mattheu Gough prime both of their intent and enterprise, beseeching them of their helpe and furtherance therein. The lord Scales promised them his aid, with shooting off the artillery in the Tower; and Mattheu Gough was by him appointed to assist the maior and Londoners in all that he might, and to be and other capteins, appointed for defence.

kenne of the cttie, toke vpon them in the night to kepe the brydge, and would not suffer the Kentishmen once to appoach. The rebels, who neuer soundlie slept for feare of sudden assaults, hearing that the brydge was thus kept, ran with great hast to open that passage, where betwene both parties was a fierce and cruell fight.

Matthew Cough, perceluing the rebels to stand to their tackling more manfullie than he thought they would haue done, aduised his companie not to aduance anie further toward Southwarke, till the daie appeared; that they might see where the place of scorpards rested, and so to prouide for the same: but this little auailed. For the rebels with their multitude draue backe the citizens from the skops at the brydge foot to the draw brydge, & began to set fire in diuerse houses. Great ruth it was to behold the miserable state, wherein some desiring to eschew the fire, tied vpon their enemies weapon; women with children in their armes leapt for feare into the riuer, other in a deadlie care how to saue themselves, betwene fire water, and sword, were in their houses choked and smothered. Yet the captaine not sparing, fought on the brydge all the night valiantlie; but in conclusion, the rebels gat the draw brydge, and drowned manie, and slue John Sutton alderman, and Robert Desland, a hardie citizen, with manie other, beside Matthew Cough, a man of great wit and much experience in feats of chualrie, the which in continuall waies had spent his time in seruice of the king and his father.

This sore conflict indured in doubtfull wise on the brydge, till nine of the clocke in the morning: for sometime, the Londoners were beaten backe to saint Magins corner: and suddenlie againe, the rebels were repelled to the skops in Southwarke, so that both parts being farrnt and wearie, agreed to leaue off from fighting till the next daie; vpon condition, that neither Londoners should passe into Southwarke, nor Kentishmen into London. Upon this abstinence, this rakehell captaine for making him more friends, brake by the gaules of the kings Bench and Marshalle, and so were manie mates set at libertie bette met for his matters in hand.

The archbishop of Canturburie being chancelor of England, and as then for his suertie lieng within the Tower, called to him the bishop of Winchester, who for some safegard laie then at Haliwell. These two prelates, seeing the furie of the Kentish people, by their late repulse, to be somewhat asswaged, passed by the riuer of Thames from the Tower into Southwarke, bringing with them vnder the kings great seale, a generall pardon vnto all the offenders, and caused the same to be openlie published. The poore people were so glad of this pardon, and so readie to receiue it, that without bidding farewell to their captaine they withdrew themselves the same night euerie man towards his home.

Proclamation
the king
the rebels

But Iacke Cade despairing of succours, and fearing the reward of his lewd dealings, put all his pilage and goods that he had robbed, into a barge, and sent it to Rochester by water, and himselfe went by land, and would haue entred into the castle of Quinborough with a few men that were left about him; but he was there let of his purpose: wherefore he disguised in strange attire, priuile fled into the wood country beside Leices in Suffre, hoping so to scape. The captaine & his people being thus departed, not long after proclamations were made in diuerse places of Kent, Suffre, and Southerie, that whosoever could take the foresaid captaine alue or dead, should haue a thousand markes for his trauell. A copie of which proclamation, touching the apprehension of the said Cade and his complices, hereafter followeth.

A copie of the said writ and proclamation by the king, for the taking of the said Cade and his fellowship.

Henricus Dei gratia rex Anglie & Francie, & dominus Hibernie, vniuersis singulis custodibus, &c. For so much as one John Cade bozne in Ireland, which calleth himselfe John Portimer, & in some writing calleth himselfe captaine of Kent, the which John Cade the last yeare tofore his dwelling in Suffre with a knight, called sir Thomas Dagre, slue there a woman with child, and for that cause toke the greeth of the church, and after for that cause forswore the kings land: the which John Cade also after this, was sworne to the French part, and dwelled with them; which hath now of late time (to the intent to enrich himselfe by robbing and despoiling of the kings liegemen, as it is now openlie knowne, to bring himselfe to great and high estate) falslie and vntruelie deceiued manie of the kings people, and vnder colour of holie and good intents made them to assemble with him against the kings regalitie & his lawes, a nought setting by the kings grace and pardons, granted nor enelie to him but to all the kings subiects, the which by his deceit haue assembled with him, the which he with great reuerence receiued on mondaie last passed, and so did all that were assembled with him. Notwithstanding all this, he labourerth now of new to assemble the kings people againe, and to that intent beareth them on hand, that the kings letters of pardon granted to him and them, be not auailable, nor of none effect, without authoritie of parlement: whereas the contrarie is true, as it is openlie knowne by that, that the king granteth from time to time his charters of pardon to such as him list, of all manner of crimes and offenses both generall and speciall.

The king therefore willet and commandeth, that none of his subiects giue faith nor credence to the said falsie informations of the said falsie traitor, nor accompanie with him in anie wise, nor comfort nor susteine him nor his with vittels, nor with anie other things: but will, whosoever of the kings subiects may take him, shall take him; and that who so euer taketh him, and bringeth him quicke or dead to the king or to his counsell, shall haue a thousand markes for his labour trulie paid him, without faile or delaie by the prouision of the kings counsell. And who so euer taketh anie of those that from this daie forth accompanie with him, shall haue five markes for his reward, trulie to be paid in maner and forme aboue said. And ouer this, commanding all constables, ministers, and officers of the said shire, that none of them (on paine of death) take vpon them to execute anie commandement by word or writing sent or made vnto them by the said Cade, calling himselfe Portimer and captaine, be it to reare any people, or to any other intent: but to arrest and make so be arrested such, as take vpon them to bring anie such commandement by writing or by word. Et hoc nullatenus omittatis. Teste me ipso apud Westm. 10 die Iulij, anno regni 28.]

After which proclamation thus published, a gentle man of Kent named Alexander Eden awaited so his time, that he toke the said Cade in a garden in Suffre: so that there he was slaine at Hothfield, and brought to London in a cart, where he was quartered; his head set on London brydge, and his quarters sent to diuers places to be set vp in the shire of Kent. After this, the king himselfe came into Kent, and there sat in iudgement vpon the offenders: and if he had not mingled his iustice with mercie; more than five hundred by rigo; of law had bene iustlie put to execution.

execution. Yet he punishing onlie the Subborne heads, & disordered ringleaders, pardoned the ignorant and simple persons, to the great reioysing of all his subjects. ¶ But saith another, the king sent his commissioners into Kent, and caused inquirie to be made of this riot in Canturburie, where for the same eight men were iudged and executed, and in other townes of Kent and Suffe was done the like execution.

This yeare the commons also in diuerse parts of England, as in Suffe, Salisburie, Wiltschire, and other places, did much harme to manie persons, among the which, on the nine and twentieth of June, William Ascoth bishop of Salisburie (after he had said masse at Coington) was by his owne tenants drawne from the altar, in his albe with his stole about his necke to the top of an hill, and there by them shamefullie murdered, and after spoiled to the naked skin: they renting his bloudie shirt, toke euerie man a peece, and made boast of their wickednesse. The daie before, his chariot was robbed, to the value of ten thousand markes. Soldiours made a fraie against the maior of London the same daie he toke his charge at Westminster, at night coming from saint Thomas of Acres, after he had bene at Pauls.]

the maior.

The French king vnderstanding all the ciuill discord and rebellious sturs in England, made therof his foundation, hoping to get into his hands and possession the duchie of Aquitaine: and thereupon sent the earles of Montieure and Perigot to laie siege to the towne of Bergerat, situate vpon the river of Dordou, of which towne was capteine John Gedding, who vpon reasonable conditions rendered the towne. But yet the lord Camois, sir George Seimor, and sir John Arundell, with diuers other vallant captiues, hauing gouernance of the countrie, married townes, gathered people, and recomforted the fainting hartes of the Gascoignes in all that they could, and withall sent letters ouer into England, certifiing to the kings maiestie, that without speedie aid, and readie succours, the whole countrie was like to be conquered and wone out of the Englishmens possession.

Manie letters were sent, and manie faire answers were brought; but relafe neither appeared, nor one man of warre was thither shipped: by reason whereof, the Frenchmen pursuing the victorie, got the fortresses of Janfacke, and S. Foie, with diuerse other peeces of importance thereabouts. Also, about the same time, the lord Dozuall, thirde sonne to the lord de la Beeth, with a great number of men, as well on horsebacke as on foot, departed from Basas, to conquer and despoile the Ile of Medoc. Whereupon the maior of Burdeaur issuing out, and incourting with his enemies, was banquished, losing sir hundred Englishmen and Gascoignes: albeit the Frenchmen gained not this victorie with clare hands, for there were slaine of them to the number of eight hundred persons.

After this, the bastard of Cleance, with his brother John earle of Angolesme, which had bene long prisoner in England, and manie other vallant captiues, besieged the castell of Montgason, which to them was rendered. Afterwards, they besieged the towne of Blaie, standing on the river of Garonne, the which in conclusion by berie force was conquered and wone. The bastard of Kendall, capteine of the castell, seeing the towne lost, vpon certeine reasonable conditions deliuered his fortress to the bastard of Cleance, the French kings lieutenant. After this, the townes of Burgh and Liborne, after fine weekes siege, were likewise yelded to the Frenchmen. Then was the citie of Acques besieged by the erle of Foie, and the viscount de Latouche his brother, and other noble men. So likewise was the strong towne of Kion by the earle of Arminache, extreme enemie to the realme of England, for breach of the mariage concluded betwene king Henrie and his daughter. The earle of Montieure laid siege to Chatillon in Perigot, and the earle of Dunois surrounded with great puissance the towne of Fronfacke.

The Englishmen perceiuing in what state they stood within the towne, couenanted with the said earle, that if the towne were not succoured, and the Frenchmen fought with before the feast of the natiuitie of saint John Baptist next ensuing; that then the towne of Fronfacke should be yelded to them, which was the strongest fortress in all that countrie, and the berie heie of Guien. Whereof were pledges deliuered, and writings made & sealed. Which agreement once blowne through the countrie, the citie of Burdeaur, and all other townes (except Balon) made the like agreement. So did all the noble men and gentlemen which were subjects and vassals to the crowne of England. Euerie daie was looking for aid, but none came.

And whyle: When because the diuelish diuision that reigned in England, so incombred the heads of the noble men there, that the honor of the realme was clerelie forgotten, so that (to conclude) the daie appointed came, but succour looked for came not. By reason whereof, all the townes of Aquitaine (except Balon) deliuered their heies, and became vassals to the French nation; yet the citizens of Burdeaur, in hope of rescue, required a longer daie of battell, which was granted. But at the daie appointed, when no relafe came, they rendered themselves and the citie to their aduersaries, their liues and goods saved, with licence and safe conduct to all persons which would depart and saile into England. Then finally was the citie of Balon besieged, and with mines and batterie constrained to yeld it selfe into the Frenchmens hands.

Beside the agreements taken and made with the townes, diuerse noble men made seuerall compositions, as Gasson de Foie, & Capdau de Buel, whome king Henrie the first made earle of Longueuile, and knight of the garter; whose ancestors were euer true to England. Which agreed, that he and his sonne John de Foie, whome king Henrie the first made earle of Kendale, and also knight of the garter, should enjoy all their lands in Aquitaine, given to them by the kings of England, or by the dukes of Aquitaine. And sir, their intent was still to serue the king of England, they agreed to deliuer into the custodie of the earle of Foie, the sonne and heire of the said earle of Kendale, being of the age of thre yeares; to the intent that if he at his full age denied to become subject to the French king, or before that time deceased; that then (after the death of his father and grandfather) all the said lands should wholly remaine to the next heire of their blood, either male or female, being vnder the obedience of the French king or his heires.

Manie other noble men, whose hearts were good English, made like compositions, and some came into England, and others went to Calis, and bare great offices there: as the lord Duras, which was marshall of that towne; and monsieur Clauclere, which was deputie there vnder the earle of Warwick. Thus were the Englishmen clerelie displaced and lost the possession of all the countreies, townes, castles, and places within the realme of France; so that onlie Calis, Hammes and Guines, with the marches thereof remained in their hands, of all those their dominions and seigniories which they sometime held held in the parties beyond the seas. Whereby England suffered a partile but not a totall eclipse of hir glozie, in continuall losing & nothing gaining of hir enemie. Which recouerie was of great facilitie to the french, for that where they came, they found little or no resistance, but rather a voluntarie submission & yielding as it were with holding vp of hands, per they came to handstrokes. So that in such victories and conquests consisted small renowne, sith without slaughter & bloodshed hardie enterprizes are not at-

An. Reg. 30.
The king returned into England.

[This yere the king made a generall progresse and came to the citie of Excester, on mondaie the sixteenth of Julie at after noone, being the feast daie of saint Isenelme; and was receiued from place to place verie honorable through the whole countrie.
Before he came to this citie, he was met by all the cleargie in their degrees, some three miles, some two miles, and some at the citie, all in their copes, censuring all the waies as they went. As sone as he came to this citie, he was first conducted to the cathedrall church in all most honourable order. When he had done his oblations, he was conueied and lodged in the bishops house. During his abode here, there was a sessions kept before the duke of Summerset, and certeine men condemned to die for treason, and had iudgement to be executed to death.

The bishop & his cleargie against the fi-
and the duke of Summer-set, in defence of their ecclesiasticall privileges.

The bishop and his cleargie vnderstanding hereof, with open mouth complained vnto the king, that he caused a sessions to be kept within his sanctuarie, contrarie to the priuilege of his church: and that all their doings (being done against law) were of no effect. And notwithstanding the king and his counsell had discoursed vnto them the iust and orderlie proceeding, the hainousnesse of the offenders, and the necessitie of their punishment: yet all could not as-uaile, for holie church nor the sanctuarie might be pro-phaned (as they said) with the deciding of temporall matters. Whereupon the king in the end yielding to their exclaimes, released a couple of arrant traitors, and reuerfed all his former lawfull proceedings, and so vpon the wednesdaie he departed and returned to wards London.]

The duke of Bouchemer came to the counse.

The duke of Yorke pretending (as yee haue heard) a right to the crowne, as heire to Lionell duke of Clarence, came this yere out of Ireland vnto London, in the parlement time, there to consult with his speciall friends: as John duke of Northfolke, Richard earle of Salisburie, and the lord Richard his sonne, which after was earle of Marwarke; Thomas Countie earle of Denonshire, & Edward Broke lord Cobham. After long deliberation and aduise taken, it was thought expedient, to keepe their chiefe purpose secret; and that the duke should raise an armie of men, vnder a pretext to remoue diuerse coun-cellors about the king, and to reuenge the manifest injuries done to the common-wealth by the same rulers. Of the which as principall, the duke of Sum-merset was namelie accused, both for that he was greatlie hated of the commons for the losse of Por-mandie: and for that it was well knowne, that he would be altogether against the duke of Yorke in his challenge to be made (when time serued) to the crowne; inasmuch that his goods by the commons were four-tie despoiled and borne awaie from the Blacke friers. After which riot, on the next morrow, proclamation was made through the citie, that no man should spoke or rob, on paine of death. But on the same daie at the standard in Cheape was a man beheaded for doing contrarie to the proclamation.

Therefore, when the duke of Yorke had thus, by aduise of his speciall friends, framed the foundation of his long intended enterprize, he assembled a great hoast, to the number of ten thousand able men, in the marches of Wales; publishing openlie, that the cause of this his gathering of people, was for the publike wealth of the realme. The king much astonished at the matter, by aduise of his counsell raised a great power, and marched forward toward the duke. But he being thereof aduertised, turned out of that way, which by espials he vnderstood that the king held, and made streight toward London: and hauing knowledge that he might not be suffered to passe through the ci-tie, he crossed ouer the Thames at Kingston bridge, and so kept on towards Kent, where he knew that he had both friends & well-willers, and there on Burnt heath, a mile from Dertford, and twelue miles from London, he imbatelled, and incamped himselfe verie stronglie, imbriconing his field with artillerie and trenches. The king hereof aduertised, brought his armie with all diligence vnto Blackheath, and there pight his tents.

Wherhailed.
The duke of Yorke raised a power, for reconcie of his right to the crowne.

Whilist both these armies laie thus imbatelled, the king sent the bishop of Winchester, and Thomas Bourchier, bishop of Ebie, Richard Maudslowe, lord Aiuers, & Richard Andew, the keeper of his priuie seale, to the duke: both to know the cause of so great a commotion, and also to make a concord; if the requests of the duke and his companie seemed consonant to reason. The duke hearing the message of the bishops, answered; that his coming was neither to damme the king in honour, nor in person, neither yet anie god man: but his intent was, to remoue from him certeine euill disposed persons of his coun-cell, bloud-succours of the nobilitie, poliers of the cleargie, and oppressours of the poore people.

The dukes
answer to the kings mesage

Amongst these, he chiefe named Edmund duke of Summerset, whome if the king would commit to ward, to answer such articles as against him in open parlement should be both proponed and proued, he promised not onelie to dissolue his armie; but also offered himselfe (like an obedient subiect) to come to the kings presence, and to do him true and faithfull seruice, according to his loiall and bounden dutie. But a further vnderstanding of the dukes meaning by this his forceable entering of the realme (as himselfe pretended) made appeare by certeine letters by him written to the king, and also the kings answers vnto the same: both which I thinke good here to set downe, as I find them recorded.

Richard duke of Yorke his letter to king Henrie.

Rease it your highnesse to conserue, that since my departing out of this your realme, by your commandement, and being in your seruice in your land of Ireland, I haue bene informed, that diuerse language hath bene said of me to your most excellent estate, which should sound to my dishonour and reproch, and charge of my person: howbeit, that I haue bene, and euer will be, your true liegeman and seruant.
And if there be anie man that will or dare saie the contrarie, or charge me otherwise; I beseech your right wisenesse to call him before your high presence, and I will declare me for my discharge as a true knight ought to do. And if I do not, as I doubt not but I shall, I beseech you to punish me as the worst man of your land. And if he be found vntrue in his suggestion and information, I beseech you of your highnesse

highnesse that he be punished after his desert, in example of all other.

Please it your excellencie to know, that as well before my departing out of this your realme, for to go into your land of Ireland, in your full noble service, as since, certeine persons haue lien in wait for to hearken vpon me, as sir John Talbot knight at the castell of Holt; sir Thomas Standleie knight in Cheshire; Wilford at Chester; Elton at Worcester; Woke at Glocester; and Richard, grome of your chamber at Beaumaris: which had in charge (as I am informed) to take me and put me into your castell of Contwaic, and to strike off the head of sir William Oldhall knight, and to haue put in prison sir William Deuereux knight, & sir Edmund Pallo knight, withouten enlarging, vntill the time that your highnesse had appointed their deliuerance.

Item, at such time as I was purposed for to haue arrived at your haven of Beaumaris, for to haue come to your noble presence to declare me your true man and subiect, as my dutie is, my landing was stopped and forbarded by Henrie Poize, Thomas Poize, William Buckleie, William Crust, and Bartholomew Bould, your officers in Northwales, that I should not land there, nor haue vittels nor refreshing for me & my fellowship, as I haue written to your excellencie here before. So farre forth that Henrie Poize, deputie to the chamberlaine of Northwales, said vnto me, that he had in commandement that I should in no wise haue landing, refreshing, nor lodging, for men nor horse, nor other thing that might turne to my worship or ease: putting the blame vpon William Saie other of your chamber, saying and affirming that I am against your intent, and as a traitor, as I am informed. And moreover, certeine letters were made and deliuered vnto Chester, Shrewsburie, and to other places for to let mine entrie into the same.

Item, aboue all wrongs and iniuries aboue said done vnto me of malice, without anie cause, I being in your land of Ireland, in your honourable service, certeine commissions were made and directed vnto diuerse persons; which for the execution of the same, sat in certeine places, and the iuries impanelled and charged: vnto the which iuries certeine persons laboured instantlie to haue me indicted of treason, to the intent for to haue vndone me and mine issue, and corrupted my blood, as it is openlie published. Beseeching your maiestie rotall, of your righteousnesse, to doe examine these matters, and therevpon to doe such iustice in his behalfe as the cause requireth: for mine intent is fullie to pursue to your highnesse for the conclusion of these matters.

The answer of king Henrie to the duke of Yorke.

Consider, we haue seene the bill that ye wrote vs late, and also vnderstand the godd humble obedience that ye in your selfe shew vnto vs, as well in word as in deed: therefore our intent is, the more humble to ease you of such things as were in your said bill. Howbeit, that at our more leasure we might answer you to your said bill, yet we let you wit, that for the causes aforesaid, we will declare you now our intent in these matters: which is that a long time among the people hath bene vpon you many strange language, and in especiall anon after your disordinate and lawfull saying of the bishop of Chester, diuerse and manie of the vntreue shipmen and other said (in their maner) words against our estate, making manace to our owne person by your sayings, that ye should be fetched with manie thousands, and ye should take vpon you that, which ye neither ought, nor as we doubt not, ye will not attempt: so farre forth that it was said to our person by diuerse, & especiallie we remember of one Malnes, which had like words to vs.

And also there were diuerse of such false people, that went on and had like language in diuerse of our townes of our land, which by our subiects were taken and duly executed. Therefore we sent to diuerse of our courts and places, to hearken and to take heed if anie such maner comming were; and if there had bene, for to resist it: but comming into our land our true subiect as ye did, our intent was not that ye, nor lesse of estate of our subiects, nor none of your seruants should not haue bene letted nor warned, but in goodlie wise receiued: howbeit that peradventure your sudden comming, without certeine warning, caused our seruants to doe as they did, considering the causes aboue said. And as to the indictment that ye spoke of, we thinke verelie, and hold for certeine warning, caused our seruants to doe as they did, considering the causes aboue said. And as to the indictment that ye spoke of, we thinke verelie and hold for certeine, that there was none such. And if ye may trulie proue that anie person was thereabouts, the matter shall be demeaned as the case shall require: so that he shall know it is to our great displeasure. Vpon this, for the easing of your heart in all such matters, we declare, repute, and admit you as our true and faithfull subiect, and as our faithfull cosine.

Richard duke of Yorke to king Henrie againe.

Please it your highnesse tenderlie to consider, that great murmur and grudging is vniuersallie in this your realme, in that iustice is not duly ministred to such as trespass and offend against your lawes, and in especiall of them that be indicted of treason, and other being openlie noised of the same; whereby great inconueniences haue fallen, and great is like to fall hereafter in your said realme, which God defend: but if by your highnesse prouision conuenable be made for due reformation and punishment in this behalfe. Wherefore I your humble subiect and true liegeman, Richard duke of Yorke, willing as effectualle as I can, and desiring the suertie and prosperitie of your most rotall person, and the welfare of this your noble realme, counsell and aduertise your excellencie, for the conseruation of godd tranquillitie and peaceable rule among all other subiects, for to ordeine and provide, that true iustice be had, against all such that so be indicted, or openlie named: wherein I offer my selfe, and will put my indeuour for to execute your commandement in the premisses, for the punishing of such offenders, and redresse of the said misrules, to my might and power. And for the hastie execution hereof, like it your highnesse, to adresse these letters of pious seale and writs to your officers and ministers, to doe, take, and arrest, all such persons so noised and indicted, of what estate, degree, or condition soener they be, and them to commit to the Tower of London, and to other of your prisons, there to abide without baille or maineprie, vntill the time they be better tried, and determined after the course of your lawes.

The answer of king Henrie to the duke of Yorke.

Consider, as touching your bill last put by to vs, we vnderstand well that ye (of godd heart) counsell and aduertise vs to the setting by of iustice, infirce, and to the speedie punishing of some persons inhibited or nolled, offering your seruice to be readie at commandement in the same, sith it is that for manie causes mouing vs to haue determined in our soule, to stablish a sad, and a substantiall counsell, giuing them more ample authoritie and power than euer we did before this, in the which we haue appointed you to be one. But sith it is not accustomed, sure, nor expedient, to take a conclusion & conduct by aduise or counsell of one person by himselfe for the conseruation, it is obserued that the greatest and the best, the rich and the poore, in libertie, vertue, and effect of your voices be equall. We haue therfore determined within our selfe to send for our chancellour of England, and for other lords of our counsell, yea and all other, together within thort time ripelie to common of these and other our great matters. In which communication, such conclusion (by the grace of God) shall be taken, as shall sound to his pleasure, the weale of vs and our land, as well in these matters as in anie other.

After all this adu, it was so agreed vpon by aduise, for the auoiding of bloudshed, and pacifying of the duke and his people, that the duke of Summer- set was committed to ward, as some say, or else com- manded to keepe himselfe priuie in his owne house for a time. But it should seme by that which some haue written, that the duke of Yorke was deceived of the hope which he had, to be aided of the Kentish men; insomuch that when he saw himselfe ouermatched by the king in number of people, who had got to- gether thice as manie men as the duke had there with him, the duke was the more easie to be dealt with. And so comming to the king, and submitting himselfe by mediation of certeine of the nobilitie, he obtained pardon of that his former presumptuous enterprise. And within a few dates after his com- ming to London with the king, he openlie in the church of S. Paule (the king being present) receiued a solemne oth, that from thenceforth, he should no more commit any such offense, nor attempt anie thing, ei- ther against the king, or any other of his liege peo- ple, contrarie to the order of law and iustice.

Howsoeuer the matter went, truth it is, that the duke of Yorke, the first of March, dissolved his ar- mie, brake by his campe, & came to the kings tent, where contrarie to his expectation, & against promise made by the king (as other write) he found the duke of Summerfet going at large and set at libertie, whome the duke of Yorke bolliie accused of treason, byberie, oppression, and manie other crimes. The duke of Summerfet not onelie made answer to the dukes obiections, but also accused him of high trea- son, affirming, that he with his fautors and compli- ces had consulted together, how to come by the sce- per and regall crowne of this realme. By meanes of which words the king remoued streight to London, and the duke of Yorke (as prisoner) rode before him, and so was kept a while.

The king assembled together a great counsell at Westminster, to heare the accusations of the two dukes, the one obiection to the other manie heinous and greuous crimes. But the duke of Summerfet, which now concerned in his mind the thing that shortly followed, incessantlie exhorted the counsell, that the duke of Yorke, by compulsion or otherwise, might be driuen to confesse his offense, that so being attainted of treason, he might suffer execution, and his children to be taken as aduersaries to their na- tive countrie; to the intent that by the extinction of him and his sequale, all ciuill warre and inward di- uision might cease and be repressed: beseeching al- mighty God, that so great an enimie to the king and his bloud, might neuer escape punishment, nor con- tinue long in life.

The duke of Summerfet set forth this matter the more vehementlie, because he knew perfectly, that the duke of Yorke dallie imagined with him- selfe, how to get the crowne, and to depose and de- stroie both the king and him. But destiny cannot by anie mans deuill be letted, and manie things (to apperance) declared the duke of Yorkes innocencie in this case. First, his free and voluntarie comming to the king, without constraint, when he was partlie of puissance able to haue incountred with the kings whole power. Secondlie, his humble submission, and reasonable requests, as well on his owne behalfe, as for the poore commons: which might argue that he fought for no soueraintie.

Whilest the counsell treated of sauing or disap- ching of this duke of Yorke, a rumoz spzang through London, that Edward earle of March, sonne and heire apparant to the said duke, with a great armie of Marchmen, was comming toward London: which tidings soze appalled the quene and the whole coun- cell. Beside this, the verie same daie came ambassa- dours from the cheefe citizens and magistrats of the citie of Burdeaur; whereof the cheefe were, the earle of Kendale, and the lord de Lesparre; which signified to the counsell, that if they would send an armie in- to Gascoigne, the people of the countrie would re- uolt from the French part, and euidences become English. These two things soze troubled the heads of the counsell, which, least inward sedition might hin- der outward conquests, set the duke of Yorke at li- bertie, and permitted him to go to his castell of Wlig- more, in the marches of Wales, by whose absence the duke of Summerfet rose in such high fauour, both with the king and quene, that his word onelie ruled, and his voice alone was heard.

¶ Nevertheless the said duke of Yorke had first made his submission, and toke his oth to be true, faithfull, and obedient subiect to king Henrie the first king of England, in saint Pauls church at London, there being present the king, and most of his nobili- tie, that is to saie, the dukes of Buckingham, Por- thampton, and Summerfet: the earls of Warwicke, Arundell, Salisburie, Shrophire, Deuonshire, Wilshire, Northumberland, Stafford and Dorset, vicounts of Beaumont and Welles: barons, Fitz Warren, Sainmound, Cobham, Dowglas, and o- thers: bishops, the cardinall, archbishop of Yorke and Canturburie, Winchester, Ebie, and London, in these words following.

Richard duke of Yorke confesse and beknow, that I am & ought to be humble subiect and liege- man to you my soueraine lord king Henrie the first, and owe therefore to beare you faith and truth, as to my soue- reigne liege lord, and shall doe all daies vn- to my liues end; and shall not at anie time will or assent, that any thing attempted or done against your most noble person: but where so euer I shall haue knowledge of anie such thing imagined or purposed, I shall with all speed and diligence possible to me, make that your highnesse shall haue knowledge thereof: and ouer that, to all that shall be possible to me, to the withstan- ding and let thereof, to the vttermost of my my life. I shall not anie thing take vpon me against your roiall estate or obeisance that is due thereto, nor suffer anie other man to doo, as farre forth as it shall be in my power to let it: and also shall come at your commandement when so euer I shall be called by the same, in humble and obeisant wise: but if I be letted by anie sickness or impotence of my person, or by such other cause as shall be thought by you my souereigne lord reasonable. I shall neuer hereafter take vpon me to gather anie rout, nor to make anie assemble of your people, without your commandement or licence, or in my lawfull defense. In interpretation or declaration of the which my lawfull defense, I shall report me at all times to your highnesse, and if the case require, to my peres; nor any thing attempt against anie of your subiects, of what estate, degree, or condition that they be. But when so euer I find my selfe wronged and agreued, I shall sue humble for remedie to your highnesse: and proceed after the course of your lawes, and in none other wise: sauing in mine owne lawfull defense in maner aboue said, and otherwise haue to your highnesse as an humble and true subiect ought to haue him to his souereigne lord.

All these things aboue said I promise you trulie to obserue and keepe, by the holie euangelists contained in the booke that I laie my hand herevpon, and by the holie crosse I here touch, and by the blessed sacrament of our Lords bodie, that I shall now with his mercie receiue. And ouer I agree me and will, that if anie time hereafter, as by the grace of our Lord God I neuer shall, anie thing attempt by waie of feat or otherwise against your roiall maiestie, and obeisance that I owe thereto, or anie thing take vpon me otherwise than is aboue expessed, I from that time forth be vnabled, held, and taken as an vntrue and openlie forsworne man, and vnable to all maner of worship, estate, and degree, be it such as I now occupie, or anie other that might in anie wise grow vnto me hereafter. And this I haue here promised and sworn, proceedeth of mine owne desire and free voluntie, and by no constraining or coaction. In witnesse of all the which things aboue written, I Richard duke of Yorke (aboue named) subscribe with mine owne hand and seale.

The counsell not forgetting the offer of the Calcoignes, and that they might now haue the citie of Burdeaur, with the countie round about, by request of the inhabitants, appointed the valiant capteine John lord Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, to go thither with an armie, who arriving in the Ile of Gadoe, passed forth with his power, being scant thre thousand men, and took the strong towne of Fromsacke, and diuerse other townes & fortresses. The inhabitants of Burdeaur, hearing of the earles arrival, sent to him messengers in the darke night, requiring him with all speed to come and receiue the citie. The earle lost not one houre, but hastened forth, & came before that citie, yet the Frenchmen within understood anie thing of the citizens purpose. When they were aduertised that there was a gate set open for the Englishmen to enter, they thought to haue escaped secretlie by a posterne: but they were pursued, slaine, and taken by the lord de Lespar, and other of the English armie.

After the regaining of Burdeaur, there arrived at Blaie the bastard of Sumnerlet, sir John Talbot, lord Lisle by his wife, sonne to the said erle of Shrewesburie, the lord Polins, the lord Harington, the lord Camois, sir John Howard, sir John Spontgornie, sir John Wernon, with two & twentie hundred men, with vittels and munitions. When the earle was thus (according to his intent) of all things furnished, first he fortified Burdeaur with Englishmen, and store of vittels; and after that he rode into the countie abroad, where he obtained cities, and got townes without stroke or dint of sword, for the people already wearied of the French seruitude, and longing sore to returne to the English libertie, seemed to desire nothing more than to haue the earle to receive them into the English obedience. Amongst other townes, the towne and castell of Chastillon in Perigord was to him deliuered, the which he fortified with men and ordinance verie stronglie.

In the meane time, the French king, being aduertised of all these doings, raised an armie to resist this inuasion made by the erle of Shrewesburie. And first he appointed his capteins to besiege the towne of Chastillon, to the rescue whereof the earle hastened forward, hauing in his compaignie eight hundred horsemen, vnder the leading of his sonne the lord Lisle, the lord Polins, the lord Camois, sir Edward Hull, sir John Howard, and sir John Wernon. He appointed also five thousand footmen, vnder the conduct of the earle of Kendall, and the lord de Lespar, to follow him with all speed. In his waie, he took by fine force a tower which the Frenchmen had taken, and slew all that he found within it. And after by the waie, he met five hundred Frenchmen going a foraging, of whom he slew the more part, and chased the other to the campe.

The Frenchmen that laie at the siege, perceiving by those good runners away that the earle approached, left the siege, and retired in good order into the place which they had trenched, ditched, and fortified with ordinance. The earle aduertised how the siege was removed, hastened forward towards his enemies, doubting most, least they would haue bene quite fled and gone before his coming. But they fearing the displeasure of the French king (who was not far off) if they should haue fled, abode the earles coming, and so receiued him: who though he first with manfull courage, and sore fighting wan the entrie of their campe; yet at length they compassed him about, and shooting him through the thigh with an handgun, slew his horse, and finally killed him lieng on the ground, whom they durst neuer looke in the face, while he stood on his feet.

It was said, that after he perceived there was no remedie, but present losse of the battell, he counselled his sonne the lord Lisle, to saue himselfe by flight, with the same could not rebound to anie great reproch in him, this being the first iournie in which he had bene present. Many words he vsed to persuade him to haue saued his life: but nature so wrought in the son, that neither desire of life, nor feare of death, could either cause him to shrink, or conueie himselfe out of the danger, and so there manfullie ended his life with his said father. There died also the earles bastard sonne Henrie Talbot, and sir Edward Hull elect to the order of the garter, and thirtie other men of name and right valiant personages of the English nation.

The French people were wearied of the French government.

The belient earle of Shrewesburie and his son were killed.

The lord Apollins was taken prisoner with thre score others. The residue of the English people fled to Burdeaur and other places, of whom in the flight were slaine above a thousand persons.

Thus at this battell of Chatillon, fought the thirtieth daie of Julie in this yeare, ended his life John lord Talbot, and of his progenie the first earle of Shrewesburie: after that he with much fame and most victorie, had valiantlie made warre, and serued his prince and countrie by the space of foure and twentie yeares, in the parties of beyond the seas, whose corps was left on ground, and after was found by his friends, and conuied to Whitchurch in Shropshire where it was interred. After this discomfiture diuerse lords fled to Buthenay, but the earle of Carvall, the lords of Montferrant, of Rosaine, & of Dangladas entered into the castell of Chatillon, which by the space of ten daies they defended: but in the end despairing of all succours, they rendred the fortesse, and came safe to Burdeaur.

After this, the towncs of saint Million, Liborne, and all other, which the erle of Shrewesburie had conquered, rendred themselves to the Frenchmen, Burdeaur onelie excepted. Which citie, being the last refuge of the English people, the French king in person besieged with all his puissance; and in conclusion constrained both the garrisons and inhabitants to yield, so that the Englishmen & Gascoignes might safely depart into England or into Calis, with all their substance; and that the lords de Lesparre, Durais, and thirte others, should neuer (upon paine of death) be found within ante of the French kings dominions, which lord de Lesparre being after taken in Gascoigne disguised, was made shorter by the head. When this composition was agreed and sealed, the Englishmen were shortly transported ouer into England, in the moneth of October this present yeare.

Thus was the duchie of Aquitaine, which had continued in the English possession, from the yeare of our Lord 1155, unto this present yeare, which is nere hand thre hundred yeares, by the mariage of Clenor daughter and heire to William duke of Aquitaine, wife to king Henrie the second, finally reduced and brought againe to the French obedience and seruitude. Within that onlie duchie be foure archbishops, foure and twentie bishops, sixtine earldomes, two hundred and two baronies, and about a thousand capitainships and balliwickes: whereby ye may consider, what a losse this was to the realme of England. On the thirtieth daie of October this yeare, was the queene deliuered at Westminster of a faire sonne, who was christened, and named Edward.

His mother sustained not a little slander and obloquie of the common people, who had an opinion that the king was not able to get a child; and therefore slaked not to saie, that this was not his sonne, with many slanderous words, greatlie sounding to the queenes dishonour; much part perchance vnturle. After the birth of this child, he highlie advanced his brethren on his mothers side: for Edmund he made earle of Richmond, which was father to king Henrie the seventh, and Jasper he created erle of Penbrooke, which died without issue. This yeare, John Stafford archbishop of Canturburie departed this life, and John Hempe archbishop of Yorke was remoued from that see, to succeed in place of the said Stafford, being the thirde score and second archbishop there, & John Booth bishop of Coutencie and Lichfield was translated to Yorke, being the one and sixtith archbishop of that church.

On Bartholomew daie at the twelfth nere unto Clerkenwell, a gentleman belonging to the priour of saint Johns, made a rumour; or tumult, for the which

(by the commandement of the maior) he was arrested by Richard Allie one of the shiriffes, and deliuered to Paris a sergeant. But such resistance was made by parts taking, that the shiriffe was faine to craue helpe of the maior, who with his brethren the aldermen arose from the game, and strengthened the shiriffes. And for the rescue of the said gentleman, one named Calis, came out of saint Johns with a great strength of archers, to resist the maior, in the which fraie a yeoman of saint Johns was slaine, and manie other sore hurt. The maior himselfe escaped hardlie, for his cap was smitten from his head with an arrow: but the maior with his citizens put the other to flight, sent the principall of them to Newgate, and then toke his place againe till the games were ended: by which time the citizens had gathered themselves in great number, and fetched him home, neuer maior so stronglie nor so honorablie.]

This yeare was Thomas Bourchier bishop of Ely (sonne to the countesse of Stafford, and brother to Henrie Bourchier earle of Essex) remoued to the see of Canturburie; who in the yeare after the world became flesh and appeared in humane shape 1443, first obtained the see of Ely (although once before he was by the king put backe from thence after his election of the couent thereunto, and confirmation of the pope) being translated from Worcester to the said see of Ely, the twelfth daie of March in the said yeare 1443. This man (after that he had remained at Ely ten yeares, thre and twentie weekes, and sixe daies) was (as is before said) in this yeare 1454 remoued to Canturburie by Nicholas the sixt then bishop of Rome. After this he was made chancelor, which office he obtained the seauenth of March, in the yeare 1455, being the thre and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the sixts reigne. Lastlie he was aduanced to the dignitie of cardinall by pope Paule the second, in the yeare of our Lord 1465, of whom is made a more liberall discourse in a treatise of the liues of the chancellors of England: a place of no small authoritie and reputation.]

After the warres foule ended in forren parties, civil dissention began againe at home, diuided spectallie into two factions. As is. Henrie descended of the house of Lancaster possessed the crowne from his grand father king Henrie the fourth (first author of that title) so Richard duke of Yorke, as heire to Lionel duke of Clarence, thirde sonne to king Edward the third, enforced. By reason whereof, the nobles as well as the common people were into parts diuided, to the utter destruction of manie a man, and to the great ruine and decaye of this region: for while the one partie fought to destroye the other, all care of the common wealth was set aside, and iustice and equitie clearelie extiled.

The duke of Yorke (about all things) first sought means how to stir by the malice of the people against the duke of Summerfet, imagining that he being made awaie, his purpose should the sooner take effect. He also practised to bring the king into the hatred of the people, as that he should not be a man apt to the gouernment of a realme, wanting both wit and stomach sufficient to supplie such a rour. Manie of the high estates, not liking the world, and disallowing the doings both of the king and his counsell, were faine inough of some alteration. Which thing the duke well vnderstanding, chiefelie sought the fauour of the two Penils, both named Richard, one earle of Salisburie, the other earle of Marwarke, the first being the father, and the second the sonne.

This earle of Salisburie was second son to Hase Penill earle of Westmerland, whose daughter the duke of Yorke had married, and the said Richard was espoused to ladie Alice, the onelie child and sole heire of the countie, and came to saint Albons the third daie next ensuing. The king there had pight his standard in a place called Coseloh, other wise Sandford, in saint Peters street: the lord Clifford kept the barriers of the towne, to stop, that the duke being assembled in his field, should not enter the towne. & The duke of Yorke (saith one moderne Chronographer) knowing the strength made against him, abiding in the field aforesaid, from seuen of the clocke in the morning untill it was almost ten of the clocke with out anie stroke smitten on either part, by the aduise of his counsell sent vnto the king vnder these words following.

Words in writing by the duke of Yorke to the king.

Please it vnto your excellent grace, Richard duke of Yorke, to take him as your true liege man and humble subiect; and to consider and tender at the reuerence of God, and in the waie of charitie, the true intent of my coming, and to be good and gracious souereigne vnto me, & all other your true liege men, which, that with all their power and might will be ready to liue and die with you in your right, and to do all things as shall like your maiestie roiall to command vs, if it be to the worship of the crowne of England, and the welfare of this your noble realme. For seuer, gracious lord, please it vnto your maiestie roiall, of your great goodnesse and rightwisenesse, to incline your will to heare & take the rightwise part of vs your true subiects and liege men. First, prayeng and beseeching to our souereigne, Christ Iesus, of his high and mightie power, to giue you vertue of prudence, and that through the prayer of the glorious martyr S. Albon giue you verie knowledge of our truths, and to know the intent of our assembling at this time: for God that is in heaven knoweth, our intent is rightfull and true. And therefore we praye vnto that mightie Lord in these words: Domine secundum defensionem nostram. Wherefore gracious lord, please it your maiestie roiall, to deliuer such as we will accuse, and they to haue like as they haue deserved: and this done, you to be honorable worshipper as most rightfull king and our true gouernour. And if we should now at this time be promised, as aforesaid this time (is not vnknown) haue bene promises broken which haue bene full faithfullie promised, and thereupon great othes swoorne, we will not now cease for no such promises, nor oth, till we haue them which haue deserved death, or else we to die therefore.

The answer by the king to the duke of Yorke.

I King Henrie charge and command, that no manner person, of what degree, estate or what condition soeuer he be, abide not; but that they auoid the field, and not be so hardie to make resistance against me in my owne realme. For I shall know what traitour dare be so bold to raise anie people in mine owne land, where though I am in great disease and brauines. By the faith I owe vnto S. Edward, and vnto the crowne of England, I shall destitute them euerie mothers sonne, and eke they to be hanged, drawne, and quartered, that may be taken afterward of them, in example to make all such traitors to beware for to make anie rising of people within mine owne land, and so traitorouslie to abide their king and gouernour. And for a conclusion, rather than they shall haue anie lord, that here is with me at this time, I shall this day for their sake in this quarell my selfe liue and die.

The

The words of the duke of Yorke to all gentlemen and other assembled with him.

Sirs, the king our soueraigne lord will not be reformed at our beseeching ne prayer, nor will not in no wise vnderstand the intent wherfore we be here assembled and gathered at this time, but onelie is in full purpose to destroy vs all. And therupon a great oath hath made, that there is none other waie, but that he with all his power will pursue vs; and if we be taken, to giue vs a shamefull death, losing our liuelod and goods, and also our heires thamed for euer. Therefore sirs, now sith it will none otherwise be, but that we shall either die; better it is for vs to die in the field, than cowardlie to be put to an vtter rebuke and shamefull death, for the right of England standeth in vs. Considering also in what perill it standeth at this time, and for to redresse the mischefe thereof, let euery man helpe to his power this daie, and in that quarrell to quite vs like men, to the crowne of England; praising and beseeching vnto that Lord, the which is eternall, th'v reigneth in the glorious kingdome celestially, to keepe and saue vs this daie in our right, and through the gifts of his holie grace we may be made strong to withstand the great, abhominable, and horrible malice of them that purpose to destroy vs and the realme of England, and put vs to a shamefull death. Prate we therefore to the Lord to be our comfort and our defendour, saieing these words, Domine iudex defensiois nostre.

But another historie-writer saith, that the king, when first he heard of the duke of Yorks approach, sent to him messengers, the duke of Buckingham, and others, to vnderstand what he meant by his coming thus in manner of warre. The duke of Buckingham to his message was answered by the duke of Yorke and his complices, that they were all of them the kings faithfull liege subiects, and intended no harme to him at all: but the cause of our coming (saie they) is not in meaning anie hurt to his person. But let that wicked and naughtie man the duke of Summerfet be deliuered vnto vs, who hath lost Normandie, and taken no regard to the preservation of Calcoigne; and furthermore, hath brought the realme vnto this miserable estate; that where it was the flour of nations, and the princesse of provinces (now is it haled into desolation & spoile, not so breedfull by malice of forren enimie, that indeed vtterlie (as ye know) seeketh our ruine, as by the intolerable outrages of him that so long ago & euen still appeares to haue sworne the confusion of our king and realme.) If it therefore please the king to deliuer that bad man into our hands, we are readie without trouble or breach of peace, to returne into our countrie. But if the king be not minded so to do, because he cannot misse him; let him vnderstand, that we will rather die in the field, than suffer such a mischefe vnto redressed.

The king aduertised of this answer, more wilfull than tollerable, appointed him rather to trie battell, than deliuer the duke of Summerfet to his enemies. Whereof they ascertained made no longer staie, but straightwaie sounded the trumpet to battell: or rather (as Hall saith) while king Henrie sent forth his ambassadours to treat of peace at the one end of the towne, the earle of Warwike with his gharshmen entred at the other end, and fiercelie setting on the kings foreward, within a small time discomfited the same. The place where they first brake into the towne, was about the middle of saint Peters street. The fight for a time was right sharpe and cruel, for the duke of Summerfet, with the other lords, committing to the succours of their companions that were put to the worse, did what they could to beat backe the enimies: but the duke of Yorke sent euer fresh men to succour the wearie, and to supplie the places of them that were hurt, whereby the kings armie was finally brought low, and all the chieftains of the field slaine and beaten downe.

For there died vnder the signe of the castell, Edmund duke of Summerfet, who (as hath bene reported) was warned long before to auoid all castles: and besides him laie Henrie the second of that name earle of Northumberland, Humfre earle of Stafford sonne to the duke of Buckingham, John lord Clifford, sir Barthram Antwile knight, a Norman borne (who for taking his native countrie to continue in his loiall obedience to king Henrie, came ouer to dwell here in England when Normandie was lost) William Zouch, John Bontreux, Rafe Bapthorp, with his sonne William Corwin, William Cotton, Gilbert Faldinger, Reginald Griffon, John Dawes, Elice Wood, John Cith, Rafe Woodward, Gilbert Sharlock, and Rafe Willoughbie esquires, with manie other, in all to the number of eight thousand, as Edward Hall saith in his chronicle: if there escaped not a fault in the impression, as 8000 for 800, sith hundreds in verie deed would better agree with the number of the kings whole power, which he brought with him to that battell, being not manie as foure thousand, as by writers appeareth.

Humfreie duke of Buckingham, being wounded, and James Butler earle of Ormond and Wilshire, and Thomas Thorpe lord chiefe baron of the exchequer, seeing fortune thus against them, lest the king alone, and with a number fled awaie. Those that thus fled, made the best shift they could to get awaie through gardens and backesides, through shrubs, hedgges and woods, seeking places where to hide themselves, untill that dangerous tempest of the battell were ouerblowne. Diuerse of the kings house also that could better skill to plae the courtiers than warriors, fled with the first; and those of the cast parts of the realme were likewise noted of too much lacke of courage, for their speedie withdrawing themselves, and leauing the king in danger of his aduersaries: who perceluing his men thus fled from him, withdrew into a poore mans house to saue himselfe from the shot of arrowes, that shue about him as thicke as snow.

This done, saith one historie, the duke of Yorke, the earles of Warwike, and Salisburie, came vnto the king where he was, and besought him on their knees of grace and forgiveness for that they had done in his presence, and besought him of his highnesse to take them to grace, and as his true liege men. The king desiring them to cease their people, that there should be no more hurt done, and to obeie his commandement, did cause to be proclaimed in the kings name, that all manner of people should cease off their malice, and not to smite one stroke more, and so ceased the battell. And upon the day next after, the king and the duke of Yorke, the earles of Warwike & Salisburie, came all to London; and were lodged in the bishops palace of London, where they kept their Whitsuntide with great ioy and solemnitie, concluding there to hold a parlement, the same to begin on the ninth daie of Iulie next following.]

Another historie saith, that the duke of Yorke, aduertised of the place into the which the king was withdrawn for the safetie of himselfe, and taking him into his power, comforted him in the best wise he could; assuring him, that now that the common enimie of the realme was dispatched, to wit, the duke of Summerfet, he had cause rather to reioisse, than to be sorie, with his destruction was the kings preservation. And for himselfe and all his adherents he undertooke, that they were and would remaine, during life, his most faithfull liege people, ready in all points to serue him, as his trustie and obedient subiects. After he had blessed such words, as wherewith best to comfort him, he brought the king forth of that simple house with all due reuerence thewed toward him first to the chynne, and after to his chamber.

Whilest the duke of Yorke was about thus to comfort the king, the soldiers that had the victorie now in their hands, applied the spoile, namelie, the sporthorne men, stripping not onelie those that had borne arms against them, but also the townsmen and other, with whom they might meet. So that it was thought, if the king had taken up his lodging at his first comming thither, within the abbete, as he did not (but in the midst of the towne, to prouide the better to resist his enemies) the abbete had bene spoiled also. This was the end of the first battell at saint Albons, which was fought upon the thursdaie next before the feast of Penthecost, being the thre and twentieth day of Maie, in this thre and thirtieth yere of the kings reigne. The bodies of the noble men were buried in the monastrie in our ladies chappell, and the meane people in other places. This Edmund duke of Summerfet left behind him three sonnes, Henric, Edmund and John, which to the extremitie of death toke part with the line of king Henric.

[There was this yere a great fight & fraie upon Clift heath, distant about two miles from Crester, betwene Thomas Courtneie earle of Denonshire, against William lord Bonile of Shute, and sundrie men of both parts were slaine. But yet the lord Bonile preuailed & had the victorie, who forthwith came to this citie, and the gates before being shut, were opened and he receiued; which thing so grieved the earle, that he continuallie sought thenceforth to be reuenged. But not long after in the quarell betwene king Henric the first, and king Edward the fourth, he ended his daies, and was beheaded at Yorke, and was the last of that line.]

The duke of Yorke, hauing gotten the victorie, remembered well, that he had published abroad how the onelie cause of this warre was, for the aduancement of the common-wealth, and therefore vsing all courtesie, would not touch the kings person after any violent sort; but with all honour and due reuerence conuicted him to London, and so to Westminster. To which place was summoned a parlement, which began the ninth daie of Iulie, in the which session, the late duke of Gloucester was openlie declared a true subiect, both to the king and to the realme. Beside this, it was enacted, that no person should either iudge or report any point of vnt ruth of the duke of Yorke, the earles of Salisburie and Warwike, or of any knight, esquier, archer, or other, for comming in warlike arate against the king, at saint Albons; considering their enterprise was onelie to see the kings person in safegard.

But all the blame was put upon the duke of Summerfet, Thomas Chorp, baron of the eschequer, and William Iosep esquier, the kings collateral companion; because that they, upon malicious purpose, kept a certefine letter from the kings knowledge, and would in no wise suffer it to be deliuered unto him, notwithstanding the same made to the aduancement of some good peace, had it bene thoughtlie and aduisedlie read, weied & considered. In which letter they declared, that as faithfull and humble subiects, they required onelie, that it would please the king whose honour, health, suertie, and preservation, they chesellie wished, not to giue credence to their ad-uersaries malicious suggestions, till their comming to his presence, unto the which they humblye be sought him that they might be admitted as his faithfull liege people, to shew the intent and purpose of their commings; which was to none other end, than to declare their fidelitie and allegiance towards his most roiall person, intending to put themselves with as much diligence and trauell in all things that might aduance his honour, health, and safegard, as any subiect he had liuing.

The keeping backe of this letter from the kings sight and knowledge, did minister matter sufficient unto the parlement, to colour and iustifie for well done all transgressions committed in the late battell and chafe at saint Albons. In this parlement also, the duke of Yorke was made protectoꝝ of the realme, and the earle of Salisburie was appointed to be lord chancellor, and had the great seale to him deliuered, and the earle of Warwike was cleared to the office of the capteineship of Calis, and the territories of the same; and thus the rule of the realme rested in the orders of the duke and chancellor, and all warlike affaires remained principallie in the earle of Warwike. And so amongst them it was agreed, that king Henric should reigne still in name and dignitie, but neither in deed nor in authoritie; not minding to despoile him, least they might suddenlie prouoke the furie of the common people against them, because that of the simple sort of people he was for his holiness of life, and abundant clemencie, much fauoured and highlie esteemed.

In this parlement also it was enacted, that the king should resume, take into his hands againe, haue and reteine into his possession, all honours, castles, lordships, townes, villages, manours, landes, tenements, waists, forests, chafes, rents, reuerfions, fees, farmes, seruices, fines, profits, counties, aduoufons of priories, churches, hospitals, and free chapels, and all other reuenues with their appurtenances, the which had passed from him since the first daie of his reigne unto that present; either by his letters patents, or authoritie of parlement, and manie other meanes, whether by grant, confirmation, or release from him made in fee simple, or fee taile, for tearme of life or yeares, to any manner of person and persons in England, Wales, Scotland, or the marches; in Ireland, or in the townes of Calis, & Guines, & the marches there. And likewise all grants made of such things as are aboue mentioned, being parcel of the duchie of Lancaster; and further all grants of offices, romes, fees, wages, or commodities, not accustomed to belong to any office or charge before the said first daie of the kings reigne, were likewise reuoked.

Diverse other things were also contained within this reuocation and generall resumption; with certeine exceptions yet and prouisoꝝ had, as were thought conuenient, and as by the same act it doth appeare. Moreover, now that the duke of Yorke and his adherents had wrested the whole rule & gouernment into their hands; all such persons as the king either loued, or the queene fauoured, were put beside the priuie counsell; and such put in their places, as were knowne to fauour the house of Yorke. Also the officers were changed throughout the realme, at the will and disposition of the protectoꝝ, chancellor, and capteine of Calis; so that they constituted as it were a triumvirat, ruling all things at discretion of these thre. And yet in all their rule & find not that any mention is made of their deferring of iustice, or of any polling or bribery: as was openlie proued by such as gouerned before their time. Onlie they were noted of diuerse spiritual persons, and namelie of the abbat of Westminster and his monks, for a grea great offense: because they took out of the sanctuarie at Westminster, John Holland duke of Exce-ster, all against the order taken in the last parlement, and sent him to the castell of Pomfret.

But now the lord Henrie Beauford, netolue duke of Summerset by the death of duke Edmund his father, slaine at the battell of saint Albons (as aboue is rehearsed) and Humfrie duke of Buckingham (who then & there lost his sonne and heire) and other of estate taking the part of king Henrie, whose case they did much bewaile & doubt, as perceiving where to the courtesie of the duke of Yorke did draw: they therefore thinking it necessarie to purueie for a remedie yer the mischefe hapened, consulted with the quene. By whose aduise was a great councell called at Grenewich, where the duke of Yorke was discharged of his protectoiship, & the earle of Salisburie deprived also of his office. ¶ This sudden change amongst the nobilitie caused altercations, and seditious attempts in the commonaltie, and in especiall within London: whereof this was one. A yong merchant, which before time had bene in diuerse cities of Italie, and there forbidden by the magistrats (as the law and maner is) to weare any weapon, now challenged an Italian in Cheapside for wearing a dagger, telling him it was against his owne countrie lawes: whereto because the Italian answered somewhat disdainfullie, the merchant not onelie took by force from him his dagger, but also with the same broke his pate.

This Italian in great hast complained to the maior, so that at the next court holden at the Guildhall, the merchant was sent for, and upon charge of his offense, he was commanded to ward. Whereupon di-uerse other light persons within the citie, assembled together in great plumps, by force constrained the maior to deliuer the prisoner out of Detegate: and not so satisfied, like mad men ran to the severall houses of diuerse Venetians, Lucases, and Florentines, and them spoiled, robbed, and rifled without reason or measure. The maior, perceiving this enormous doing, assembled a number of substantiall and graue citizens; who (not without bloodshed and maiming of sundrie) appeased the rage, and caused the misfeul people to depart to their houses. The beginner of this upprore got him to Westminster, and there registred himselfe for a fantastique man.

The quene, which now againe ruled all, being aduertised of this vnlawfull misdeemeanour, sent the dukes of Excester and Buckingham, with other noble men to London, with a commission oier and terminer, for the inquirie and punishment of so seditious an offense. But when the maior, the two dukes, and the two chiefe iustices were set in the Guildhall upon their commission, intelligence was giuen, that a number of light persons were appoaching in armor to rescue the prisoners apprehended for the late rob-berie and riot, as they were carried to their arraigne-ment. The two dukes and the other commissioners quickelie thence departed, and left their inquirie for that daie, though in deed in no such danger as they doubted: for certeine discret and sage citizens so handled the matter, that no misorder followed of that furie.

The maior on the next daie called a common coun-cell, whereof the number was an hundred fourescore and six, who ordeined that all wardens of mysteries should assemble their companies in their halles, where exhortation should be to the obseruation of peace; and if they spied any man either ready to stirre a rumor, or make to the deliuerance of such as were in prison, their names should be secretlie written, and so deli-uered to the maior: which policie well appeased this outrage. Whereupon after the commissioners sat in Guildhall, where manie of the robbers were attain-ted & put to execution, beside diuers great fines set on the heads of diuerse merchants, & paid, for winking at the matter. ¶ This yeare John Kempe archbishop of Canturburie departed this life, & Thomas Burlier bishop of Ely remoued to his place, being the threelcore and thired archbishop of that see.

¶ In the moneth of Nouember, in the Ile of Wozt, Abr. Fl. ex sene a cocke comming out of the sea, hauing a great crest vpon his head, and a great red beard, and legs of halfe a yard long: he stood on the water & crowed foure times, and euerie time turned him about, and beckened with his head, toward the north, the south, and the west, and was of colour like a fasant, & when he had crowed thre times, he vanished awaie. And thortlie after were taken at Crith within twelue miles of London, foure great and wonderfull fishes whereof one was called Mors marina, the second a 20 sword fish, the other two were whales.]

The French nation, hearing of the ciuill dissention within the realme here, and for an old grudge seeking our annoie, two nauies appointed they to inuade the townes standing vpon the riuage of the sea.
The capteins of the one fleet was William lord Po-miers, and of the other sir Peter Bressie, a great ruler in Normandie. These two capteins, taking their course out of the mouth of Saine, scuered themsel-ues, the one westward, and the other eastward, which 30 was sir Peter Bressie, who sailing alongst the coasts of Souther and Kent, durst not yet take land, but staid in the Downes: and there hauing by espiall perfect notice that Sandwich was neither peopled nor fortified (because that a little before, the rulers of the towne were from thence departed, for to a-uoid the plague, which soze there afflicted and sive the people) he entered the haven, spoiled the towne, and after such poze stufte as he there found rifled and taken, he fearing an assemblie of the countrie, thort-40 lie gat him awaie.

The lord Pomiers likewise took his course westward, & by night burning certeine houses in Fulnate Fulnate: with a little pillage retired into Britaine. The Scots also (busse like flies where no flap to fraie them) entered into Northumberland (king James the second being there in person) & burned certeine poze houses, and little cottages: but in the verie midst of their great enterpryse, they hearing of the duke of Yorke's marching toward them with a great host, with much 50 paine and no gaine in all hast returned to their coun-trie. But now to passe ouer outward inuasions, & to intreat of the daillie disorder amongst the nobles at home. So was it, that a great conflict fell betwene the lord Egremond, & the sonnes of the erle of Salis-burie, in which manie persons were slaine, & a great number hurt. The lord Egremond, seeking to get awaie but could not, by force was taken & brought before the councell: where the king and the quene, to shew themselves indifferent, adiudged him to paie 60 to the earle of Salisburie a great summe of monie; and for his heinous offense against the lawes, was committed to Detegate in London, out of which he escaped, to the great trouble of the shiriffes,

The quene nothing more seeking than the ouer-throw of the duke of Yorke and his friends, and perceiving she could attempt nothing against him nere to London, because the duke was in more estimation there, than either the king his husband, or his selfe: therefore she caused the king to make a progress into Warwikehire for his health and recreation. And so in semblance of hatoking and hunting, came to Couentræ, where diuerse waies were stu-

In this yere Reginald Pecocke bishop of Chiche-and he himselfe commanded to keepe his owne house during his naturall life: because that he (verie well learned, and better stomached) began to moue questions, not priuie but openlie, in the vntuities, concerning the annates, Peter pence, and other lu-ridictions & authorities, which the pope vsurped; and not onelie put forth such questions, but declared his mind and opinion in the same. Some saie he held that spirituall persons by Gods law ought to haue no temporall possessions, nor that personall tithes by Gods law were due [nor that christian men were to believe in the catholike church, nor in the communion of saints, but to believe that a catholike church and a communion of saints there is] and that he held both the vntuall church might erre in matters of faith; and that it is not of necessitie to believe all that which is ordeined by generall counsels, nor all that which they call the vntuall church ought to be allowed and holden of all christian people.

Moreouer, that it was meet to euerie man to be-bounds of diuinitie and christian beleefe in certeine articles, of the which he was conuict before the archb-shop of Canturburie, and other bishops and clearks, and after bitterlie abjured, reuoked, and renounced those articles openlie at Pauls crosse in his mother

The forme of his abiuration.

In the name of the trinitie, father, sonne, and holie-ghost, I Reginald Pecocke bishop of Chichester vntoworthie, of mine owne power and will without anie maner coercion or dread, confesse and knowledg that I here, before this time, presuming of my naturall wit, and preferring my iudgement and naturall reason before the new and the old testament, and the au-thoritie & determination of our mother holie church, haue held, written and taught otherwise than the ho-lie Romane and vniuersall church teacheth, preach-eth, or obserueth. And one is against the true catho-like and apostles faith, I haue written, taught, and published manie & diuerse perillous doctrines, books, works, and writings, containing heresies and errors, contrarie to the faith catholike, and determination of holie church; and speciallie these heresies and errors following, that is to saie in particular.

In primis, quod non est de necessitate fidei credere quod dominus noster Iesus Christus post mortem descendit ad inferos.

Item, quod non est de necessitate salutis credere in sanctirum communionem.

Item, quod ecclesia vniuersali potest errare in his qua sunt fidei.

Item, quod non est de necessitate salutis credere & tenere illud, quod consilium generale & vniuersali ecclesia statuit, approbat, seu determinat, in fauorem fidei, & ad salutem animarum, est ab vniuersis Christi fidelibus approbandum & te-nendum.

Wherefore I miserable sinner, which here before long time haue walked in darkenesse, and now by the mercie and infinit goodnesse of God reduced into the right waie, and light of truth, and considering my selfe greuouslie haue sinned and wickedlie haue informed and infected the people of God, retorne and come againe to the vnitie of our mother holie church, and all heresies and errors written and contained in my said booke, works and writings, here solemnlie and openlie reuoke & renounce. Which heresies and errors, and all other spices of heresies I haue before this time before the most reuerend father in God, and my good lord of Canturburie, in diuerse and lawfull forme subsciallie abjured, submitting my selfe, being then and also now at this time verie contrite and penitent sinner, to the correction of the church and of my said lord of Canturburie.

And ouer this, exhorting & requiring in the name & vertue of almighty God, in the saluation of your soules and mind, that no man hereafter giue faith and credence to my said pernicious doctrines, heresies and errors; neither my said booke keepe, hold, or read in anie wise; but that they all such booke, works, and writings suspect of heresies, deliuer in all god-lie hast vnto my said lord of Canturburie, or to his commissioners and deputies, in escheewing of manie inconueniences and great perils of soules, the which else might be cause of the contrarie. And ouer this declaration of my conuersion and repentance, I here openlie assent, that my said booke, works, and writings, for declaration and cause aboue rehearsed, be deputed vnto the fire, and openlie burnt in example and terro; of all other, &c.

After this, he was deposed of his bishopricke, hauing a certeine pension assigned vnto him for to liue on in an abbey, and some after died. His booke were intituled: 1 Of christian religion, and a booke pertaining therevnto. 2 Of matrimonie. 3 Iust expressing

In the moneth of Januarie died the earle of Der-said) being there at that time with quene spargaret, to appeale the malice betwene the yong lordes, whose fathers were slaine at Saint Albons, and they that held with the duke of York. The thirtieth of April there was a great fraie in Fleetstreet, betwene men of court and the inhabitants of the same street, in which fraie the quenes attorney was slaine. For this fact the king committed the principall gouernours of Iurniuals, Cliffords, and Barnards In to prison

king Henrie and his counsell, perceiuing the duke of Poike late still and sicerd not, returned to London, and there called a great counsell, openlie declaring how the French and Scots (imbolstered by the euill discord within this realme) attempted to annoy the same, as of late they had shewed apparant tokens, and likelie not ceasse upon occasions to do further displeasures, till a perfect concord were concluded betwene him and his friends, and those of the contrarie part and confederacie. And to the intent that he would be the cheefe author of peace, he promised of his dignitie so to intertaine the duke of Poike and his friends, that all old grudges should be not onelie inwardlie forgotten, but also outwardlie forgiven, which should be cause of perpetuall loue and assured amitie.

This deuise was of all men iudged for the best. Whereupon diuerse grane persons were sent to the duke of Poike, and all other the great estates of the realme, who since the battell of saint Albons neuer met nor communed together, commanding them for great causes to repaire to the kings court without delay. At his commandement came to London Richard duke of Poike, with foure hundred men, and was lodged at Wainards castell being his owne house; and after him came the earle of Salisburie with five hundred men, and was likewise lodged at his owne house called the Herbour. Then came the dukes of Excester and Summerfet with eight hundred men, and were lodged without Temple barre; and the earle of Northumberland, the lord Egremond, and the lord Clifford came with fiftene hundred men, and lodged without the citie. The earle of Warwike also came from Calis with six hundred men in red iackets, imbodered with white ragged stanes behind and before, and was lodged at the graie friers.

Thus were all those of the one part lodged within the citie, and those of the other without, in Holborne towards Westminster, and in other places of the suburbs, all upon wise consideration: for that the Poike faction and the Lancastrians could not well haue bene mingled without danger of discord. After that these lords were thus come vnto London, the king and the quene thextlie followed, comming thither the seventeenth daie of March, and lodged in the bishops palace. Because no riotous attempt or bickering should be begun betwene anie of the parties or their retinues, the maiors and aldermen of the citie kept great watch, as well by daie as by night, riding about the citie by Holborne, and Fleetstreet, with five thousand men well armed and arraid, to see good order and peace on all sides kept.

The lords which lodged within the citie held a dallie counsell at blacke friers: the other part sojourning without the walles, assembled likewise in the chapter house at Westminster. At length by the diligent trauell and good exhortation of the archbishop of Canturburie, and other prelates; both parties were persuaded to come to communication, and so did. Where, after long debating of grieuances on both sides, they promising to forget all old rancors, and to be friends each to other, & both obedient to the king, were accorded by award, wherof wytings were sealed, signed, and deliuered to effect as followeth.

The award made at Westminster

on the three and twentieth of March,

Anno regni regis 36.

The clerke herefore in this book to be nothing

First, that at the costs, charges, and expenses of the duke of Poike, the earles of Warwike, and Salisburie, fourtie & five pounds of yearelie rent should be assured by waie of a mortiseinent for ever, vnto the monastrie of S. Albons, for suffrages and obits to be kept, and almes to be imploied for the soules of Edmund late duke of Summerfet, Henrie late erle of Northumberland, and Thomas late lord Clifford late slaine in the battell of saint Albons, and buried in the abbey church, and also for the soules of all other slaine in the same battell. The said duke of Summerfet, the earle of Northumberland, and lord Clifford, by vertue of the same award, were declared for true and faithfull liegemen to the king, and so to be holden and reputed in the daie of their deaths, as well as the said duke of Poike, the earles of Warwike and Salisburie.

Moreover it was decreed, that the duke of Poike should giue to Glenor duchesse of Summerfet, and to Henrie duke of Summerfet his sonne, the summe of five thousand markes of good assignements of debts, which the king owght him for his wages, due during the time of his seruice in Ireland, to be distributed as the king should thinke convenient, betwixt the brethren & sisters of the said duke of Summerfet. Also that the earle of Warwike should giue vnto the lord Clifford, the summe of a thousand markes, in good and sufficient assignements of debts, which the king owght him, to be distributed betwixt the said lord Clifford his brethren and sisters.

Also where Thomas Persie knight, lord Egremond, and Richard Persie his brother, sonnes of the ladie Glenor countesse of Northumberland, had been in a fellons holden within the countie of Poike before Richard Bingham, and Rafe Pole the kings iustices and other commissioners, condemned vnto the earle of Salisburie in the summe of eight thousand markes; and to the same earle, and to his wife Alice in the summe of five thousand markes; and to Thomas Penill knight, son to the said earle of Salisburie, in the summe of a thousand markes; and to the said Thomas and spawd his wife, in the summe of two thousand markes; and to John Penill knight, sonne to the said earle of Salisburie, in the summe of eight hundred markes: for transgressions and trespasses there found to be done by the said lord Egremond, and Richard his brother, vnto the said earle of Salisburie, Alice, Thomas Penill, spawd and John Penill, as by the record appeared.

It was ordeined, that the said earle and his sonnes should release all the said summes of monie, and the executions thereof, and likewise release vnto Rafe Wernie, and John Steward late thiriffes of London, vnto whose custodie the said lord Egremond had bene for the same condemnations committed, and from them escaped, all actions which they or anie of them might haue against the said Wernie and Steward for the same escape. Yet it was decreed by this award, that the said lord Egremond should be bound by recognisance in the Chancerie, to keepe the peace toward the said erle and his wife, children, seruants, and tenants.

Also where diuerse knights, esquiers, and other seruants and tenants to the said earle of Northumberland, and to the said lord Egremond, were by their seuerall obligations bound, by occasion of the said debates, vnto the said duke of Poike, earle of Salisburie, or anie of their children, to stand to their order and gouernement; it was ordeined that the same obligations should be deliuered to them that so stood bound, before the feast of saint Peter ad vincula next ensuing at the citie of Poike; or else that the parties so bound, should haue sufficient acquitances in discharge of the same obligations.

It was further awarded, that all variances, discords, debates, controuersies, appeales, and actions personals, that were or had bene betwixt any of the world went.

the said persons, or any of their servants, or tenants, should be for ever determined & ended, saving to euerie one his title, action and right, which he had by any evidence of arrearages of rents or seruises, accounts, detinues, or debts due by reason of anie lawfull contract or deed, had and made for anie reasonable considerations, other than the variance before said.

And for the more assurance of both parties, it was ordeined that either should release to other all manner of actions, that were mere personals and appeales, which anie of them might haue against the other, by reason of the variances and discords before mentioned.

Also it was decreed, that if anie action, sute or quarrell charged betwixt anie of the seruants or tenants of anie of the parties, for matter or title supposed to be had, occasioned or moued before this time; that from thenceforth, none of the said parties should mainteine, support, or aid any of them that will so sue and moue strife and debate: but should rather so deale, as the matter may be brought to peace and quietnesse.

It was further awarded, that if anie man complained, pretended, or surmised, that this award was not kept, but in some point broken by anie of the parties, for the which breach he would haue a Scire facias, or some other action prosecuted in the kings name vpon anie recognisance made to the king for the performance of this award: yet should not the same Scire facias or action be prosecuted, till the kings counsell might be thoroughlie certified of the matter by the complainant, and vpon consideration see iust cause why the same Scire facias, or action ought to be had and prosecuted in the kings name.

And if anie variance rose betwixt the counsell of both the parties in making of the recognisances, releases, acquittances, or other writings; the same variance should be determined by the two lordes these iustices, that should be fullie instructed of the kings intention in this behalfe.

And besides this, it was notified and declared by the same award, that the parties being severallie bound in the Chancerie in great sums to obeie and performe this award, ordinance & iudgement made by the king; it was the kings will and pleasure, that the same recognisances should stand in force, and no parcels of the summes therein contained to be pardoned in anie wise, without the agreement and consent of the parties, for whose assurance the same recognisance was taken.

And if anie of the said summes, or anie parcell thereof should be recovered by action or execution taken and prosecuted in the kings name, vpon anie of the said recognisances; the parties to whose hindrance the award was broken, should haue the one halfe of the monie so recovered; and the other moitie should be assigned to the treasure of the kings house. This ordinance, award and agreement, was given vnder the kings great scale, at the kings palace of Westminster, the foure and twentieth daie of March in the six and thirtieth yeare of his reigne.

For the open publishing of this sofull agreement, there was (vpon our ladie daie in March) a solemne procession celebrated within the cathedrall church of saint Paule in London, at the which the king was present in habit roiall, with his crowne on his head. Before him went hand in hand the duke of Summerset, the earle of Salisburie, the duke of Gloucester, and the earle of Marlowe; and so one of the one faction, and another of the other: and behind the king the duke of Yorke, and the queene with great familiaritie in apperance leading hand in hand. But what shall be said: As goodlie apples corrupted at coze, (how faire coated so euer they seme) can neuer be made to become sound againe: no rotten walles new plastered without, can euer the more staie their moldering inward, till the putrified matter first through the cruell laie all in the mire: so fared it on all parts in this dissembled and counterfet concord. For after this apparant peace (but inward discord) diuerse of the nobles smallie regarding their honours, forgot their oth, and brake their promise boldlie.

Not long after this, of pretended purpose (as it was thought) a fraie was made vpon a yeoman of the earle of Marlowes, by one of the kings seruants, in the which the assaillant was sore hurt; but the earles man fled. Wherevpon the kings meniall seruants, seeing their fellow hurt, and the offender escaped, assembled together and watched the earle, when he returned from the counsell chamber toward his barge, and suddenlie set on him, the yeomen with swords, the blacke gard with spits and fier-foxes. After long fight, and manie of the earles men maimed and hurt, by helpe of his friends he gat a wherrie, and so escaped to London. The queene aduertised herof, incontinentlie commanded that he should be apprehended and committed to the tower, where (if he had bene taken) he had shortly ended his daies.

By this unhappie fraie, there arose anon after such trouble and terrible warre, that the whole realme was thereby disquieted. For after this displeasure done to the earle, and the queens good mind towards him by his secret friends revealed; he with all diligence toke his iournie to Marlowe, and after into Dorsetshire, where he found the duke of Yorke, and the earle of Salisburie, declaring vnto them the assault made vpon him by the kings seruants, and the pretended euill purpose of the queene. After which complaint made, he fearing to be dispossessed of his roome at Calis, with great speed imbarked himselfe and sailed thither. He was not onelie deputie or lieutenant of Calis, but also high admerall of the seas, which office was to him confirmed for the space of five yeares. Wherevpon, whether before his arrivall now at Calis, or shortly after, I cannot say; but this yeare about the middell of summer, the said earle, hauing with him a fourtene well appointed ships, sailed abroad to scowle the seas, and by chance met with five great ships, whereof three were caraks of Genoa, and the other two were of Spaine, bigger in height and length than the caraks.

The earle, though he was scarce able to deale against them, yet he valiantlie incountred them. There was a verie sore and long continued battell fought betwixt them, for it lasted almost the space of two daies. Yet in the end the victorie fell to the English, so that two of those ships being forced to saue themselves by flight, the other three were taken, which the earle brought vnto Calis, with all the merchandise aboard the same; the value whereof in wine, oile, war, iron, cloth of gold, and other riches, was esteemed to the summe of ten thousand pounds & above. By reason whereof, that was sold now for twelue pence, which would not haue bene bought before for two shillings. There were taken a great number of prisoners, beside a thousand of the enemies slaine in fight. Of the earles part there were fiftie slaine. The earles fame hereby increased not a little, and manie a blessing he had for this peece of seruice.

The noble science of Printing was about this time found in Germanie at Spagunce by one John Guttembergus a knight: one Conrads an Almaine brought it into Rome: William Caxton of London mercer brought it into England about the yeare 1471: and first practised the same in the abbie of saint Peter at Westminster; after which time it was likewise practised in the abbies of S. Augustine at at Canturburie, saint Albons, and other monasteries of England. In a little towne in Bedfordshire there fell a bloudie raine, whereof the red drops appeared in sheets, the which a woman had hanged out for to drie.]

But now to the former purpose. After that the earle was gone over to Calis, the duke of Yorke and the earle of Salisburie, falling in consultation together, it was at length agreed betwixt them, with advice of their friends, that the said earle of Salisburie with a warlike companie should march toward the king; and signifie to him by waie of complaint, both the manifest iniurie done to his sonne, and also the uncourteous breach of the swoorne amitie and late agreement. In which sute if he prevailed, he should not then let passe the occasion giuen for reuenge of displeasures to him done, both by the queene and his sister counsellors. After conclusion of this deuise, the earle of Salisburie remoued from Middleham castle, accompanied with foure or five thousand men, and toke his waie through Lancashire, to passe that waie towards London.

In the meane season, the queene, assisted and ruled by the dukes of Summerfet and Buckingham, hauing a vigilant eie to all hir businesse, imagined that the earle of Marwike had kindled this fier, to the intent to set the crowne on the duke of Yorke's head. Therefore she appointed James Towchey lord Audelie, because his power laie in those parties by the which the earle of Salisburie must passe, to raise an host of men with all speed, and to giue battell to the same earle, if he saw cause and place conuenient. She had deuised a cognifance of the white swan, which she willed all such (as she knew to beare fauor vnto hir sonne) to weare, for a signification of their good minds and hartie loue towards him: which cognifance she had giuen to manie gentlemen of Cheshire, and other countries thereabout.

The queene hir selfe late the same time at Ecclesale in Staffordshire, but the R. remained at Colchester in Marwike shire, whither the earle of Salisburie meant to come, in pretense to haue communed with him for a reformation of matters depending in contencie betwixt himselfe, the duke of Yorke, and others. But the queene construing that they ment no good, neither to hir nor hir husband, requested the lord Audelie to apprehend him, if by any means he might. The lord Audelie according to his commission assembled about ten thousand men of Cheshire and Salopshire, and knowing by his espials which waie the earle kept, approached nere to him vpon a faire plaine called Blozeheath, within a mile of a towne called Draiton in Shropshire. The earle, perceiuing in what icopardie he stood, determined to abide the aduenture with fame and honour, rather than to flie with shame and reproach; and so incamped himselfe all the night on the side of a little brooke, not verie brode, but somewhat deepe.

In the morning earlie, being the daie of saint Eccle, he caused his souldiers to shoot their sights towards the lord Audelies companie, which laie on the other side of the said water, and then he and all his people made a signe of retreat. The lord Audelie, supposing his aduersaries had fled in daie, caused his trumpets quicklie to blow vp, and setting forth his forward, speedilie passed the water. The earle of Salisburie, which knew the sleights of warlike policie, suddenlie returned, and set vpon the lord Audelie and his chiefe captains, per the residue of his armie could passe the water. The fight was fore and deadly. The earle desiring the sauing of his life, and his aduersaries conueyng his destruction, fought fore for the obtaining of their purpose: but in conclusion, the earles armie, as men not looking for other succours nor meane to escape, but by their owne manhood, so egerlie assaulted their foes, that they slue the lord Audelie and all his captains, and discomfited all the remnant of his people.

In this battell were slaine foure and twentie hundred persons, but the greatest losse fell vpon the Cheshire men, because one halfe of the shire was on the one part, and the other halfe on the other: of which number were sir Thomas Dutton, sir John Dounce and sir Hugh Ctenables, sir Richard Polinour, sir William Crolwteche, sir John Legh of the Both, and sir John Egerton, knights; John Done, and John Dutton esquires. But the earles two sonnes, the one called sir John Penill, and the other sir Thomas Penill, were fore wounded, the which soberlie forsook into the north countrie, were apprehended by the queenes friends, and together with sir Thomas Harington that was likewise taken, were conueied to Chester, but their keepers deliuered them shortly after, or else had the Parchmen destroyed the goales. Such fauour bare the commons of Wales to the duke of Yorke's band, that they could not suffer anie wrong to be offered, or euill word to be spoken against him or his friends.

After this battell at Blozeheath, the said duke of Yorke, perceiuing the destruction of him and his friends was intended, and that his deuises were already disclosed to the king and the queene, he thought now no longer to linger his businesse, but with all diligence to set forward the same. And therefore sending for his chiefe friend the earle of Salisburie, after long conference of their weightie affaires, they determined to raise an armie, and by fine force either to win their purpose, or end their liues in the same. Wherevpon were men swiftly assembled, friends sent for, and a puissant armie gathered, both of Northerne and Welshmen, who in good order came into the marches of Wales adioining to Shropshire, determining there to abide their enemies, or to meet them, if occasion serued.

There came to him from Calis the earle of Marwike, bringing with him from that towne a great number of expert men in martiall feates, whereof two were captains knowne for men of great experience and approued policie, as they had well declared the same in the warres of Normandie and Guen, the one called Andrew Crollop, and the other John Blunt. The king, hauing aduertisement of the dukes doings, sent forth commissioners to leuie a power in all parts of the realme, where he thought to haue any faithfull friends or fauourers: by reason whereof a great number of men of warre was assembled. Manie for the loue they bare to the king resorted to his side, but more for feare of the queenes displeasure, whose frowning countenance was their vndowing, and hir indignation their death.

To be bræfe, the king accompanied with the dukes of Summerfet and Crecster, and other of the line of Lancaster, determined either by force or by policie to bring the duke of Yorke to confusion; and therevpon marching forward they came vnto Worcester, where as well to refresh his people, as to take further aduise what was best to be done, he staid for a time. And at length it was determined, that the R. should first send vnto the aduersaries, a messenger of good account, as the bishop of Salisburie Richard Beauchampe, to offer vnto them a cleere and free generall pardon of all trespasses, offenses, and transgressions whatsoeuer, if they would giue ouer their enterprise, and become true and obedient subjects.

When the bishop was come vnto them, and had declared his message, they first withdrew to themselves apart, and fell together in counsell: and after they gaue answer by the mouth of the erle of Marwike, which which consisted in three points. First, that as concerning the pardon, they durst not trust unto it, considering they had diuerse pardons before, and the same confirmed by parlement, and yet nothing available to their assurance. Secondlie, that notwithstanding such pardons, those that were about the king, were presumptuous and unruly, that they cared not at all to breake the kings commandments, nor were any thing abashed to be noted for the breach thereof.

Thirdlie, although by law of the land, and right of the statute, euery lord by vertue of the kings writ, being called to the parlement, ought safely to come, safely there to remaine, and safely to depart and returne home: this notwithstanding, the said earle of Warwicke himselfe, at a certaine councill holden at Westminster, by vertue of the kings writ of priuie seale, being there in person, & labouring to his knowledge to giue good aduise and counsell for the profit of the common-wealth, was yet in danger of death, if the Lord above had not the better provided for his escape, more than anie humane power or force of the kings pardon. For the which cause (quoth he) sith the kings pardon maie be likened in these daies to a buckler of glasse, or to a staffe of reed, in which is no trust, we dare not commit our selues unto the defence of anie such pardons: But if anie other waie might be deuised for their suerties, whereunto they might safelye trust (he said) they were ready to come to his grace, and to sue for his fauour.

A letter from the lords to the king.

The king receiuing such answer in these words, or other to the like effect, was nothing contented therewith, and so commanded his standards establisht to aduance. But yet before he came nere to the place where they were incamped, the said lords wrote to him a letter in their owne excuse, protesting they meant no harme in the world against his person, as by their demeanours and proceedings it might well appeare, who had euer fled & withdraue themselves from place to place, from towne to towne, from village to village, and from countie to countie. Which might serue for an euident token, that they sought for nothing but onelie their owne safegard & quietnesse of the realme, with so much fauour, as in god and safe suertie they might come to his presence, to declare certaine things which in their opinions might turne to the wealth of the realme: and further to make answer to all things that had bene objected against them. And now (said they) we are here remaining in the bittermost parts of the land (that is) in the marches towards Wales, not farre from Ludlow, not vpon anie presumptuous meaning, but rather in all humble lowlinesse of mind and bodie to abide his graces comming: which they besought of God might be in some peaceable manner and fauorable in their behalfe.

A proclamation.

The king hauing receiued this letter, and considering that some bitter meaning late vnder so sweet a speech, commanded his armie againe to march forth; and comming within halfe a mile of the aduersaries campe, pitched downe his field, and forthwith caused proclamation to be made, that who so euer of his aduersaries would giue ouer his leuod begun enterprise, and repaire to his presence to sue for mercie, he would pardon him of all offenses. This proclamation, comming to the vnderstanding of them in the duke of Yorkes host, caused a great number that were there with him against the king, to get awaie & come to the kings side. Moreover, there rose among the residue great murmuring: so as they seemed verie like to grow to a greuous mutinie.

Andrew Trollop for-saith the lords.

Amongst other of those that came to the kings campe, Andrew Trollop was chiefe, who with the other Calistans, which had long serued the king, and liued a long time by his wages, perceiuing now that they should fight against their soueraigne lord himselfe (whose true subiect they esteemed before that time the earle of Warwicke euer to haue bene, and in no wise his enimie) in the dead of the night before the daie of the battell secretly departed from the dukes campe, and submitted themselves to the king, admitting him of all things deuised against him. Whereof part was, that the duke of York by his expert captains appointed vpon a waie how to set vpon his enimies, & easilie to discomfit them; so as on the next morning he meant to haue assailed the king and his people, yet they could haue bene readie or warie of his comming.

But now by the going awaie thus of his captains and people, that purpose was disappointed. And Andrew Trollop thus departed, he was now as much discomfited, as before by trust in him he was encouraged: for all his counsell and purpose by Andrew disclosed, he thought it better for him & his to depart in suertie, than to abide the imminent danger. Whereupon he with his yonger sonne Edmund earle of Rutland, secretly fled into Wales, and so passed into Ireland, where he was with all toy and honour gladly receiued, all the Irish offering to liue and die with him; as if they had bene his liege subiects, and he their lord and prince naturallie borne.

The earle of March sonne and heire apparant to the said duke, accompanied with the earles of Salisburie and Warwicke, and sir John Wenlocke, got awaie the same night, and came into Deuonshire: where, by the meanes of John Winhamelquier (which after was high treasurer of England, in the daies of king Henrie the seauenth) they bought a ship which cost a hundred and ten marks at Exmouth, and sailed into Cerneseie, after came to Calis, where being let in at the posterne, they were iustlicie welcomed of their friends, namelie of sir William Perrell lord Fauconbridge, that was the earle of Warwikes vnckle, and brother to the earle of Salisburie, who had the towne and castell in keeping. All these being assembled cast their heads together, and euery one feuerallie had his deuise for the perfecting of their purpose, whereto there wanted in them neither will nor hardinesse.

But now to returne to the king. When in the morning he was aduertised that the duke of York and his partakers were fled and gone, he caused all his horsemen to follow them; although in vaine: for they were got farre enough out of danger (as before ye haue heard). The king pardoned all the poore soldiers, sauing certaine ringleaders of the which some he punished and fined, and some he hanged and quartered. After this he remoued to Ludlow, and there brake vp his host, and spoiling the towne and castell, he sent the duchesse of York with hir two yong sonnes to be kept in ward with the duchesse of Buckingham hir sister. This done, he proclaimed these lords, traitors to him, enimies to their countrie, and rebels to the crowne, confiscating their lands, goods, and offices: and committed the gouernance of the north parts to the earle of Northumberland, and to the lord Clifford, as to his trustie and most faithfull friends, & of his towne of Calis he made capitaine Henrie the new duke of Summerfet.

This duke reioicing much in his new office, chose forth diuerse valiant and hardie soldiers, and with great pompe hostilie after toke the seas, and sailed towards Calis. But when he thought to haue entered the haven, the artillerie shot so hotlie, both out of the towne, and from Rifebanke, that he suffering there a sore reuulse, was faine to land at Whitlandbaie; and sent word to the captains of the towne to receiue him as the kings lieutenant, shewing to them his letters patents. But neither he nor his writing was once regarded: and so of necessitie he resorted to the castell of Guines, daile skemishing with the garrison of Calis, more to his losse than gaine. Diuerse of the mariners of those ships that went ouer with him, after his arriual, owing more good will to the earle of Marwike than to this young duke, conuicted their ships into the haue of Calis, and in their diuerse of the earle of Marwikes enemies, as Jamyn Findill, John Felow, and diuerse others, the which being presented vnto the earle of Marwike, he caused their heads forthwith to be stricken off.

Shortlie after, Richard lord Riuers, and sir Anthony Woodville his valiant sonne that was after lord Scales, accompanied with foure hundred warlike persons, were appointed to passe ouer to Calisnes, to aid the duke of Summerfet against his aduersaries, which laie in Calis. But as they sojourned at Sandwich abiding for wind and weather to transport them ouer, the earles of March and Marwike had knowledge thereof, and sent John Dinham with a small number of men (but a multitude of valiant hearts) vnto the towne of Sandwich, which suddenly entered the same, and took the lord Riuers and his sonne also in their beds, robbing houses, and spoiling ships. And beside this, they took the principall ships of the kings nauie, and had them awaie with them to Calis, one excepted called Grace de Dieu which might not be had awaie because she was broken in the bottome: and there presented them to the earle of March, of whome he was fullie receiued. For though in the fight he was fore hurt & malmed in the leg, so as he halted euer after, yet he bare himselfe so well in that enterprise, that his praise was great amongst all men.

¶ Sir Waldborne Fulford vnderooke on paine of losing his head, that he would destroye the earle of Marwike: but when he had spent the king a thousand marks in monie, he returned againe. After this god fortune thus chanced to the lords, diuerse of the best ships taken in the haue of Sandwich, were well vittelled and manned, and with them the earle of Marwike sailed into Ireland, to common with the duke of Forke of their great affaires and businessse. The weather and wind were so fauourable to the earles purpose, that within lesse than thirtie daies he passed and repassed from Calis to Dublin, and backe againe.

The duke of Grecester, being chiefe admerall of the sea, laie in the west countrie, and durst not once meddle with the earle of Marwikes nauie, as he came by: by reason of the mistrust which he had in the capieins and mariners of his owne nauie: who by their murmuring well shewed that they wished the earle of Marwikes good successe. ¶ But here is to be remembered, that after the great discoriffiture of the lords (as before you haue heard) and proclamation made against them as traitors, the duke of Forke and the earles of Salisburie and Marwike had conference; and thereupon concluded with one assent, to write a letter excusatorie (supposing thereby to salue by the force) in all their names to the king: and so did, as followeth.

A copie of the said letter excusatorie written by the said duke and earles.

Our christian king, right high and mightie prince, and our most dread soueraigne lord, after as humble recommendations to your high excellencie as will suffice. Our true intent to the prosperitie and augmentati- on of your high estate, and to the common-weale of this realme, hath bene shewed vnto your highnesse in such writing as we make thereof. And ouer that, an indenture signed by our hands in the church cathedraall of Worcester, comprehending the proue of the truth and dutie that (God knoweth) we beare to your said estate, and to the prebeminence and prerogatiue thereof, we sent vnto your god grace by the prior of the said church, and diuerse other doctors, and among other, by maister William Linwood doctor of diuinitie, which ministred vnto vs seuerallie the blessed sacrament of the bodie of Iesus, whereupon we and euerie of vs depose for our said truth and dutie, according to the tenor of the said indenture.

And since that time we haue certified at large in writing and by mouth, by Carter king of armes, not onelie to your said highnesse, but also to the god and worthie lords being about your most noble presence, the largenesse of our said truth and dutie, and our intent and disposition, to search all the motions that might serue conuenientlie to the affirmation thereof, and to our perfect suerties from such inconuenient and breuergent leoparries as we haue bene put in diuerse times here before. Whereof we haue cause to make, and ought to make such exclamation and complaint, not without reason, as is not vnknowen to all the said worthie lords, and to all this land; and will offer vs to your high presence, to the same intent, if we might so do, with our said suertie, which onelie causeth vs to kepe such fellowship as we do in our lesall manner.

And hereto we haue forborne, and auoided all things that might serue to the effusion of christians bloud, of the dread that we haue of God, and of your rotall maiestie: and haue also eschued to approach your said most noble presence, for the humble obeisance and reuerence wherein we haue, and during our life) will haue the same. And yet neuertheless we heare, that we be proclaimed and defamed in our name vnrighthlie, vnlawfullie, and (sauing your high reuerence) vnrulie, and otherwise (as God knoweth) than we haue giuen cause; knowing certeinlie, that the blessed and noble intent of your said god grace, and the righteounesse thereof is, to take, repute, and accept your true and lawfull subiects; and that if accordeth neither with your said intent, nor with your will or pleasure, that we should be otherwise taken or reputed. And ouer that, our lordships and tenants bene of high violence robbed and spoiled, against your peace and lawes, and all righteounesse.

We therfore, as we suffice, beseech your said god grace, to take, repute, and reueue therevnto our said truth and intent, which to God is knowen, as we shew it by the said tenor of the same indenture. And not applie your said blessednesse, ne the great righteounesse and equitie wherewith God hath euer rewarded your high nobilitie, to the importune impatience and violence of such persons, as intend of extream malice to proceed (vnder the shadow of your high might and presence) to our destruction, for such inordinate couetise (whereof God is not pleased) as they haue to our lands, offices, and goods, not letting or sparing therefore, to put such things in all lamentable and to sorrowfull leopardie, as might in all wise take effect, by the myserie of Gods will and power.

Not having regard to the effusion of christians bloud, ne anie tenderesse to the noble bloud of this land such as serue to the tuition and defense thereof, ne not waicng the losse of your true liege men of your said realme, that God defend, which knoweth our intent, and that we haue auoided therefrom as farre as we may with our suerties, not of anie dread that we haue of the said persons, but onelie of the dread of God and of your said highnesse, and will not vse our said defense vntill the time that we be prouo- ked hed of necessitie, whereof we call heauen and earth into witnesse and record, and therein beseech God to be our iudge, and to deliuer vs according to our said intent, and our said truth & dutie to your said highnesse, and to the said common-weale.

Most chullian king, right high and mightie prince, and most dread soueraigne lord, we beseech our blessed Lord to preserve your honour and estate in toy and felicitie. Written at Ludlow the tenth daie of October: R. Poike, R. Warwicke, R. Salisburie.

Abt. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 692, 693.

During this time the king called a parlement in the citie of Couentrie, which began the twentieth of September, in the which were attainted of high treason, Richard duke of Yorke, Edward erle of Warwicke, his sonne and heire, Richard erle of Warwicke, Edmund erle of Rutland, Richard erle of Salisburie, John lord Clifford, lord Clinton, sir Thomas Harrington, sir John Wenlock, Thomas Peuill & John Peuill sons of the erle of Salisburie, James Dickering, John Coniers, Thomas Par, William Diddhall, and Henrie Ratford knights; John Bowser, Thomas Coke, John Claie, Richard Citon, Robert Wolone, Edward Bowser, Thomas Naughtan, John Roger, Richard Greie, Walter Denoreur, Walter Hopton, Roger Linderton, Will. Bowles, Joulke Stafford, the lord Polwis, and Alice countesse of Salisburie, their goods and possessions escheated, and their heires disherited unto the ninth degree, their tenants spoiled of their goods, maimed and slaine; the towne of Ludlow, belonging to the duke of Yorke, was robbed to the bare wals, & the outchies of Yorke spoiled of his goods.

But (saith another) when the king should come to giue his consent unto the acts passed in the same parlement, and that the clerke of the parlement had read that statute of the attainder of those lords; which was the kings modelle and great zeale unto mercie, that he caused a prouiso to be put in, and addes unto the same statute, that it might be lawfull unto him at all times fullie without authoritie of anye other parlement, to pardon the same noble men, and restore them againe to their former estates, degrees, and dignities in all things, so they would come in unto him, and in the spirit of humblenesse beseech him of grace and fauour. & therein the king gaue euident testimonie, that he was indued with those qualities of mind which the poet ascribed vnto Cesar, (namelie slow to punish, & sad when he was constrained to be seuerer: fith the one commended his lenitie, the other fauoured of tyrannies) in this distinction of like termination:

Cuius dolet quoties cogitur esse ferax.*

Herewith also order was taken for the defense of the heuens & landing places alongst the sea coasts. Sir Simon Montford, with a great crew of men, was appointed to keepe the downes, and the five ports; and all men passing into Flanders were vpon paine of death prohibited to passe by Calis, least the lords there should begeth of them anye press monie, as they did latelie before of the merchants of the staple the summe of eightene thousand pounds. The lords were not ignorant of all the kings prouisions made against them, but were ascertained daillie what was done euen in the kings priue chamber: wherefore first they sent a companie to Sandwith vnder the gouernance of the lord Fauconbridge, who toke the towne, & sir Simon & Robert Montford within it, and sent him with all his mates to Calis, where incontinentlie he with twelue of his chiefe fellows lost their heads on the sand before Rissebanke.

The earles at Calis sent to the archbishop of Canturburie, and to the commons of England at large certaine articles in writing, beginning thus: Weo shipfull sirs, we the duke of Yorke, the earles of March, Warwicke, and Salisburie, sued and offered to haue come to the king our soueraigne lords most noble presence, to haue declared there afore him for our dutie to God and to his highnesse, and to the prosperitie and welfare of his noble estate, and to the common-weale of all his land as true liege men, the matters following.

10 Articles sent from the duke of Yorke, and the earles, to the archbishop of Canturburie and the commons.

Primitis, the great oppression, extortion, robbrie, murther, and other violences done to Gods church, and to his ministers thereof, against Gods and mans law.

2 Item, the pouertie and miserie that to our great heavinesse our soueraigne lord standeth in, not hauing anye liuelod of the crowne of England whereof he may keepe his honorable household, which causeth the spoiling of his said liege men by the takers of his said household, which liuelod is in their hands that haue bene destroyers of his said estate, and of the said common-weale.

3 Item, how his lawes be parcialle and unrightfullie guided, and that by them that should most lone and tender his said lawes, the said oppression and extortion is most fauoured and supported; and generally, that all righteousnesse and iustice is eriled out of the said land, and that no man dreads to offend against the said lawes.

4 Item, that it will please his said god grace to liue vpon his owne liuelod, wherevpon his noble progenitors haue in daies heretofore liued as honorable and as worthilie as anye chullian princes, and not to suffer the destroyers of the said land, and of his true subiects, to liue therevpon, and therefore to lache the sustentances that should be belonging to his said estate, and find his said household vpon his poore commons, without payement, which neither accordeth with Gods nor mans law.

5 Item, how oft the said commons haue bene greatlie and maruellouslie charged with taxes and tallages to their great impouerishing, whereof little god hath either geolue to the king, or to the said land, and of the most substance thereof the king hath left to his part not halfe so much; and other lords and persons, enemies to the said common-weale, haue to their owne vse, suffering all the old possessions that the king had in France and Poymandie, Anion and Spaine, Gascoine and Guen, wone and gotten by his father of most noble memorie, and other his noble progenitors, to be shamefullie lost or sold.

6 Item, how they can not cease therewith, but now begin a new charge of imposition and tallages vpon the said people, which neuer afore was sent; that is to saie, euerie towne to find men for the kings gard, taking example therein of our enemies and aduersaries of France. Which imposition & tallage, if it be continued to heire, heires, and successors, will be the heaviest charge and worst example that ever grew in England; and the foresaid subiects, and the said heires and successors in such bondage, as their ancestors were neuer charged with.

7 Item, where the king hath now no more liuelod out of his realme of England, but onelie the land of Irelund, and the towne of Calis, and that no king chulliened hath such a land and a towne without his realme; diuerse lords haue caused his highnesse to write letters vnder his priue seale, vnto his Irish enemies, which neuer king of England did heretofore, one, whereby they may haue comfort to enter into the conquest of the said land, which letters the same Irish enimies sent vnto me the said duke of Yorke, and maruelled greatlie that anie such letters should be to them sent, speaking therein great shame and villanie of the said realme.

8 Item, in like wise the king by excitation and labour of the same lords, wrote other letters to his enimies and aduersaries in other lands, that in no wise they should shew anie fauour or good will to the towne of Calis, whereby they had comfort inough to proceed to the winning thereof. Considered also, that it is ordeined by the labour of the said lords, that no where vittels nor other thing of refreshing or defense should come out of England, to the succour or reliefe of the said towne, to the intent that they would haue it lost, as it may openlie appeare.

9 Item, it is deemed and ought greatlie to be deemed, that after the same lords would put the same rule of England, if they might haue their purpose and intent, into the hands and gouernance of the said enimies.

10 Item, how continuallie since the pittous, shamefull, and sorrowfull murder to all England, of that noble, worthy, and chistian prince Humfreie duke of Glocester the kings true vncle, at Burie, it hath bene laboured, studied, and conspired, to haue destroyed and murdered the said duke of Yorke, and the issue that it pleased God to send me of the roiall blood, and also of vs the said earles of Marlowe and Salisburie, for none other cause but for the true hart that (God knoweth) we euer haue borne, and beare to the profit of the kings estate, to the common-welfare of the same realme, and defense thereof.

11 Item, how the earles of Shrewesburie and Wilshire, and the lord Beaumont, our mortall and extreme enimies now, and of long time past, hauing the guiding about the most noble person of our said soueraigne lord, whose highnesse they haue restrained a kept from the libertie & freedom that belongeth to his said estate, & the supporters & fauourers of all the promises, would not suffer the kings said good grace to receiue and accept vs, as he would haue done, if he might haue had his owne will, into his said presence, regarding the charge that would haue bene layd vpon them, of the miserie, destruction, and wickednesse of the said realme, whereof they be causes, and not the king, which is himselfe as noble, as vertuous, as righteous and blessed of disposition, as a prince earthly.

12 Item, the earles of Wilshire and Shrewesburie, and the lord Beaumont, not satisfied nor content with the kings possessions and his goods, stirred and excited his said highnesse to hold his parlement at Conentre, where an act is made by their prouocation and labour, against vs the said duke of Yorke, my sonnes March and Rutland, and the earles of Marlowe and Salisburie, and the sonnes of the said earle of Salisburie, & manie other knights and esquires of diuers matters falselie and vntroolie imagined, as they will answer afore almighty God in the daie of iudgement, the which the said earles of Shrewesburie & Wilshire, and the lord Beaumont prouoked to be made, to the intent of our destruction and of our issue, and that they might haue our liuelod and goods, as they haue openlie robbed and despoiled all our places and our tenements, and manie other true men, and now proceed to hanging and drawing of men by tyrannie, and will therein shew the largenesse of their violence and mallice as vengeable as they can, if no remedie be prouided at the kings highnes, whose blessednes is neither assenting nor knowing thereof.

Wherefore, seeing all the said mischieses, bearing also that the French king maketh in his land great assemblie of his people, which is greatlie to be dread for manie causes, purpose yet againe with Gods grace to offer vs to come againe to the said presence of our said soueraigne lord, to open and declare vnto him there, the mischieses aboue declared, and in the name of the land to sue, in as reuerent and lowlie wise as we can, to his said good grace, to haue pittie and compassion vpon his said true subiects, and not to suffer the same mischieses to reigne vpon them. Requiring you in Gods behalfe, and praesing you in our owne, therein to assist vs, doing alwaie the due tie of liege men in our persons to our soueraigne lord, to his estate, prerogatiue, and preheminence, and to the suertie of his most noble person, whereunto we haue euer bene and will be as true as anie of his subiects alieue, whereof we call God, our ladie saint Marie, and all the saints in heauen to witnesse.

13 In the meane time, the earle of Wilshire treasurer of England, the lord Scales & the lord Hungerford went to Newberie, which belonged to the duke of Yorke, and there made inquisition of all them that in anie wise had fauoured the said duke, whereof some were found guiltie, and were drawn, hanged, and quartered, and all the inhabitants of the towne were spoiled of their goods. From thence the earle of Wilshire went to Southampton, where, vnder colour to take the earle of Marlowe, he armed five great carracks of Fene with souldiers, taking vittels of the kings price without payment, and put a great part of his treasure into the said carracks, and after sailed about in the sea, and at last staid into Dutchland, sending backe againe his souldiers into England. Then were the kings priuite scales directed to all bishops, abbats, priors, and other states, to lend the king monie, therewith to wage souldiers to keepe the sea coasts.

After the kings nauie was gained, and his capteins (as before we haue heard) on the sea taken, the lords steng at Calis, being aduertised from the lord Fauconbridge (who after the taking of Pontford laie still in Kent) that the people of that countrie and other parts were altogether bent in their fauour, and no lesse addicted to do them seruice both with bodie and goods, than the Irishmen seemed to be at their receiuing of the said duke of Yorke, and his younger sonne Edmund earle of Rutland, whom they so highly honoured, that they offered to line and die in their quarell] they conceived therevpon so great hope in their friends within the realme, that they determined to passe the sea, and therewith entring their ships with fiftene hundred men landed all at Sandwich.

[But it is to be read in a late writer, that the commons of Kent dreading the like vengeance towards them, as fell vpon them of Newberie, sent priuite messengers to Calis to the foresaid earles, beseeching them in all hast possible to come to their succour. Wherevpon the said earles sent ouer into Kent the lord Fauconbridge, to know if their hands would accord with their words: so that anon the people of Kent and the other shires adioining, resorted to the said lord Fauconbridge in great number. Wherefore when the earles knew the willing harts of those people, they prepared to come into this land. Against whose comming, a long ballet was fired vpon the gates of Canturburie, made in fauour of the duke of Yorke and the said earles, beginning thus: In the daie of fast and spirituall affliction, the celestiaall influence of bodies transitorie, &c.]

Now as they passed through Kent, there came to them the lord Cobham, John Cillford, William Pedh, Robert Horne, and manie other gentlemen; so that before they approached to London, their number was estemed aboue fourtie thousand fighting men, for the same of their landing being once knowen, gentlemen and premen resorted to them out of all the south parts of the realme. Upon which rumor, Thomas lord Scales, a man in great fauour with the king & quene, accompanied with the earle of Kendall a Calceigne, and the lord Louell, resorted to London with a great companie of armed men, declaring to the maior, that their repaire onelie was to defend and keepe the citie from spoile of such traitors as the king was crediblie informed were thither comming. To whom the maior answered, that he needed no fellow helper, either to defend or gouerne the citie to him committed in charge. With which answer the lord Scales and his associats nothing contented, entred into the Tower, daillie deniuing waies how to grieue the citizens, whom he percelued to fauour rather the duke of Yorks part, than the kings.

But shortly after the earles of March and Warwick, and other of their affinitie, came to London, and were of the maior and citizens ioioully receiued, to whome resorted Thomas archbishop of Canturburie, the bishops of London, Lincoln, Salisburie, Ely, and Excester, with manie other prelates and religious persons: amongst whome also was the popes legat to treat of peace, if need so required. Upon good deliberation and aduise had and taken amongst these lords how to go forward with their weightie enterprise, the earles of March and Warwick, William lord Fauconbridge, Henrie lord Bourchier, called earle of Eu, with a great number of men which came out of Kent, Essex, Surrie, and Suffex, to the number (as some writers affirme) of fine and twentie thousand persons, departed from London toward the king lieng at Couentrie, then called the quenes secret harbour, leauing behind them to keepe the Londoners in their promised friendship, the earle of Salisburie, the lord Cobham, and sir John Wenlocke, which toke such order, and watched the gates and entrics on each side so diligetlie, that no succours might come to the lord Scales lodging in the tower; who toke therewith such displeasure, that he shot out his great ordinance against them within the citie, and they likewise shot at him againe, to the hurt and no pleasure of both parts.

The king hauing knowledge of all these doings, assembled a great armie, and accompanied with the duke of Summerfet (latelie come from Gines) and the duke of Buckingham, and diuerse other great lords that toke his part, came to Northampton; where the quene perceluing his puillance to be able to match in fight with the aduersaries, toke vpon hir to encourage hir friends and well-willers: for the king studied of nothing but of peace, quietnesse, and solitarie life. When the whole hoast of the kings part was assembled, the same issued south of the towne, and passing ouer the riuer of Tine, lodged in the new field betwene Harfington and Sandiford; stronglie fencing themselves about with high banks, and deepe trenches. On the other part, the lords being herewith aduanced verie nere the place where the kings people late without Northampton; the bishops that were there with them, by the aduise and consent of the said lords, sent vnto the king the bishop of Salisburie, to vnderstand his mind, and to moue him vnto some treatie of peace, and to admit the archbishop of Canturburie, and the other bishops there present, to be mediators in the matter, that some good accord might be concluded betwixt the parties, so as an vniuersall peace might be restored in all parts through the whole realme.

The bishop of Salisburie doing this message not so circumspectlie as had bene convenient, returned without bringing any towartlie answer, but rather words of high despitte and bitter defiance. For the lords that were about the king, trusting in their warlike engines and strength of place, in which they were incamped, though otherwise inferior in number of men, purposed to abide the brunt of battell; and so led with the spirit of rashnesse, sent none other answer backe againe by the bishop, but continuallous words sounding greatlie to the reproch of their aduersaries; who being fore offended therewith, determined to seeke reuenge with dint of sword. The earle of March as then being in the flour of his lustie and most couragious youth, lieng betwene Toucester and Northampton, determined to set on the kings armie without longer delate: and thereupon in the night season removed his campe toward Northampton, and in marching forward set his men in order of battell: wherof the vanguard was led by the earle of Warwick, which either by strength or stealth wan a street which the lord Beaumont kept, going toward the kings campe; and herewith entering straightlie with his people, began the battell about seauen of the clocke the ninth daie of Iulie. After him folloved the earle of March with the banner of his father. Others write, that the earle of March led the foreward, the earle of Warwick the middleward, and the lord Fauconbridge the reerward.

Howeuer, that Edmund lord Greie of Arthen, who was on the kings side, failed in the trust committed to him: for where the enemies could not without great danger enter vpon the kings campe, by reason of a mightie trench and rampire pight full of piles and sharpe stakes, therewith the campe was compassed about: the said lord Greie came with his men, and with helping hands pulled the enemies vp, and receiued them into the field, where the battell was begun with great force & violence. For being now entred the field, they set vpon the kings people so fiercelie, that it seemed they ment either to obtaine the victorie, or to die for it, euen all the whole number of them. The fight continued right fierse and cruell, with vncerteine victorie, till the houre of nine: at which time the kings armie was discomfited, and of the same slaine and drowned in the ruer, few lesse than ten thousand; and the king himselte left comfortlesse alone was taken by the aduersaries, as a man in great miserie.

At this battell fought at Northampton, were slaine Humfreie duke of Buckingham, John Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, a valiant person, and not degenerating from his noble parents, Thomas lord Egremont, John viscount Beaumont, and sir William Lucie, which made great haff to come to part of the fight, and at his first appoach was stricken in the head with an ar. Besides these that were slaine, manie were taken prisoners, because they left their horses, alighting to fight on foot. The duke of Summerfet, and other, which narrowly escaped, fled with the quene and prince into the bishopricke of Durham. The earles, hauing got the victorie in this bloodie battell, conueied the king to London, and lodged him in the bishops palace. After whose comming to the citie, the Tower was deliuered to the earle of March, vpon a certeine composition; but the lord Scales suspecting the sequele of the deliuerie thereof, toke a wherrie priuillie, intending to haue fled to the quene; but he was espied by diuerse watermen belonging to the earle of Warwick (which waited for his forth comming on the Thames) and suddenly taken, was shortly slaine with manie darts & daggers, and his bodie left naked and all bloodie at the gate of the clinke, and after was buried in the church adjoining.

Then were diuerse persons apprehended, and indicted of treason, wherof some were pardoned, and some executed. Thomas Thoype second baron of the clinke, ber, her, was committed to the Tower, where he remained long after, for that he was knowne to be great friend to the house of Lancaster. ¶ When queene Margaret heard that the R. was taken, she with hir sonne, and eight persons fled to the castell of Harlech in Wales, and was robbed by the waite in Lancashire of all hir goods, to the value of ten thousand markes: from thence she went into Scotland. Thus you see what fruits the tree of ciuill discord doth bring forth; that euill tree, which whilste some haue taken paine to plant, and some to prouine and nourish, for others confusion (to whome they haue giuen a taste of those apples which it bare, far more bitter than colquintida) themselves haue bene forced to take such share as befall them by lot. For as it is not possible that a comon tier, whose heat & flame is vniuersallie spread, should spare any particular place (for so should it not be generall) no more is it likelie that in ciuill commotions, rebellions, insurrections, and partakings in conflicts and pitched felos (speciallie under ringleaders of great countenance and personage, such as be the peres and states of kingdoms) anie one should, though perhaps his life, yet (a thousand to one) not saue his blood vnspilt, nor his goods vnspilled. ¶ During this trouble, a parlement was summoned to begin at Westminster, in the moneth of October next following.

In the meane time the duke of Yorke, aduertised of all these things, sailed from Dublin towards England, and landed at the red banke nere to the citie of Chelser, with no small companie: and from Chelser by long iournies he came to the citie of London, which he entred the fridaie before the feast of S. Edward the Confessor, with a sword borne naked before him, with trumpets also sounding, and accompanied with a great traine of men of armes, and other of his friends and seruants. At his comming to Westminster he entred the palace, and passing forth directlie through the great hall, staied not till he came to the chamber, where the king and lords used to sit in the parlement time, comonlic called the vpper house, or chamber of the peres, and being there entred, stept vp vnto the throneroyal, and there laicng his hand vpon the cloth of estate, seemed as if he meant to take possession of that which was his right (for he held his hand so vpon that cloth a good while) and after withdrawing his hand, turned his face towards the people, beholding their preassing togither, and marking what countenance they made.

Whilste he thus stood and beheld the people, supposing they reioiced to see his presence, the archbishop of Cantuarburie (Thomas Bourcher) came to him, & after due salutations, asked him if he would come and see the king. With which demand he seeming to take disdain, answered brauelie, and in few words thus: I remember not that I know anie within this realme, but that it befometh him rather to come and see my person, than I to go and see his. The archbishop hearing his answer, went backe to the king, and declared what answer he had received of the dukes owne mouth. After the archbishop was departed to the king that late in the quenes lodging, the duke also departed, and went to the most principall lodging that the king had within all his palace, breaking vp the lockes and doores, and so lodged himselfe therein, more like to a king than a duke, continuing in the same lodging for a time to the great indignation of marie, that could not in anie wise like of such presumptuous attempts made by the duke, to thrust himselfe in possession of the crowne, and to depose king Henrie, who had reigned ouer them so long a time.

Maister Edward Hall in his chronicle maketh mention of an oration, which the duke of Yorke uttered, sitting in the regall seat there in the chamber of the peres, either at this his first comming in amongst them, or else at some one time after, the which we haue thought good also to set downe: though Iohn Whethamsted the abbat of saint Albons, who liued in those daies, and by all likelihood was there present at the parlement, maketh no further recitall of anie words, which the duke should vtter at that time in that his booke of records, where he intreateth of this matter. But for the oration (as maister Hall hath written thereof) we find as followeth. ¶ During the time (saith he) of this parlement, the duke of Yorke with a bold countenance entred into the chamber of the peres, and sat downe in the throneroyal, vnder the cloth of estate (which is the kings peculiar seat) and in the presence of the nobilitie, as well spirituall as temporall (after a pause made) he began to declare his title to the crowne, in this forme and order as insueth.

Edw. Hall. in
Hen. 6. fol.
clxxvij, &c.

The duke of Yorke's oration made to the lords of the parlement.

M singular good lords, maruell not that I approach vnto this throne: for I sit here as in the place to me by verie iustice lawfullie belonging; & here I rest, as to whom this chaire of right apperteineth, not as he which requireth of you fauour, partialitie, or bearing, but equall right, friendlie indifferencie, and true administration of iustice. For I being the partie grieved, and complainant, can not minister to my selfe the medicine that should helpe me (as expert leeches & cunning surgians maie) except you be to me both faithfull aiders & also true counsellors. For yet this noble realme and our naturall countrie shall neuer be vnbackled from hir daillie feuer, except I (as the principall physician, and you as the true and trustie apothecaries) consult togither in making of the potion, and trie out the cleane and pure stuffe from the corrupt and putrified drugs.

For vndoubtedlie, the root and bottome of this long festured canker is not yet extirpate, nor the feeble foundation of this fallible building is not yet espied, which hath bene and is the daillie destruction of the nobilitie, and the continuall confusion of the poore communitie of this realme and kingdom. For all you know (or should know) that the high and mightie prince king Richard the second, was the true and vndoubted heire to the valiant conqueror and renowned prince king Edward the third, as sonne & heire to the hardie knight and courageous capteine Edward prince of Wales, duke of Aquitaine and Cornewall, eldest sonne to the said king Edward the third: which king was not onelie in deed, but also of all men reputed and taken for the true and infallible heire to the wife and politike prince king Henrie the third, as sonne and heire to king Edward the second, sonne and heire to king Edward the first, the very heire and first begotten sonne of the said noble and vertuous prince king Henrie the third.

Which

Which king Richard of that name the second, was lawfullie & iustlie possessed of the crowne and diadem of this realme and region, till Henrie of Derby duke of Lancaster and Hereford, sonne to John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, the fourth begotten sonne to the said king Edward the third, and yonger brother to my noble ancestoz Lionell duke of Clarence, the third begotten sonne of the said king Edward, by force and violence, contrarie both to the dutie of his allegiance, and also to his homage to him both done and swozne, raised warre and battell at the castle of Flint in North-wales, against the said king Richard, and him apprehended, and imprisoned within the Tower of London: during whose life and captiuitie, he wrongfullie usurped and intruded vpon the roiall power, and high estate of this realme and region, taking vpon him the name, stile, and authoritie of king and gouernour of the same.

And not therewith satisfied, and contented, compassed and accomplished the death and destruction of his naturall prince, and most worthy soueraigne lord, not as a common homicide and butcherlie murterer, but as a regicide, and destroyer of his king. After whose pitious death, and execrable murder, the right and title of the crowne, and superioritie of this realme was lawfullie reuerted & returned to Roger Mortimer earle of March, sonne and heire to ladie Philip the onelie child of the aboue rehearsed Lionell duke of Clarence, vnto which Rogers daughter called Anne, my most dearest and welbeloued mother, I am the verie true and lineall heire, which descent all you can not iustlie gaine say, nor yet trulie denie. Then remember this, if the title be mine, why am I put from it? If I be true heire to the crowne (as I am indeed) why is my right withholden? If my claime be good, why haue I not iustice? For iustlie, learned men of great science and knowledge say and affirme, that lineall descent, nor usurped possession can nothing preuaile, if continuall claime be lawfullie made, or openlie published.

For the auoiding of which scruple and ambiguitie: Edmund earle of March my most welbeloued vnckle, in the time of the first usurper, in deed but not by right called king Henrie the fourth, by his coslines the earle of Northumberland, & the lord Percie, he being then in captiuitie with Owen Glendouer the rebell in Wales, made his title & righteous claime to the destruction of both the noble persons. Likewise my most dearest lord my father, so farre set forth that right and title, that he lost his life & worldlie toy at the towne of South-hampton, more by power than indifferent iustice. Since whose death, I comming to my full age, haue neuer desisted to pursue my title, and require my right, which by meanes of sinister counsell and vniust detention, I can neither obtaine nor recover. So that of fine force I am compelled to use power in stead of praier, and force in stead of request; not (as I said before) for my priuat emolument and peculiar profit: but to restore peace, loue, and quietnesse to this our naturall region, which ever since the first vngodlie usurpation of the aforesaid Henrie, vnrulie called king Henrie the fourth, hath bene clerelie banished, and out of the same vniustlie exiled.

What murders and manslaughters haue bene perpetrated and committed within this countrie, since the beginning of that vngodly usurpation: What number of noble men haue bene slaine, destroyed, & executed since that infortunate daie: It is too lamentable and manifest. For although Henrie of Lancaster earle of Derby toke vpon him the scepter and the crowne, and wrongfullie bare the name and stile of a king; and was not much tickled with mine vnckle the earle of March, at that time being within age: yet was he neuer in suertie of himselfe, nor had or ioined any profit & quietnesse either in mind or in bodie. For suerlie, a corrupt conscience neuer sleeeth rest, but looketh when the sword of vengeance will descend and strike. His sonne also called king Henrie the fifth, obtained notable victories, and immortal praises for his noble acts done in the realme of France: yet God (for the offense of his vnrue parent) suddenlie touched him, vnbodieng his soule in the flower of his youth, and in the glorie of his conquest.

And although he had a faire sonne and a yong heire apparant: yet was this orphan such a one (as preachers say) that God threarned to send for a punishment to his vnrulie and vngodly people, sauing by his prophet Euseb: I shall giue you children to be your princes, and infants without wisdom shall haue the gouernance of you. The prophet lied not, if you note all things in an order: for after this Henrie the fifth (whose fame no man can iustlie reprocure or deface) succeeded his sonne, whom all we haue called our naturall prince, and obeyed as his heire. In whose time and wrongfull reigne, I require you diligently to consider, with what great tormentes and afflictions God hath whipped & scourged this miserable Ile: yea with such and so manie scourges and plagues, as no nation (the Egyptians onelie excepted) were ever tormented or afflicted withall. I will not speake of rebellious murders and oppressions, which of late haue bene done and exercised here among vs. But I will declare & manifest to you, how the crowne and glorie of this realme is by the negligence of this sillie man, and his vnrulie counsell diminished, defaced, and also dishonoured.

Is not Normandie, which his father gat, regained & conquered againe, by the insolencie of him & his couetous counsell: Is not the whole duchie of Aquitaine, by two hundred and odde years peaceable possessed by the kings of this realme, in one yeare and a little more, gotten out of our hands & seigniozie: What should I speake of Anjou & Maine, or the losse of the Ile of France, with the rich citie of Paris. Alas it is too apparant. Neither will I molest you with the recitall of all the particulars thereof. But now in the midst of this affliction, and to make an end of the same: God of his ineffable goodnesse, looking on this countrey with his eyes of pitie & mercie, hath sent me in the truth, to restore againe his decayed kingdome to his ancient fame and old renowne whereof here in open parlement, according to my iust & true title, I haue and doe take possession of this roiall throne: not putting diffidence, but firme hope in Gods grace, that by his diuine aid, and assistance of you the pates of this realme, I shall beautifie & mainteine the same to the glorie of him, honour of my bloud, and to the publike wealth as well of you all here present, as of all the poore commons and subiects of this kingdome and regment.

When the duke had made an end of his oration, the lords sat still as men stricken into a certeine amazednesse, neither whispering nor speaking forth a word, as though their mouthes had bene sewed vp. The duke not verie well content with their silence, aduised them to comfort thoroughlie, and ponder the whole effect of his words and sayings: and so neither fullie displeased, nor yet altogether content, departed to his lodging in the kings palace. While he was declaring thus his title in the higher house among the pates, there happened a strange chance in the verie same, instant amongst the commons in the nether house. A crowne which did hang in the middle of the same to garnish a branch to set lights vpon, without touch of man, or blast of wind, suddenlie fell downe. About the same time also fell downe the crowne which stood on the top of Dover castell. Which chances were construed to be signes, that the crowne of the realme should some waie haue a fall.

The lords forgot not the dukes demand, and to take some direction therein, diuerse of them, as spirituall and tempozall, with manie graue and sage persons of the commonaltie daile assembled at the Blackefriers, and other places, to treat of this matter, being of so great importance. During which time the duke of Yorke, although he and the king were both lodged in the palace of Westminster: yet would he not for anie prayers or requests once visit the king, till some conclusion were taken in this matter: saying, that he was subiect to no man, but only to God, vnder whose mercie none here superiour but he. The king of Scots, partlie incouraged thorough the ciuill discord here in England, and partlie for the displeasure which he had conceived for the death of Edmund duke of Summerset his mothers brother, this yeare besieged the castell of Roxburgh: and by the breaking of a bombard, as the same was shot off against the castell, he chanced to be slaine. Yet the Scots left not off their enterprise, assaulting the castell till they gat it, and then defended it a long time after, till Richard duke of Gloucester wan it againe, and rased it.

After long debating of the matter, and deliberate consultation amongst the pates, prelates, and commons, vpon the bigill of All saints, it was concluded: for so much as king Henrie had bene taken as king by the space of thirtie and eight yeares and more, that he should introy the name and title of king, and haue possession of the realme during his naturall life. And if he either died, or resigned, or forfeited the same, by breaking or going against anie point of this concord, then the said crowne & authoritie roiall should immediatlie be deuoluted and come to the duke of Yorke, if he then liued; or else to the next heire of his linage. And that the duke of Yorke from thence forth should be protector and regent of the land. This was the determination of the parlement to & fro, tending to peace betwene the king & the duke (which was ratified accordingly) as by the articles insuing dooth appeare.

The articles betwixt king Henrie and the duke of Yorke.

Blessed be Iesu, in whose hands and bountie resteth and is the peace and unitie betwixt princes, and the weale of euerie realme: by whose direction (I know) agreed it is, appointed, and accorded as followeth, betwixt the most high and most mightie prince king Henrie the first king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, on the one partie, and the right high & mightie prince Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke on the other partie: vpon certeine matters of variance moued betwixt them, and especiallie vpon the claime and title vnto the crownes of England and of France, and roiall power, estate, and dignitie appertaining to the same, and lordship of Ireland, opened, shelded, and declared by the said duke, before all the lords spirituall and tempozall, being in this present parlement.

First, where the said Richard duke of Yorke hath declared and opened (as is aboue said) title & claime in maner as followeth.

That the right noble and worthy prince, Henrie king of England the third had issue, and lawfullie got Edward the first begotten sonne, borne at Westminster, the fifteenth kalends of Iulie, in the yeare of our Lord 1239, & Edmund his second sonne which was borne on St. Marcells daie, the yere 1200, the which Edward, after the death of king Henrie his father, intituled & called king Edward the first, had issue, Edward his first begotten sonne, called (after the deceasse of his father) king Edward the second, the which had issue, Edward the third: which Edward the third had issue, Edward prince of Wales; William of Hatfield his second sonne; Lionell the third, duke of Clarence; John of Gaunt fourth, duke of Lancaster; Edmund of Langley fifth, duke of Yorke; Thomas of Woodstoke first, duke of Gloucester; and William of Windsor, seauenth.

The said Edward prince of Wales, which died in the life time of his father, had issue Richard, which succeeded Edward the third his grandsire; Richard died without issue; William of Hatfield the second sonne of Edward the third, died without issue; Lionell the third sonne of Edward the third, duke of Clarence, had issue Philip his daughter and heire, which was coupled in matrimonie vnto Edmund Mortimer earle of March, and had issue Roger Mortimer earle of March his sonne and heire; which Roger had issue of Edmund erle of March, Roger Mortimer, Anne, Eleanor; which Edmund, Roger, and Eleanor died without issue.

And the said Anne coupled in matrimonie to Richard earle of Cambridge, the sonne of Edmund of Langley, the first sonne of Henrie the third, and had issue Richard Plantagenet, commonlie called duke of Yorke; John of Gaunt, the fourth sonne of Edward, and the younger brother of the said Lionell, had issue Henrie earle of Derby, who incontinentlie after that king Richard resigned the crownes of the realmes realmes and lordship of Ireland, butrighteouslie entered vpon the same, then being alue Edmund Mortimer earle of March, sonne to Roger Mortimer earle of March, sonne and heire of the said Philip, daughter and heire of the said Lionel, the third sonne of the said king Edward the third, to the which Edmund the right and title of the said crownes and lordship by law and custome belonged. To the which Richard duke of Yorke, as sonne to Anne daughter to Roger Mortimer earle of March, sonne and heire of the said Philip, daughter and heire of the said Lionel, the third sonne of king Edward the third, the right, title, dignitie roiall, and estate of the crownes of the realmes of England and France, and the lordship of Ireland pertaineth and belongeth afore anie issue of the said John of Gaunt, the fourth sonne of the same king Edward.

The said title notwithstanding, and without presumption of the said Richard duke of Yorke, tenderlie desiring the wealth, rest, and prosperitie of this land, and to set apart all that might be trouble to the same, and considering the possession of the said king Henrie the first, and that he hath for his time bene named, taken, and reputed for king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, is contented, agreed, and consenteth, that he be had, reputed, and taken for king of England and France, with the roiall estate, dignitie, and preheminance belonging thereunto, and lord of Ireland during his naturall life. And for that time, the said duke, without hurt or prejudice of his said right, and title, shall take, worship, and honour him for his soueraigne lord.

Item, the said Richard duke of Yorke, shall promise and bind him by his solemne oth, in maner and forme as followeth.

The oth of Richard duke
of Yorke.

In the name of God Amen: I Richard duke of Yorke, promise and swear by the faith and truth that I owe to almighty God, that I shall neuer consent, procure, or stirre, directlie or indirectlie, in p'sente or apert, neither (as much as in me is) shall suffer to be done, consented, procured, or stirred, anie thing that may found to the abridgement of the naturall life of king Henrie the first, or to the hurt or diminishing of his reigne or dignitie roiall, by violence, or anie other waie, against his freedom or libertie: but if any person or persons would do or presume anie thing to the contrarie, I shall with all my might and power withstand it, and make it to be withstood, as far as my power will stretch thereunto, to helpe me God and his holie euangelists.

Item, Edward earle of March, and Edmund earle of Rutland, sonnes of the said duke of Yorke, shall make like oth.

Item, it is accorded, appointed, and agreed, that the said Richard duke of Yorke, shall be called and reputed from henceforth, verie and rightfull heire to the crownes, roiall estate, dignitie and lordship aboue said; and after the deceasse of the said king Henrie, or when he will laie from him the said crownes, estate, dignitie, and lordship, the said duke and his heires shall immediatlie succeed to the said crownes, roiall estate, dignitie and lordship.

Item, the said Richard duke of Yorke, shall haue by authoritie of this present parlement, castles, manors, lands, and tenements, with the wards, marriages, relieves, seruices, fines, amercements, offices, aduousons, fees, and other appurtenances to them belonging, what soeuer they be, to the peacelie value of ten thousand marks; ouer all charges and repises, whereof five thousand marks shall be to his owne state, three thousand five hundred marks to Edward his first begotten sonne earle of March for his estate, and one thousand pounds to Edmund earle of Rutland his second sonne for his peacelie sustentation, in such consideration and such intent as shall be declared by the lords of the kings council.

Item, if anie person or persons imagine or compass the death of the said duke, and thereof probable be attainted of open deed done by folkes of other condition, that it be deemed & aduinged high treason.

Item, for the more establishing of the said accord, it is appointed and consented, that the lords spiritual and temporal, being in this present parlement, shall make oths, to accept, take, worship, and repute the said Richard duke of Yorke and his heires, as aboue is rehearsed, and keepe, obserue, and strengthen (in as much as apperteineth vnto them) all the things abovesaid, and resist to their power, all them that would presume the contrarie, according to their estates and degrees.

Item, the said Richard duke of Yorke, earles of March, and Rutland, shall permit and make othe to helpe, aid, and defend the said lords, and euerie of them, against all those that will quarrell, or anie thing attempt against the said lords, or anie of them, by occasion of agreement or consenting to the said accord, or assistance giuing to the duke and earles, or anie of them.

Item, it is agreed and appointed, that this accord, and euerie article thereof, be opened and notified by the kings letters patents, or otherwise, at such times and places, and in maner as it shall be thought expedient to the said Richard duke of Yorke, with the aduise of the lords of the kings council. The king vnderstandeth certeinlie the said title of the said Richard duke of Yorke, iust, lawfull, and sufficient, by the aduise and assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this parlement assembled; and by authoritie of the same parlement declareth, approueth, ratifieth, confirmeth, and accepteth the said title, iust, good, lawfull, and true, and thereunto giueth his assent and agreement of his free will and libertie.

And ouer that, by the said aduise and authoritie declareth, intituleth, calleth, establisheth, affirmeth, & reputeth the said Richard duke of Yorke, verie true and rightfull heire to the crownes, roiall estate, and dignitie of the realmes of England and of France, and of the lordship of Ireland abovesaid; and that according to the worship and reuerence that thereto belongeth, he be taken, accepted and reputed, in worship & reuerence, by all the states of the said realme of England, and of all his subiects thereof; saving and ordeining by the same authoritie, the king to haue the said crownes, realme, roiall estate, dignitie, and preheminance of the same, and the said lordship of Ireland during his life naturall.

And furthermore, by the same aduise and authoritie willet, consenteth and agreeth, that after his deceasse, or when it shall please his highnesse to laie from him the said crownes, estate, dignitie, and lordship, the said Richard duke of Yorke and his heires shall immediatlie succeed him in the said crownes, roiall estate, dignitie, and lordship, and them then haue and inioie: anie act of parlement, statute, or ordinance, or other thing to the contrarie made, or interruption, or discontinuance of possession notwithstanding.

And moreover, by the said aduise and authoritie, establisheth, granteth, confirmeth, approueth, ratifieth, and accepteth the said accord, and all things therein contained, and thereunto free and absolute assenteth, agreeth; and by the same aduise and authoritie ordeineth and establisheth, that if anie person or persons imagine or compass the death of the said duke, & probable be attainted of open deed done by folkes of that condition, that it be deemed and aduinged high treason.

And

And further more ordeineth and establissheth by the said aduise and authoritie, that all statutes, ordinaunces, and acts of parlement, made in the time of the said king Henrie the fourth, by the which he and the heires of his bodie, comming of Henrie late king of England the first, the sonne and heire of the said king Henrie the fourth, and the heires of king Henrie the fifth, were or be inheritable to the said crownes and realmes, or to the heritage of the same, be annulled, repealed, damned, cancelled, void, and of none effect.

And ouer this, the king by the said aduise, assent and authoritie, ordeineth and establissheth, that all other acts and statutes made afore this time by act of parlement, not repealed or annulled by like authoritie, or otherwise void, be in such force, effect, and vertue, as they were afore the making of these ordinaunces; and that no letters patents, roialr of recozd, nor acts iudiciall, made or done afore this time not repealed, reversed, ne otherwise void by law, be prejudiced or hurt by this present act.]

This agreement put in articles, was ingrossed, sealed, and sworne vnto by the two parties, and also enacted in the parlement. For soþ whereof the king, hauing in his companie the duke of Yorke, rood to the cathedrall church of saint Paule in London, and there on the day of All saints with the crowne on his head went solemnelie in procession, and was lodged a good space after in the bishops palace, nere to the said church. And vpon the saturdaye next ensuing, Richard duke of Yorke was by sound of trumpet solemnelie proclaimed heire apparant to the crowne of England, and protectour of the realme. After this, the parlement kept at Couentrie the last yeare, was declared to be a diuellish counsell, and onelie had for destruction of the nobilitie, and was indeed no lawfull parlement: bicause they which were returned, were neuer elected according to the due order of the law, but secretlie named by them which desired rather the destruction than the aduancement of the common-wealth. When these agreements were enacted, the king dissolued his parlement, which was the last parlement that euer be ended.

The duke of Yorke, well knowing that the queene would spurne against all this, caused both hir and hir sonne to be sent for by the king. But she as wout rather to rule, than to be ruled, and thereto counselled by the dukes of Excester and Summerfet, not onelie denied to come, but also assembled a great armie, intending to take the king by fine force out of the lords hands. The protectour in London, hauing knowledge of all these doings, assigned the duke of Norfolk, and erle of Warwicke his trustie frends to be about the king, while he with the earles of Salisburie and Rutland, and a convenient number departed out of London the second date of Decemder northward, and appointed the erle of March his eldest sonne to follow him with all his power. The duke came to his castell of Sandall beside Wakefield on Chylmasse euen, there began to make muster of his tenants and frends. The queene thereof ascertained, determined to cope with him yer his succour were come.

Soþ the, hauing in hir companie the prince hir sonne, the dukes of Excester and Summerfet, the erle of Devonshire, the lord Clifford, the lord Roos, and in effect all the lords of the north parts, with eightene thousand men, or (as some write) two and thierthe thousand, marched from Yorke to Wakefield, and had bafe to the duke, euen before his castell gates. He hauing with him not fullie five thousand persons, contrarie to the minds of his faithfull counsellors, would needs issue forth to fight with his enemies. The duke of Summerfet and the queenes part, casting vpon their most aduantage, appointed the lord Clifford to lie in one scale, and the erle of Warwicke in another, and the duke with other to keepe the maine battell. The duke of Yorke with his people descended downe the hill in good order and arraie, and was suffered to passe on towards the maine battell.

But when he was in the plaine field betwene his castell and the towne of Wakefield, he was inuironed on cuerie side, like fish in a net, so that though he fought manfullie, yet was he within halfe an houre slaine and dead, and his whole armie discomfited: with him died of his trustie frends, his two ballard vnckles, sir John and sir Hugh Spottimers, sir Dauid Hall, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Thomas Penill, William and Thomas Aspre, both brethren; and two thousand and eight hundred others, whereof manie were yong gentlemen, and heires of great parentage in the south parts, whose kin reuenged their deaths with in foure moneths next, as after shall appeare.

In this conflict was wounded and taken prisoner, Richard erle of Salisburie, sir Richard Limbycke, Rafe Stanleie, John Barow, capteine Hanston, and diuerse others. The lord Clifford, perceluing where the erle of Rutland was conueied out of the field (by one of his fathers chapleins, and scholemaster to the same erle) and ouertaking him, stabbed him to the heart with a dagger as he kneeled afore him. This erle was but a childe at that time of twelue yeares of age, whome neither his tender yeares, nor dolorous countenance, with holding vp both his hands for mercie (for his speech was gone for feare) could moue the cruell heart of the lord Clifford to take pitie vpon him, so that he was noted of great infamie for that his vnnmercifull murder vpon that yong gentleman.

But the same lord Clifford not satisfied herewith, came to the place where the dead corpe of the duke of Yorke lay, caused his head to be striken off, and set on it a crowne of paper, fixed it on a pole, and presented it to the queene, not lieng farre from the field, in great despise, at which great reioising was shewed: but they laughed then that shortly after lamented, and were glad then of other mens deaths that knew not their owne to be so nere at hand. Some write that the duke was taken alive, and in derision caused to stand vpon a molehill, on whose heape they put a garland in stead of a crowne, which they had fashioned and made of sedges or bulrushes; and hauing so crowned him with that garland, they kneeled downe afore him (as the Jewes did vnto Chyl in scozne, sayeng to him; Haile king without rule, haile king without heritage, haile duke and prince without people or possessions. And at length hauing thus scorned him with these and diuerse other the like despitefull wordes, they stroke off his head, which (as we haue heard) they presented to the queene.

Spanie deemed that this miserable end chanced to the duke of Yorke, as a due punishment for breaking his oth of allegiaunce vnto his soueraigne lord king Henrie: but others held him discharged thereof, bicause he obtained a dispensation from the pope, by such suggestion as his procurators made vnto him, whereby the same oth was adindged void, as that which was decreid vniuersedlie, to the prejudice of himselfe, and disheritting of all his posteritie. After this victorie by the queene, the erle of Salisburie and all the prisoners were sent to Pomfret, and there beheaded, whose heads (together with the duke of Yorkes head) were conueied to Yorke, and there set on poles ouer the gate of the citie, in despise of them and their linage. The erle of March, now after the death of his father, berie duke of Yorke, lieng at Glocester, was wonderfullie amazed, when the sorrowfull newes of these mishaps came vnto him: but after after comfort giuen to him by his faithfull louers and assured allies, he remoued to Shrewesburie, declaring to the inhabitants of that towne, and to them of the other townes in those parties the murder of his father, the icopardie of himselfe, and the present ruine of the common-wealth.

The people on the marches of Wales, for the fauour which they bare to the Mortimers linage, more gladlie offered him their aid and assistance than he could desire the same; so that he had incontinentlie a puissant armie, to the number of thre and twentie thousand, readie to go against the queene, and the murderers of his father. But when he was setting forward, newes was brought to him, that Jasper earle of Penbroke halfe brother to king Henrie, and James Butler earle of Ormonde and Wiltshire, had assembled a great number of Welsh and Irish people to take him: he here with quickned, retired backe and met with his enemies in a faire plaine, nere to Mortimers crosse, not far from Hereford east, on Candlemasse daie in the morning. At which time the sunne (as some write) appeared to the earle of March like thre sunnes, and suddenlie ioined altogether in one. Upon which sight he took such courage, that he fiercelie setting on his enemies, put them to flight: and for this cause men imagined, that he gaue the sunne in his full brightnesse for his badge or cognisance. Of his enemies were left dead on the ground thre thousand and eight hundred.

The earles of Penbroke and Wiltshire fled, but sir Owen Treuther father to the said earle of Penbroke (which Owen had married king Henries mother, as ye haue heard before) with David Floit, Morgan ap Ikeneth, and diuerse other were taken, and beheaded at Hereford. The queene neuer thelesse encouraged by his late victorie, with a multitude of northerne people, marched toward London, intending to bind all that had bene ordeined in the last parlement. These northerne people, after they were once passed ouer the riuer of Trent, spoiled and wasted the countrie afore them, in maner as if they had bene in the land of forren enemies. At length, they approached to saint Albons, hearing that the duke of Northfolke, and the earle of Warwicke, with other whome the duke of Yorke had left to gouerne the king in his absence, had (by the kings assent) assembled a great host, and were incamped nere to that towne.

Those northerne lords and other that were with the queene, made forward, and entring into S. Albons, meant to passe through the towne, and so to coape with their enemies; but finding a sort of archers ranged nere to the great crosse in the market place, to defend their passage, they were receiued with such a storme of arrowes, which came shing about their eares as thicke as haile, that they were quicklie repelled backe, and with losse begun to retire in hast vnto the west end of the towne; where, by a lane that leadeth northwards vnto saint Peters street, they made their entrie, and had there also a sharpe encounter against certaine bands of the kings people. But after great slaughter on both parts, they got through, and vpon the heath that lieth at the north end of the towne, called Barnard heath, they had a farre greater conflict with foure or fise thousand of the kings armie, that seemed as they had bene auant couriers.

These gaue the order so fiercelie at the beginning, that the victorie rested doubtfull a certaine time, so that if the easterne and southerne men had continued as they began, the first had bene theirs; but after they had stood to it a pretty while, and perceiued none of their fellows from the great armie to come and assist them, they began to faint, and turning their backes, fled amaine ouer hedge and ditch, through thicke and thin woods and bushes, seeking so to escape the hands of their cruell enemies that followed them with eger minds, to make slaughter vpon them, namelie the northerne pickers, now in the chase pursued most hotlie, and bare downe manie, and more had done, if the night comming vpon, had not staied them.

When the daie was closed, those that were about the king (in number a twentie thousand) hearing how euill their fellows had sped, began bitterlie to despaire of the victorie, and so fell without anie long tarriance to running awaie. By reason whereof, the nobles that were about the king, perceiuing how the game went, and withall saw no comfort in the king, but rather a god will and affection towards the contrarie part, they withdrew also, leaving the king accompanied with the lord Bonneville, & sir Thomas Kiriell of Kent; which vpon assurance of the kings promise, tarried still with him, and fled not. But their trust deceived them, for at the queenes departing from saint Albons, they were both beheaded; though contrarie to the mind and promise of hir husband, Sir Thomas Thorpe baron of the exchequer, was also beheaded the same daie, at Highgate, by the commons of Kent.

Such was the successe of this second battell fought at S. Albons, vpon Shrouetuesdaie, the seventeenth of Februarie, in which were slaine thre and twentie hundred men, of whom no noble man is remembered, saue sir John Craie, which the same daie was made knight, with twelue other, at the village of Colneie. Now after that the noble men and other were fled, and the king left in maner alone without anie power of men to gard his person, he was counselled by an esquier called Thomas How, a man well languaged, and well sene in the lawes, to send some conuenient messenger to the northerne lords, aduertising them, that he would now gladlie come vnto them (whome he knew to be his verie friends, and had assembled themselves together for his seruice) to the end he might remaine with them, as before he had remained vnder the gouernment of the southerne lords.

According to the aduise and counsell of this esquier, the king thought it good to send vnto them, and withall appointed the same esquier to beare the message, who first went and declared the same vnto the earle of Northumberland, and returning backe to the king, brought certaine lords with him, who conuied the king first vnto the lord Cliffords tent, that stood next to the place where the kings people had incamped. This done, they went and brought the queene and hir sonne prince Edward vnto his presence, whome he tofullie receiued, embracing and kissing them in most louing wise, and yielding hartie thanks to almightie God, whome it had pleased thus to strengthen the forces of the northerne men, to restore his dearelie beloued and onelie sonne againe into his possession. Thus was the queene fortunate in hit two battels, but vnfortunate was the king in all his enterprises: for where his person was present, the victorie still fled from him to the contrarie part. The queene caused the king to dub hir sonne prince Edward a knight, with thirtie other persons, which the day before fought on his side against his part.

This done, they went to the abbrie, where of the abbat and monks they were receiued with hymnes and songs, and so brought to the high altar, and after to the chyrche, and so to the chamber in which the king was wont to lodge. The abbat made sute that order might be taken to restraine the northerne men from spoiling the towne: and proclamation indeed was made to that effect, but it auailed not: for they maine

But now before we proceed anie further, sith the reigne of king Henrie maie seme here to take end, we will specifie some such learned men as liued in his time. John Leland, surnamed the elder (in respect of the other John Leland, that painefull antiquarie of our time) wrote diuerse treatises, for the instruction of grammarians; John Hainton, a Carmelit or white frier (as they called them) of Lincoln; Robert Colman, a Franciscane frier of Norwich, and chancelor of the vniuersitie of Wrenford; William White a priest of Kent, professing the doctrine of Wickliffe, and forsaking the order of the Romane church, married a wife, but continued his office of preaching, till at length, in the yeare 1428, he was apprehended, and by William bishop of Norwich, and the doctors of the friers mendicants, charged with thirtie articles, which he maintained, contrary to the doctrine of the Romane church, and in September the same yeare suffered death by fire.

Alexander Carpenter, a learned man, set forth a booke called Destructorium vitiorum, wherein he inuicteth against the prelates of the church of that time, for their crueltie vsed, in persecuting the poore and godlie christians; Richard Kendall, an excellent grammarian; John Wate, warden of the white friers in Poike, but borne in the borders of Wales, an excellent philosopher, and a diuine, he was also sene in the Greeke tong, a thing rare in those daies; Peter Basset, esquier of the priue chamber to king Henrie the sixt, whose life he wrote; John Pole a priest, that wrote the life of saint Alburgh, daughter to one Richard, a noble man of this realme of England, which Alburgh (as he affirmeth) builded our ladie church in Antwerpe; Thomas Ismaelit, a monke of Shion; Walter Hilton, a Chartreux monke also of Shiene, either of those wrote certeine treatises full of superstition, as Iohn Bale noteth.

Thomas Walden so called of the towne where he was borne, but his fathers surname was Better, a white frier of London, and the thre and twentieth prouinciall gouernour of his order, a man vndoubtedlie learned, and thoughtlie furnished with cunning of the scholes, but a soe enimie to them that professed the doctrine of Wickliffe, writing sundrie great volumes and treatises against them, he died at Rone in Normandie, the second of Nouember, in the yeare one thousand foure hundred and thirtie; Richard Allerson, borne in Lancashire, wrote diuerse treatises of diuinitie; Peter Clarke, a student in Wrenford, and a defensor of Wickliffes doctrine, whereupon when he feared persecution here in England, he fled into Boheme, but yet at length he was apprehended by the imperialists, and died for it, as some write, but in what order, is not expressed.

Robert Houndlow, a religious man of an house in Houndlow beside London, whereof he took his surname; Thomas Walsingham, borne in Norfolk, in a towne there of the same name, but professed a monke in the abbeye of saint Albons, a diligent historiographer; John Elneie, a white frier of Portsmouth, but a student in Cambridge, and proued an excellent diuine; Richard Fleming, a doctor of diuinitie in Wrenford, of whome more at large before, pag. 604. John Low borne in Worcester-shire, an Augustine frier, a doctor of diuinitie, and prouinciall in England of his order, and by king Henrie the first, made first bishop of saint Asaph, and after removed from thence to Rochester; Thomas Kingsford the younger, not the same that was bishop, but a doctor of the law, and vicar of Spildenhall in Suff-folke, a notable preacher, and wrote diuerse treatises.

John Felton, a doctor of diuinitie of Badgden college in Wrenford; Nicholas Bostelham, a Carmelit frier borne in Cambridgeshire, and student first in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, and after in Paris, where he proceeded doctor of diuinitie; Thomas Rusburne, a monke of Winchester, and an historiographer; John Holboke, borne in Surrie, a great philosopher, and well sene in the mathematiks; Peter Paine, an earnest professor of Wickliffes doctrine, and fearing persecution here in England, fled into Boheme, where he remained in great estimation for his great learning & no lesse wisdom; Nicholas Wpton, a ciuilian, wrote of heraldrie, of colours in armorie, and of the dutie of chualrie; William Beckeleie, a Carmelit frier of Sandwich, & warden of the house there, a diuine, and professed degree of schole in Cambridge; John Tope, a Carmelit frier of Norwich.

John Capgrauie borne in Kent, an Augustine frier, proceeded doctor of diuinitie in Wrenford, was admitted prouinciall of his order, and proued (without controuersie) the best learned of anie of that order of friers here in England, as Iohn Bale affirmeth, he wrote manie notable volumes, and finally departed this life at Lin in Norfolk, the twelfth of August, in the yere 1464, which was in the fourth yeare of king Edward the fourth; Humfre duke of Gloucester, earle of Denbroke, and lord chamberlaine of England, also protector of the realme, during the minoritye of his nepheue king Henrie the first, was both a great fauourer of learned men, and also verie well learned himselfe, namelie in astrologie, whereof (beside other things) he wrote a speciall treatise intituled, Tabula directionum.

John Wethamsted, otherwise called Frumentarius, was abbat of saint Albons, and highlie in fauor with the good duke of Gloucester last remembred, he wrote diuerse treatises, and among others, a booke as it were of the records of things, chancing whilest he was abbat, which booke I haue sene, and partlie in some parcell of this kings time haue also followed; Roger Onleie, borne in the west countrie (as Bale thinketh) was accused of treason, for practising with the ladie Cleane Cobham, by sorcerie to make the king awaie, and was thereof condemned, and died for it, though he were innocent thereof, as some haue thought, he wrote a treatise intituled, Contra vulgi superstitiones, also another De succumcentis; Nicholas Cantlow, a Welshman borne, descended of an ancient familie in Southwales, as by Bale it shoulde appeare, he became a frier Carmelit in Wiltow; Henrie Walsingham, a Carmelit frier of Norwich, a notable diuine, a great preacher, and wrote also sundrie treatises of diuinitie.

John Lidgate, a monke of Burie, an excellent poet, and chiefe in his time in that facultie, of all other that practised the same within this land, he travelled thorough France and Italie to learne the languages and sciences, how greatlie he profited in attaining to knowledge, the workes which he wrote do sufficientlie testifie; Nicholas Hoftresham, an excellent physician; John Blackenete, a religious man, of the order of the Trinitie intituled, De redemptione captiuorum, and prior of an house of the same order at Ingham in Norfolk, he was surnamed Blackenete, of the towne where he was borne; Thomas Beckington, bishop of Bath, wrote against the law Salique, by which law the Frenchmen would exclude the princes of this realme from their title vnto the crowne of France; John Waringham, a Carmelit frier of Gipefwich in Suffolk; David Bois, borne in Wales, and a frier Carmelit, wrote resided in Glocester, a doctor of diuinitie.

John Bome, an Augustine frier; Michaell Trigue, a Cornishman borne, whose for his excellencie and learning, king Henrie the first appointed to be gouernour of that schole of vniuersitie, which he instituted in the citie of Caen in Normandie, after he had brought it vnder his subiection; John Amundham, a monke of saint Albons; Oswald Angliensis, a monke of the Chartreux order; John Keningale, a Carmelit frier of Pozwicz; Peter De sancta fide, a Carmelit also of Pozwicz; Reginald Pecocke, bishop of Chichester, of whose ye haue heard before, he was borne in Wales, and student in a scholl college in Drenford, where he proceeded doctor of diuinitie, he wrote manie treatises touching the christian religion; John surnamed Burie of the towne where he was borne, an Augustine frier in the towne of Clare in Suffolke.

Robert Fleming, a man perfect in the Greeke and Latine tong [among whose works some haue bene seene vnder these titles: namely, Lacubrationum Tiburtinarum lib. 1. a dictionarie in Greeke and Latine, and a worke in verse of sundrie kinds, this man was of most fame in the yeare of our Lord 1470, which was in the tenth yeare of Edward the fourth, though he were not obscure also in the daies of this Henrie the first; Thomas Gascoigne, borne at Dunstete in Pozkeshire, of that worshipfull familie of the Gascoignes there, a doctor of diuinitie, and chancellor of the vniuersitie of Drenford; William Stapilhart, borne in Kent, but by profession a white frier in London; Robert Ffymingham borne in Pozffolke a Franciscan frier in Pozwicz; Nicholas Pontacute, an historiographer; John Chandler, chancellor of Welles; William Botoner, descended of a good house, a knight by degree, and borne in Wiltow, beric studious in antiquities, and other sciences.

 John Stow, a monke of Pozwicz, but student in Drenford, where he proceeded doctor of diuinitie; Thomas Langley, a monke of Hulme; Nicholas Bungeie, borne in a towne of Pozffolke of that name, wrote an historie, called Adunationes chroniconum; Henrie Beaufort, bishop of Winchester, base sonne to John duke of Lancaster, of whose before we haue made sufficient mention, made cardinall by pope Martine the fourth, in the yeare 1426; Adam Homlington, a Carmelit frier; William Coppinger, maister of the vniuersitie of Drenford; Thomas Stacte, an expert mathematician, and no lesse skilfull in astronomie; John Talangerne, a monke of Worcester; William Sutton, an astrologian; Robert Ballacke, wrote a booke intituled De remilitari, that is to saie, of warre or chualrie, so that (as is thought) he was both a good souldier, and a painefull student of god letters.

Thomas Wando, a Carmelit frier of Parleburgh, he wrote the life of Alfhred king of west Saxons; William Graie, borne of the noble house of the Grates of Cobnor, he went to attaine to some excellencie of learning in Italle, where he heard that noble cleark Chuarinus Monensis read in Ferrara, he was preferred to the bishopricke of Celie, in the yeare 1454, by pope Nicholas the first, when Thomas Bourchier was translated from thence to Canturburie; John Kempe, archbishop of Pozke, and after removed from thence to Canturburie (as before ye haue heard) he was made cardinall of St. Albin, by pope Eugenie the fourth; Adam Molins (as Bale calleth him) keeper of the kings priuie seale, excellentie learned, in time of the ciuill warre betwixt king Henrie, and the duke of Pozke, in which he lost his head.

Thomas Chylenden, a doctor, both of the law ciuill and canon, became at length a monke in Canturburie; Robert Bale, surnamed the elder, excellentie learned in the lawes of the realme, recorder of London, gathered as it were a chronicle of the customs, lawes, foundations, changes, restoring magistrats, offices, orders, and publike assemblies of the citie of London, with other matters, touching the perfect description of the same citie; he wrote other works also touching the state of the same citie, and the acts of king Edward the third; he departed this life in the yeare of our Lord 1461, euen about the beginning of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, vnto whom we will now againe returne.

he was conueied to Westminster, and there set in the hall with the scepter roial in his hand, whereto people in great numbers assembled. His claime to the crowne was declared to be by two maner of waies, the first, as sonne and heire to duke Richard his father, right inheritor to the same; the second, by authoritie of parlement, and forfeiture committed by king Henrie. Whereupon it was againe demanded of the commons, if they would admit and take the said erle as their prince and souereigne lord, which all with one voice cried, Pea, pea.

His title declared.

This

The proclamation king.

This part thus plaied, he entered into Westminster church under a canopie with solemne procession, and there as king offered; and herewith taking the homages of all the nobles there present, he returned by water to London, and was lodged in the bishops palace; and on the morrow after, he was proclaimed king by the name of Edward the fourth, throughout the cite. This was in the yeare of the world 5427, and after the birth of our Saviour 1461 after our account, beginning the yeare at Christmasse; but after the usuall account of the church of England 1460, the twentieth of emperor Frederike the thirde; the nine and thirtieth and last of Charles the seventh French king; and first yeare of the reigne of James the third king of Scots.

Whilste these things were adooing in the south parts, king Henrie being in the north countrie, assembled a great armie, trusting (for all this) to subdue his enemies; namelie, with their chiefe ringleader the duke of Yorke was dispatched out of the waie. But he was deceived: for out of the deddsche sprang a branch more mightie than the stem; this Edward the fourth, a prince so highlie fauoured of the people, for his great liberalitie, clemencie, bysight dealing, and courage, that aboue all other, he with them stood in grace alone: by reason whereof, men of all ages and degrees to him daily repaired, some offering themselves and their men to leopord their liues with him, and other plentifullie gaue monie to support his charges, and to mainteine his right.

By which meanes, he gathered together a puissant armie, to the intent by battell (sithens none other waies would serue) at once to make an end of all. So, his armie and all things prepared, he departed out of London the twelke daie of March, and by easie iournies came to the castell of Pomfret, where he rested, appointing the lord Fitz Walter to keepe the passage at Ferrisburgh with a good number of tall men. King Henrie on the other part, hauing his armie in readinesse, committed the gouernance thereof to the duke of Summerfet, the earle of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, as men desiring to reuenge the death of their parents, slaine at the first battell at saint Albons. These capitaine leaving king Henrie, his wife, and sonne, for the most safegard within the cite of Yorke, passed the riuer of Wharfe with all their power, intending to stop king Edward of his passage ouer the riuer of Aire.

And the better to bring that to passe, the lord Clifford determined to make a charge vpon them that kept the passage of Ferrisburgh; and so he departed with his light horsemen from the great armie on the saturday before Palmesundae; and earnestly per his enemies were aware, slue the keepers and wan the bridge. The lord Fitz Walter hearing the noise, suddenly rose out of his bed, and unarmed with a pollax in his hand, thinking that it had bene but a fraie amongst his men, came downe to appease the same; but per he knew what the matter meant was slaine, and with him the bastard of Salisburie brother to the earle of Marlowe, a valiant yong gentleman, and of great audacitie.

When the earle of Marlowe was informed hereof, like a man desperat, he mounted on his backnie, and hasted puffing and blowing to king Edward, saying; Sir, I praye God haue mercie of their soules, which in the beginning of your enterpryse haue lost their liues. And because I see no succors of the world but in God, I remit the vengeance to him our creator and redemer. With that he alighted downe, and slue his horse with his sword, saying; Let him flee that will, for surelie I will tarrie with him that will tarrie with me: and kissed the crosse of his sword as it were for a bow to the promise. King Edward, perceiving the courage of his trustie friend the earle of Marlowe, made proclamation, that all men which were afraid to fight, should depart: and to all those that tarried the battell, he promised great rewards, with addition, that any souldier which voluntarilie would abide, and afterwards, either in or before the fight should come to flee or turne his backe, then he that could kill him, should haue a great reward and double wages.

After this proclamation ended, the lord Fauconbridge, sir Walter Blunt, Robert Horne with the foreward, passed the riuer at Castelford, three miles from Ferrisburgh, intending to haue inuironed the lord Clifford and his companie. But they being thereof aduertised, departed in great hast toward king Henries armie; yet they met with some that they looked not for, & were so trappt per they were aware. For the lord Clifford, either for heat or paine, putting off his gorget, suddenly with an arrow (as some saie) without airhead, was striken into the throte, and immediately rendred his spirit; and the earle of Westmerlands brother, and all his companie almost were there slaine, at a place called Dintingdale, not far from Towton. This end had the lord Clifford, which slue the earle of Rutland kneeling on his knees, whose yong sonne Thomas Clifford was brought by with a shepheard in poore habit, euer in feare to be knowne, till king Henrie the seventh obtained the crowne, by whom he was restored to his name and possessions.

When this conflict was ended at Ferrisburgh, the lord Fauconbridge, hauing the foreward, because the duke of Norfolk was fallen sicke, valiantly by on Palmesundae in the twilght set forth his armie and came to Barton, where he might apparantlie behold the host of his aduersaries, which were accompanied threescore thousand men, and thereof aduertised king Edward, whose whole armie amounted to eight and fortie thousand six hundred and threescore persons: which incontinentlie with the earle of Marlowe set forward, leaving the rereward under the gouernance of sir John Wenlocke, sir John Dingham, and other. And first of all, he made proclamation, that no prisoner should be taken. So the same daie about nine of the clocke, which was the nine and twentieth daie of March, being Palmesundae, both the hostes approached in a faire plaine field, betwene Towton and Barton.

When each part perceived other, they made a great shout; and at the same instant there fell a small drede or snow, which by violence of the wind that blew against them, was driven into the faces of king Henries armie, so that their sight was somewhat dimmed. The lord Fauconbridge, leading his Edwards foreward, caused euery archer vnder his standard to shot one sight (which before he caused them to prouide) and then made them to stand still. The northerne men feeling the shot, but by reason of the sleet, not well knowing the distance betwene them and their enemies, like forward men shot their sheafes arrowes as fast as they might: but all to losse, for they came short of the southerne men by threescore yards.

So their shot almost spent, the lord Fauconbridge marched forward with his archers, which not onelie shot their whole sheafes, but also gathered the arrowes of their enemies, and let a great part lie against their first owners, and suffered a great losse of them to stand, which fore troubled the legs of the northerne men, when the battell joined. The earle of Northumberland and Andrew Trollop, chiefe capitaine of king Henries backward, seeing their shot not to preuaile, hasted to ioine with their enemies, and the other part slacked not their pace. This battell was was fore foughten, for hope of life was set aside on either part, & taking of prisoners proclaimed a great offense, so euery man determined to vanquish or die in the field.

This deadlie conflict continued ten houres in doubtfull state of victorie, uncerteinlie heauing and setting on both sides; but in the end, king Edward so couragiously comforted his men, that the other part was discomfited and overcome, who like men amazed, fled toward Ladcaster brydge to saue themselves, where in the mid waie is a little brooke called Coker, not verie broad, but of a great depenesse, in which, what for hast to escape, and what for feare of their followers, a great number was drowned there. It was reported, that men alieue passed the river by on dead carcasses, and that the great riuer of Wharfe whereinto that brooke doth run, and of all the water coming from Towson, was coloured with blood.

The chase continued all night, and the most part of the next daie, and euery the northerne men (as they saw anie aduantage) returned againe, and fought with their enemies, to the great losse of both parts. For in these two daies were slaine (as they that knew it wrote) on both parts six and thirtie thousand seven hundred threescore & sixtene persons, all Englishmen and of one nation, whereof the chiefe were the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the lord Warrce, and the lord Welles, sir John Penell, Anzelo Trollop, Robert Hojne, and manie other knights and esquiers, and the earle of Deuonshire was taken prisoner, but the dukes of Summerfet and Grecester fled from the field and saued themselves.

After this great victorie, king Edward rode to Poike, where he was with all solemnitie receiued; and first he caused the heads of his father, the earle of Salisburie, and other his friends, to be taken from the gates, and to be buried with their bodies: and there he caused the earle of Deuonshire, and thre other to be beheaded, and set their heads in the same place. King Henrie, after he heard of the irrecoverable losse of his armie, departed incontinentlie with his wife and sonne to the towne of Bertwike, and leaving the duke of Summerfet there, went into Scotland, and comming to the king of Scots, required of him and his counsell, aid, and comfort.

The young king of Scots, lamenting the miserable state of king Henrie, comforted him with faire words and friendlie promises, and assigned to him a competent pension to liue on, during his abode in Scotland. King Henrie, in recompense of this courteous and friendship, deliuered to the king of Scots the towne of Bertwike, whereof he had got possession. He faithfully supported the part of king Henrie, and concluded a marriage betwixt his sister, and the young prince of Wales, but the same was neuer consummate, as after ye shall heare. When king Henrie was somewhat settled in the reime of Scotland, he sent his wife and his sonne into France to king Keiner his father, trusting by his aid and succour to assemble an armie, and once againe to recouer his right and dignitie: but he in the meane time made his aboad in Scotland, to see what waie his friends in England would studie for his restitution.

The quene being in France, did obtaine of the young French king then Lewis the eleventh, that all his husbands friends, and those of the Lancastriall band, might safelie and suerlie haue resort into anie part of the realme of France, prohibiting all other of the contrarie faction anie access, or repaire into that countrie. Thus ye haue heard, how king Henrie the first, after he had reigned eight and thirtie yeares & od moneths, was driuen out of this realme. But now leaving him with the princes of his part, consulting together in Scotland, and quene Margaret his wife gathering of men in France, I will returne where I left, to proceed with the doings of king Edward.

This young prince, hauing with prosperous success obtained so glorious a victorie in the mortall battell at Towson, and chased all his aduersaries out of the realme, or at the least waies put them to silence, returned after the maner and fashion of a triumphant conquerour, with great pompe vnto London; where according to the old custome of the realme, he called a great assemblie of persons of all degrees, and the nine & twentieth daie of June was at Westminster with solemnitie crowned and anointed king. In which yeare, this king Edward called his high court of parlement at Westminster, in the which, the state of the realme was greatlie reformed, and all the statutes made in Henrie the first his time (which touched either his title or profit) were reuoked.

In the same parlement, the earle of Orford far stricken in age, and his sonne and heire the lord Aubrey War, either through malice of their enemies, or for that they had offended the king, were both, with diuerse of their counsellors, attainted, and put to execution; which caused John earle of Orford euery after to rebell. There were also beheaded the same time, sir Thomas Tudenham knight, William Tirell, and John Montgomerie esquiers, and after them diuerse others. Also after this, he created his two younger brethren dukes, that is to saie, lord George duke of Clarence, lord Richard duke of Gloucester; and the lord John Penell, brother to Richard earle of Marwike, he first made lord Pontacute, and afterwards created him marques Pontacute.

Beside this, Henrie Bourchier brother to Thomas archbishop of Canturburie, was created earle of Essex; and William lord Fauconbridge was made earle of Kent. To this Henrie lord Bourchier, a man highlie renowned in martiall feats, Richard duke of Poike long before this time, had giuen his sister Elizabeth in marriage, of whome he begat foure sonnes, William, Thomas, John, and Henrie: the which William being a man of great industrie, wit, and prouidence in graue and weightie matters, married the ladie Anne Mouldue, descended of high parentage, whose mother Jaquet was daughter to Peter of Lutzenburgh earle of saint Paule, by the which Anne he had lord Henrie earle of Essex, one daughter named Cicile, married to Walter lord Ferrers of Chartleie and an other called Isabell, which died unmarried.

The earle of Kent was appointed about this time to keepe the seas, being accompanied with the lord Audelcie, the lord Clinton, sir John Howard, sir Richard Malgraue, and others, to the number of ten thousand, who landing in Britaine, won the towne of Conquest, and the Isle of Weth, and after returned. When all things were brought in order, and framed as king Edward in maner could wish, Henrie duke of Summerfet, sir Rafe Persie, and diuerse other, being in despatre of all good chance to happen vnto king Henrie, came humble, & submitted themselves vnto king Edward, whome he gentlie receiued. Which clemencie notwithstanding both the one and the other (when time serued) revolted from king Edward, and betooke themselves to take part with Henrie, vnto whom they had bene adherents before: because they grew in hope that in the end the confederats, to whom they so closelie did cleaue both in affection and seruicelousness of labour (though they pretended a temporall renunciation of all dutie and seruice for their securitie sake) should haue the honor of victorie against their gainstanders. But as commonlie the euents of enterprises fall out flat contrarie to mens expectation and hope; so came it to passe with these, whose hope though it were greene and flourie in the prosecuting of their affaires, yet in the knitting up of the matter and unluckie successe thereof, it fell out in triall to be a flattering, a false, and a fruitlesse hope: and therefore that is a true and a wise sentence of the comiall poet well serving the purpose:

All this season was king Henrie in Scotland, and queene Margaret (being in France) found such friendship at the French kings hands, that the obtained a crue of five hundred Frenchmen, with the which she arrived in Scotland. And after that she had reposed hir selfe a time, she sailed with hir gallant band of those rustling Frenchmen toward Bewcastle, and landed at Linnmouth. But whether she were afraid of hir owne shadow, or that the Frenchmen cast too manie doubts, the truth is, that the whole armie returned to their ships, and a tempest rose so suddenly, that if she had not taken a small carauell, and that with good speed arrived at Berwikke, she had bene taken at that present time by hir aduersaries.

And although fortune was so fauourable to hir, yet hir companie with stormie blasts was driven on the shore before Banburgh castell, where they set their ships on fire, and fled to an Island called holie Island, where they were so assailed by the bassard Ogle, and an esquire called John Spanners, with other of king Edward friends, that manie of them were slaine, and almost foure hundred taken prisoners: but their cozonnell Peter Bessie, otherwise called monseigneur de Clarence, happened upon a fisherman, and so came to Berwikke unto queene Margaret, who made him capteine of the castell of Alnewike, which he with his Frenchmen kept, till they were rescued.

Shortlie after, queene Margaret obtained a great companie of Scots, and other of hir friends, and so bringing hir husband with hir, and leaving hir sonne called prince Edward in the towne of Berwikke, entered Northumberland, toke the castell of Banburgh, and stuffed it with Scottisemen, and made thereof capteine sir Rafe Greie, and came forward toward the bishopricke of Durham. When the duke of Summerfet heard these newes, he without delay reuolted from king Edward, and fled to king Henrie. So likewise did sir Rafe Persie, and manie other of the kings friends. But manie mo followed king Henrie, in hope to get by the spoile: for his armie spoiled and burned townes, and destroyed fields wher soeuer he came. King Edward advertised of all these things, prepared an armie both by sea and land.

Some of his ships were rigged and vittelled at Lin, and some at Hull, and well furnished with soldiers were herewith set forth to the sea. Also the lord Montacute was sent into Northumberland, there to raise the people to withstand his enemies. And after this, the king in his proper person, accompanied with his brethren, and a great part of the nobilitie of his realme, came to the citie of Poike, furnished with a mightie armie, sending a great part thereof to the aid of the lord Montacute, least peraduenture he giuing too much confidence to the men of the bishopricke and Northumberland, might through them be deceived.

The Lord Montacute then hauing such with him as he might trust, marched forth towards his enemies, and by the waie was encountered with the lord Hungerford, the lord Roos, sir Rafe Persie, and diuerse other, at a place called Hegclie more, where suddenly the said lords, in manner without stroke striking, fled; and onelie sir Rafe Persie abode, and was there manfullie slaine, with diuerse other, saing when he was dying, I haue faued the bird in my bolome: meaning that he had kept his promise and oth made to king Henrie: forgetting (belike) that he in king Henries most necessitie abandoned him, and submitted him to king Edward, as before you haue heard.

The lord Montacute, seeing fortune thus prosperous lie leading his faile, aduanced forward; & learning by espials, that king Henrie with his host was incamped in a false plaine called Liuels, on the water of Dowill in Cramshire, hasted thither, and manfullie set on his enemies in their owne campe, which like desperate persons with no small courage receiued him. There was a fore foughten field, and long per either part could haue anie aduantage of the other: but at length the victorie fell to the lord Montacute, who by fine force entered the battell of his enemies, and constrained them to flie, as despairing of all succours. In which flight and chase were taken Henrie duke of Summerfet, which before was reconciled to king Edward, the lord Roos, the lord Polins, the lord Hungerford, sir Thomas Wentworth, sir Thomas Husleie, sir John Finnerne, and manie other.

King Henrie was a good horseman that day, for he rode so fast a waie that no man might ouertake him; and yet he was so nere pursued, that certene of his henchmen were taken, their horses trapped in blue velvet, and one of them had on his head the said king Henries helmet, or rather (as may be thought, it as some say) his high cap of estate, called Abacot, garnished with two rich crownes, which was presented to king Edward at Poike the fourth day of Maie. The duke of Summerfet was incontinentlie beheaded at Erham; the other lords and knights were had to Bewcastle, and there (after a little respite) were likewise put to death. Beside these, diuerse other, to the number of five and twentie, were executed at Poike, and in other places.

Sir Humfrie Penill, and William Tailbois, calling himselfe earle of Rime, sir Rafe Greie, and Richard Tunstall, with diuerse other, which escaped from this battell, hid themselves in secret places: but yet they kept not themselves so close, but that they were espied and taken. The earle of Rime was apprehended in Kildesdale, and brought to Bewcastle, and there beheaded. Sir humfrie Penill was taken in Holdernesse, and at Poike lost his head. After this battell called Erham field, king Edward came to the citie of Durham, and sent from thence into Northumberland the earle of Warwikke, the lord Montacute, the lords Fauconbridge & Scrope, to recover such castles as his enemies there held, and with force beleaded.

They first beleaged the castell of Alnewike, which sir Peter Bessie and the Frenchmen kept, and in no wise would yield, sending for aid to the Scots. Whereupon sir George Douglas erle of Angus, with thirtene thousand chosen men, in the day time came and rescued the Frenchmen out of the castell; the Englishmen looking on, which thought it much better to haue the castell without losse of their men, than to lose both the castell and their men. Considering the great power of the Scots, & their owne small number, and so they entered the castell and manned it. After this, they wone the castell of Dunstanburgh by force, and likewise the castell of Banburgh. John Cois, seruant to the duke of Summerfet, being taken within Dunstanburgh, was brought to Poike, and there beheaded.

Sir Rafe Greie being taken in Banburgh, for that he had sworn to be true to king Edward, was disgraced of the high order of knightthod at Dowcaster, by cutting off his gilt spurs, renting his robe of armes, and breaking his sword ouer his head: and finally, he was there beheaded for his manifest perurie. After this, king Edward returned to Poike, where where (in despite of the earle of Northumberland, who then kept himselfe in the realme of Scotland) he created sir John Peuill, lord Pontacut earle of Northumberland; and in reproofe of Jasper earle of Penbroke, he created William lord Herbert earle of the same place. But after, when by mediation of friends, the earle of Northumberland was reconciled to his fauour, he restored him to his possessions, name, and dignitie; and preferred the lord Pontacut to the title of marques Pontacut; so that in degree, he was aboue his elder brother the earle of Marwick; but in power, policie, & possessions, far mēer.

King Edward, though all things might seeme now to rest in good case, yet he was not negligent, in making necessarie provision against all attempts of his aduersarie king Henrie, and his partakers; and therefore raised bulwarks, and builded fortresses on eche side of his realme, where any danger was suspected for the landing of any armie. He caused also capitalls to be laid vpon the marches, fore against Scotland, that no person should go out of the realme to king Henrie and his companie, which then sojourned in Scotland. But all the doubts of trouble that might insue by the means of king Henries being at libertie, were shortly taken away and ended: for he himselfe, whether he was past all feare; or that hee was not well established in his wits and perfect mind; or for that he could not long keepe himselfe secret, in disguised attire boldly entered into England.

He was no sooner entered, but he was knowne and taken of one Cantlow, and brought toward the king, whom the earle of Marwick met on the way by the kings commandement, and brought him through London to the Tower, & there he was laid in fure hold. ¶ But it is worthy the noting, which I haue obserued in a late chonographers report touching this matter; namelie, that king Henrie was taken in Cetherwood, beside Wangerleie Hippingstons in Lancashire, by Thomas Talbot sonne and heire to sir Edward Talbot of Wallhall, and John Talbot his cousin of Colebie, which deceived him being at his dinner at Waddington hall, and brought him toward London, with his legs bound to the stirrups, where he was met by the earle of Marwick, and arrested at Elibon; doctor Spanning deane of Windsoe; doctor Seble, and young Ellerton being in his companie, with their feet bound under the horse bellies were brought also to the Tower of London.]

Quene Margaret, hearing of the captiuitie of hir husband, mistrusting the chance of hir sonne, all desolate and comfortlesse departed out of Scotland, and passed into France, where she remained with hir father duke Reiner, till she returned into England to hir haine, as after ye shall heare. The new duke of Summerset, and his brother John, sailed into France, where they also liued in great miserie, till duke Charles, because he was of their kin, as descended of the house of Lancaster by his mother, succoured them with a small pension, which was to them a great comfort. The earle of Penbroke went from countrie to countrie, not alwaies at his hearts ease, nor in safetie of life. [As for his dignitie and reputation, it was the more obscured, for that he had lost the title of his honoz, and lest at his wits end, doubtfull and vncertaine in contrarie factions (as manie more) what to say or do for his best securitie. He neuertheless he concealed his inward discontentment, and as oportunitie of time ministered matter, so he grew in courage, and fell to practises of force (with other complices) thereby to accomplish the claudie conceits of his troubled mind, being perswaded, that temporall misfortunes are, if not vterlicke avoidable, yet mansuall to be withstood, or at least with audacitie & courage to be suffered, as the poet properlie saith:

King Edward being thus in more suertie of his life than before, distributed the possessions of such as took part with king Henrie the first, to his souldiers and capteins, which he thought had well deserved; and besides this, he left no other point of liberalitie vnsheved, whereby he might allure to him the beneuolent minds and louing hearts of his people. And moreover, to haue the loue of all men, he shewed him selfe more familiar both with the nobilitie and commonaltie, than (as some men thought) was conuenient, either for his estate, or for his honoz: notwithstanding the same liberalitie he euer after vsed. The lawes of the realme, in part he reformed, and in part he newlie augmented. The coine both of gold and siluer (which yet at this day is) he newlie deuised, and diuided; for the gold he named roials and nobles, and the siluer he called grotes and halfe grotes.

¶ In Michaclmasse terme were made sergents at law, Thomas Poing, Nicholas Geneie, Richard Peale, Thomas Brian, Richard Wigot, John Cranfield, John Catesbie, and Olvie Fairfar, which held their feast in the bishop of Elies place in Holborne. To the which feast the maior of London, with the aldermen, shiriffes, and commons of diuerse crafts being bidden, repaired. But when the maior looked to be set to keepe the state in the hall, as it had bene vsed in all places of the citie and liberties, out of the kings presence (vknowne to the sergents and against their wils, as they said) the lord Graie of Ru then then tresauror of England was there placed. Whereupon the maior, aldermen, and commons departed home, and the maior made all the aldermen to dine with him. Whobett he and all the citizens were greatly displeased that he was so dealt with, and the new sergents and others were right soie therefore, and had rather than much good it had not so happened. This was then (as my record reporteth more at large) registred to be a president in time to come.]

After that king Edward had reduced the state of the publike affaires vnto his liking; to purchase himselfe a good opinion and fauourable iudgement among the commons, he made proclamations, that all persons, which were adherents to his aduersaries part, & would leaue their armour, and submit themselves wholie to his grace and mercie, should be clerelie pardoned and forgiven. By this kind of courteous dealing he wan him such fauour of the people, that euer after, in all his warres, he was (thorow) their aid and support) a victor and conquerour. When his realme was thus brought into a good & quiet estate, it was thought meet by him and those of his counsell, that a marriage were provided for him in some conuenient place; and therefore was the earle of Marwick sent ouer into France, to demand the ladie Bona, daughter to Felwes duke of Saucie, and sister to the ladie Carlot, then quene of France; which Bona was at that time in the French court.

The earle of Marwick, comming to the French king, then lieng at Tours, was of him honourablie receiued, and right courtesoulie intertained. His message was so well liked, and his request thought so honourable for the aduancement of the ladie Bona, that hir sister quene Carlot obtained both the good will of the king hir husband, and also of hir sister the foresaid ladie: so that the matrimonie on that side was clerelie assented to, and the erle of Dampmartine appointed (with others) to saile into England, for the full finishing of the same. But here consider the old prouerbe to be true, which saith, that marriage goeth by desire. For, during the time that the earle of Marwick was thus in France, and (according to his instructions) brought the effect of his commission to passe, the king being on hunting in the foreest of Wichwood besides Stonestratford, came for his recreation to the manor of Grafton, where the duchesse of Bedford then sojourned, wife to sir Richard Woodville lord Rivers, on whom was then attendant a daughter of hers, called the ladie Elizabeth Graie, widow of sir John Graie knight, slain at the last battell of saint Albons, as before ye haue heard.

This widow, hauing a sute to the king for such lands as hir husband had giuen hir in iointure, so kindled the kings affection towards hir, that he not onelie fauoured hir sute, but more hir person; for she was a woman of a more forsmall countenance than of excellent beautie; and yet both of such beautie and fauour, that with hir sober demeanour, swete looks, and comelie smiling (neither too wanton, nor too bashfull) besides hir pleasant tong and trim wit, she so allured and made subiect vnto hir the heart of that great prince, that after she had denied him to be his paramour, with so good maner, and words so well set as better could not be deuised; he finally resolved with himselfe to marrie hir, not asking counsell of any man, till they might perceiue it was no bootie to aduise him to the contrarie of that his concluded purpose; sith he was so farre gone that he was not renocable, and therefore had fixed his heart vpon the last resolution: namelye, to applie an hole some, honest, and honourable remedie to his affections fiered with the flames of loue, and not to permit his heart to the thraldome of vnlawfull lust: which purpose was both princelie and profitable; as the poet saith:

Ouid. de rem. an. lib. 1.

utile propositum est fasces extinguere flammam, Nec seruum vitij pectus habere suum.

But yet the duchesse of Bozke his mother letted this match as much as in hir laie: when all would not serue, she caused a precontract to be alleged, made by him with the ladie Elizabeth Lucie. But all doubts resolved, all things made cleere, and all canillations auoided, princelie in a morning he married the said ladie Elizabeth Graie at Grafton before said, where he first began to fanthe hir. And in the next yeare after the was with great solemnitie crowned queene at Westmminster. Hir father also was created earle Rivers, and made high constable of England: hir brother lord Anthony was married to the sole heire of Thomas lord Scales: sir Thomas Graie sonne to sir John Graie the queenes first husband, was created marques Dorset, and married to Cicilie heire to the lord Bonville. The French king was not well pleased to be thus dallied with; but he thoughtlie to appease the græfe of his wife and hir sister the ladie Bona married the said ladie Bona to the duke of Millan.

The earle of Warwicke offended with the kings marriage.

Now when the earle of Warwicke had knowledge by letters sent to him out of England from his trustie friends, that king Edward had gotten him a new wife, he was not a little troubled in his mind, for that he toke it his credence thereby was greatly minished, and his honour much stained, namelye in the court of France: for that it might be iudged he came rather like an espiall, to moue a thing neuer minded, and to treat a marriage determined before not to take effect. Suerlie he thought himselfe euill vsed, that when he had brought the matter to his purposed intent and wished conclusion, then to haue it quail on his part; so as all men might thinke at the least wise, that his prince made small account of him, to send him on such a deuelesse errand.

All men for the most part agree, that this marriage was the onlie cause, why the earle of Warwicke conceived an hatred against king Edward, whom he so much before fauoured. Other ascribe other causes; and one speciallie, for that king Edward did attempt a thing once in the earles house, which was much against the earles honestie (whether he would haue deflowered his daughter or his niece, the certaintie was not for both their honours openlie revealed) for suerlie, such a thing was attempted by king Edward, which loued well both to behold and also to see faire damfels. But whether the iniurie that the earle thought he receiued at the kings hands, or the disdain of authoritie that the earle had vnder the king, was the cause of the breach of amitie betwixt them: truth it is, that the prauie intentions of their hearts brake into so manie small peeces, that England, France, and Flanders, could neuer ioine them againe, during their naturall liues.

But though the earle of Warwicke was earnestlie inflamed against the king, for that he had thus married himselfe without his knowledge, hauing regard onelie to the satisfieng of his wanton appetite, more than to his honour or sueritie of his estate; yet did he so much dissemble the matter at his returne into England, as though he had not understood any thing thereof; but onelie declared that he had done, with such reuerence, and shew of friendlie countenance, as he had bene accustomed. And when he had taried in the court a certaine space, he obtained licence of the king to depart to his castell of Warwicke, meaning (when time serued) to vtter to the world, that which he then kept secret, that is to saie, his inward grudge, which he bare towards the king, with desire of reuenge, to the vttermost of his power. Nevertheless, at that time he departed (to the outward shew) so farre in the kings fauour, that manie gentlemen of the court for honours sake gladlie accompanied him into his countrie.

This yeare it was proclaimed in England, that the beakes or pikes of shoes and boots should not passe two inches, vpon paine of curfing by the cleergie, and forfeiting twentie shillings, to be paid one noble to the king, an other to the cozdwinners of London, and the third to the chamber of London; and for other cities and towne the like order was taken. Before this time, and since the yeare of our Lord 1382, the pikes of shoes and boots were of such length, that they were saine to be tied vp vnto the knees with chaines of siluer and gilt, or at the least with silken laces.]

In this yeare also, the kings daughter, the ladie Elizabeth, after wife to king Henrie the seauenth, was borne; king Edward concluded an amitie and league with Henrie king of Castile, and John king of Aragon; at the concluding whereof, he granted licence for certeine cotteshold there, to be transported into the countrie of Spaine (as people report) which haue there so multiplied and increased, that it hath turned the commoditie of England much to the Spanissh profit. Beside this, to haue an amitie with his next neighbour the king of Scots, he winked at the losse of Berwik, and was contented to take a truce for fiftene yeares. Thus king Edward, though for refusall of the French kings sister in law he wan him enemies in France; yet in other places he procured him friends: but those friends had stood him in small stead, if fortune had not holpe him to an other, even at his elbow.

This was Charles earle of Charolois, the sonne and heire apparant vnto Philip duke of Burgognie, which Charles being then a widower, was counselled to be suter vnto king Edward, for to haue in marriage the ladie Margaret, sister to the said king, a ladie of excellent beautie, and indued with so manie worthie gifts of nature, grace, and fortune, that she was thought not vntoworthie to match with the greatest prince of the world. The lord Anthony bastard brother to the said earle Charolois, commonlie called called the bastard of Burgonie, a man of great wit, courage, and valiantnesse, was appointed by his father duke Philip, to go into England in ambassage, about this tute; who being furnished of plate and apparell, necessarie for his estate, hauing in his companie gentlemen, and other expert in all feats of chivalrie and martiall prowesse, to the number of foure hundred horses, toke his ship, and arriued in England, where he was of the king & nobles honourably receiued.

This message being declared, ye may be sure the same was tofullie heard of the king and his counsell; the which by that affinitie, saw how they might be assured of a buckler against France. But yet the earle of Marlowe, bearing his heartie fauour vnto the French king, did as much as in him late by euill reports to hinder this marriage: but this notwithstanding, at length, the king granted to the bastards request; and the said bastard openlie in the kings great chamber contracted the said ladie Margaret, for, and in the name of his brother the said earle of Charolois. After this marriage thus concluded, the bastard challenged the lord Scales, brother to the queene, a man both equall in hart and valiantnesse with the bastard, to fight with him both on horsebacke, and on foot: which demand the lord Scales gladly accepted.

The bastard

Scales.

The king causing lists to be prepared in Westsmithfield for these champions, and verie faire and costlie galleries for the ladies, was present at this martiall enterprize himselfe. The first daie they ran together diuerse courses with sharpe speares, and departed with equall honoz. The next day they turned on horsebacke. The lord Scales horse had on his chafron a long sharpe pike of Steele, and as the two champions coped together, the same horse (whether thorough custome or by chance) thrust his pike into the nosegayls of the bastards horse; so that for verie paine he mounted so high, that he fell on the one side with his master, and the lord Scales rode round about him with his sword in his hand, untill the king commanded the marshall to helpe vp the bastard, which openlie said; I can not hold me by the clouds, for though my horse faileth me, suerlie I will not faile my countercompanion. The king would not suffer them to do anie more that daie.

The morow after, the two noblemen came into the field on foot, with two polaxes, and fought valiantlie: but at the last, the point of the polax of the lord Scales happened to enter into the sight of the bastards helme, and by fine force might haue plucked him on his knees: the king suddenlie cast downe his warder, and then the marshalls them seuered. The bastard not content with this chance, and trosting on the cunning which he had at the polax, required the king of iustice, that he might perfoyme his enterprize. The lord Scales refused it not, but the king said, he would aske counsell: and so calling to him the constable, and the marshall, with the officers of armes, after consultation had, and the lawes of armes rehearsed, it was declared for a sentence definitive, by the duke of Clarence, then constable of England, and the duke of Suffolke, then marshall; that if he would go forward with his attempted challenge, he must by the law of armes be deliuered to his aduersarie, in the same state and like condition as he stood when he was taken from him.

The bastard hearing this iudgement, doubted the sequelle of the matter; and so relinquished his challenge. Other challenges were done, and valiantlie atchieued by the Englishmen, which I passe ouer. Shortlie after came goodfull tidings to the bastard, that his father duke Philip was dead, who there upon taking his leaue of king Edward, and of his sister the new duchesse of Burgonie, liberallie rewarded with plate and iewels, with all speed returned to his brother the new duke, who was not a little glad of the contract made for him with the said ladie, as after well appeared. In this same yeare, king Edward, moze for the loue of the marques Montaigne, than for anie fauour he bare to the earle of Marlowe, promoted George Penill their brother to the archbishopricke of Dorke.

Charles duke of Burgonie, retossing that he had so well sped, for conclusion of marriage with king Edwards sister, was verie desirous to see hir, of whome he had heard so great praise, & wrote to king Edward, requiring him to send his sister ouer vnto him, according to the covenants passed betwixt them. King Edward being not slacke in this matter, appointed the dukes of Gloucester and Suffolke, with their wiues, being both sisters to the ladie Margaret, to attend hir, till she came to hir husband. And so after that ships, and all other necessarie provisions were readie, they being accompanied with a great sort of lords and ladies, and others, to the number of five hundred horses, in the beginning of June departed out of London to Douer, and so sailed to Sluis, and from thence was conueied to Bruges, where the marriage was solemnized betwixt the duke and hir, with great triumphs, & princelie feastings. Touching the pompe had and vsed at the setting forward of this ladie on hir voiage it is a note worth the reading; and therefore necessarilie here interlaced for honours sake.

On the eighteenth of June, Margaret sister to Edward the fourth began hir iornie from the Wardrobe in London, toward hir marriage with Charles duke of Burgonie: first she offered in the church of saint Paule, and then rode thorough the citie, the earle of Marlowe riding before hir, with earles and barons a great number; the duchesse of Suffolke, with other ladies and gentlewomen in great number. And at hir entrie into Cheape, the maiors of London and his brethren the aldermen presented hir with a pair of rich balons, & in them an hundred pounds of gold, and that night she lodged at the abbie of Stratford, where the king then late: from thence she toke hir iournie to Canturburie.

The king riding after to see hir shipping, on the first of Iulie, she toke the sea at Margate, and there toke leaue of the king hir brother, and departed. There returned backe againe with the king, the duke of Clarence, the duke of Gloucester, the earles of Marlowe, Herefordshire, and Northumberland. And there abode with hir in the ship, the lord Scales, the lord Wacres hir chamberlaine, sir John Woodville, sir John Holward, and manie other famous knights and esquires. She was shipped in the new Ellen of London, and in hir nauie the John of Newcastell, the Marie of Salisburie, and manie other roiall ships, and on the morow landed at Sluis in Flanders. Now as soone as hir ship & companie of ships were entered into the haven, there receiued hir sir Simon de Alein and the water bailiffe, in diuerse boats and barks apparelled readie for hir landing.

The first estate that receiued hir was the bishop of Writight well accompanied, and the countesse of Shorne bastard daughter to duke Philip of Burgonie, and with hir manie ladies and gentlewomen; and so proceeding in at the gate of the towne, the same towne was presented to hir, she to be soueraigne ladie thereof: also they gaue to hir twelue marks of gold Troie weight, the which was two hundred pounds of English monie: and so proceeded thorough the towne to hir lodging, euerie householder standing standing in the street with a torch in his hand burning. On the morrow the old duchesse of Burgonie came to hir, accompanied with manie great estates. On the thirde of Julie came the duke of Burgonie to Slnis, with twentie persons secretlie, and was there openly affianced to the ladie Margaret, by the bishop of Salisburie and the lord Scales, in presence of the lord Dacres, the duchesse of Norfolk, the ladie Scales, and all the knights & esquiers; gentlewomen inuironing the chamber.

On the 8 of Julie (being saturday) by the duke of Burgonies appointment, the lady Margaret removed by water to the Dame. And on the Sunday in the morning betwixt five and six of the clocke, the marriage was solemnized betwixt them, by the bishops of Salisburie and of Carneie; there being present the old duchesse of Burgonie, the lord Scales, the lord Dacres, with the knights, esquiers, ladies & gentlewomen that came out of England. The great triumphs, feastinges, shewes of pageants, with other strange deuises, and iustings, were such as I haue not read the like, and would be ouer long in this place to set downe.

[Of this alliance with other more mention is honorable made in the declaration of the causes that moued the Quene of England to giue aid to the defense of the people afflicted & oppressed in the low countries, by the Spaniards, namely for the maintenance of perpetuall amitie. Which declaration is so set forth in this booke, as the same in the seuen and twentieth yeare of hir maiesties reigne was published: vnto which yeare I remit the reader for the further search thereof for that it containeth much memorabile matter, touching the manifest causes of concord to be continued betwene them of the low countries and vs English.]

Sir Thomas Coke late maior of London, was by one named Hawkins appeached of treason, for the which he was sent to the Towre, and his place within London seized by the lord Riuers, and his wife and seruants clerelie put out thereof. The cause was this. The forenamed Hawkins came vpon a season vnto the said sir Thomas, requesting him to lend a thousand markes vpon good suertie, wherevnto he answered, that first he would know for whom it should be and for what intent.

At length, vnderstanding it should be for the vse of quene Margaret, he answered he had no currant waies thereof anie shifts might be made without too much losse: and therefore required Hawkins to moue him no further in that matter, for he intended not to deale withall: yet the said Hawkins exhorted him to remember, what benefits he had receiued by hir when she was in prosperitie, as by making him hir warshop, and customer of Hampton, &c.

But by no meanes the said Coke would grant goods no; monie, although at last the said Hawkins required but an hundred pounds, he was faine to depart without the value of a penie, and neuer came againe to moue him, which so rested two or three yeares after, till the said Hawkins was cast in the Towre, and at length brought to the stake, called the duke of Excesters daughter, by meanes of which paine he shewed manie things, amongst the which the motion was one that he had made to sir Thomas Coke, and accused himselfe so farre, that he was put to death.

By meane of which confession, the said sir Thomas was troubled (as before is shewed) when the said sir Thomas had laine in the Towre from Whitsuntide till about Michaelmas, in the which season manie inquiries were made to find him guiltie, and euer quit, till one iurie (by meanes of sir John Fog) indicted him of treason, after which an oter and terminer was kept at the Guildhall, in which sat with the maior, the duke of Clarence, the earle of Warwicke, the lord Riuers, sir John Fog, with other of the kings counsell.

To the which place the said Thomas was brought, and there arreigned vpon life and death, where he was acquitted of the said indictment, and had to the counter in Breadstreet, and from thence to the kings bench. After a certeine time that he was thus acquitted, his wife got againe the possession of hir house, the which she found in an euill plight; for such seruants of the lord Riuers and sir John Fog, as were assigned to keepe it, made hauocke of what they listed.

Also at his place in Essex named Siddhall, were set an other sort to keepe that place, the which destroyed his dore in his parke, his comes, and his fish, without reason, and spared not brasse, pewter, bedding, & all that they might carie, for the which might neuer one penie be gotten in recompence, yet could not sir Thomas Coke be deliuered, till he had paid eight thousand pounds to the king, and eight hundred pounds to the quene.]

In this meane time, the earle of Warwicke bearing a continuall grudge in his hart toward king Edward, since his last returne out of France, perswaded so with his two brethren, the archbishop, and the marques, that they agreed to ioin with him in anie attempt which he should take in hand against the said king. The archbishop was easilie allured to the earles purpose, but the marques could by no meanes be reduced to take anie part against king Edward of a long time, till the earle had both promised him great rewards and promotions, and also assured him of the aid and powre of the greatest princes of the realme. And euen as the marques was loth to consent to his unhappie conspiracie, so with a faine hart he shewed himselfe an entinie vnto king Edward, which double dissimulation was both the destruction of him and his brethren. And that they were perswasions of no small force, which the earle of Warwicke vsed to the archbishop and marques, I haue thought good here to interlace, as I find remembred by Edward Hall in forme following.

The perswasions of the earle of Warwicke vnto his two brethren against king Edward the fourth.

My deere and welbeloued brethren, the incredible faithfulness, the secret sobernesse, and the politike prudence that I haue euer by long continuance of time experimented in you both, dooth not onelie incourage my heart, yea and setteth me in great hope of obtaining my purpose, but also putteth me out of all dread and mistrust, firmerle beleauing, and suerlie iudging, that you both will with tooth and naile endeavour your selues, to the vttermost of your power, to bring to effect and purpose the thing that I now shall declare vnto you. Suerlie, I would in no wise that you should thinke, that that which I shall speake to you of king Edward and king Henrie, should rise of any lightnesse or phantasie of my mind, or anie trifeling toie latelie fallen into my imagination; but the true experience and iust iudgement that I haue of them both, their qualities and conditions, in manner compell and constraince me to saie as I say, and to doo as I doo.

Abt. Fl.
Edw. Hall.
Edw. 4. fol.
ccxviii. &c.

For suerlie, king Henrie is a goodlie, good, and a vertuous person, neither forgetting his friends, nor putting in oblivion anie benefit by him of a meane person receiued, nor yet anie paine for his causes sustained hath he left unrewarded: to whome God hath sent a sonne, called prince Edward, borne to be of great worthinesse & praise, of much bountifullnesse and liberalitie, of whome men may manie laudable things coniecture, considering the paine, labour, and trauell, that he taketh to helpe his father out of captiuitie and thraldome. King Edward on the contrarie side, is a man contumelious, opprobrious, and an iniurious person: to them that deserue kindnesse he sheweth unkindnesse, and them that loue him he dealde hateth, now detesting to take anie paine for the preferment or maintenance of the publike wealth of this realme, but all giuen to pastime, pleasure, and daliance; sooner preferring to high estate men descended of low bloud and base degree, than men of old and vndeiled houses, which haue both supported him and the commonwealth of his realme.

So that I now perceiue, that it is euen come to this point, that he will destroe all the nobilitie: or else the nobilitie must thorowly of verte necessitie destroe and confound him. But reason would, that we that were first hurt, should first reuenge our cause: for it is not vnknownen to you both, how that he, immediatlie after he had obtained the crowne, began first secretlie, & then openlie to enuie, disdaine, and impugne the fame, glorie, and renoume of our house and familie; as who said, that all the honoz, preferment, and authoritie that we haue, we had onelie receiued at his hands, and that we had neither obtained dignitie nor rule by our great labour, aid and trauell. Which to all men may seme vntrue, that consider that our name, chiefe title, and principall authoritie, was to vs giuen by king Henrie the sixt, and not by him. But if euerie man will remember, who first toke part with his father, when he claimed the crowne (who at that time, for that cause was in great ieopardie, and almost slaine by the kings meniall seruants, and who neuer left this man in prosperitie nor aduersitie, till he had the garland, and the realme in quietnesse) shall manifestlie perceiue, that we and our bloud haue shewed our selues more like fathers to him, than he like a friend to vs.

If we haue receiued any benefits of him, suerlie they be not so much as we haue deserved, nor so much as we looked for; and yet they be much more than he would we should know, as ye both well perceiue and know. Let these things ouer passe, and speake of the vngentle, vntrue, and vnprincipellie handling of me in the last ambassage, being sent to the french king for to treat a marriage for him, hauing full authoritie to bind and to loose, to contract and conclude. Which thing when I had finished & accomplished:

how lightlie his mind changed, how priuilie he bowed, and how secretlie he married, both you know better than I. So that by this meanes, I was almost out of all credence in the court of france, both with the king and quene, as though I had come thither like an espiell, to moue a thing neuer minded; or to treat of a marriage determined before neuer to take effect. Whereby the fame of all our estimation, which all kings and princes haue conceiued in vs (partlie obtained by the vertue & prowell of our noble ancestors, and partlie atchiued by our owne paines & forward acts) shall now be obfusate, vtterlie extinguished, and nothing set by.

What worne is touched, and will not once turne againe: What beast is stricken, that will not roze or found: What innocent child is hurt that will not crie: If the poore and vnrasonable beasts, if the seie babes that doe lacke discretion, grone against harne to them proffered; how ought an honest man to be angrie, when things that touch his honestie be daillie against him attempted: But if a meane person in that case be angrie: how much more ought a noble man to fume & stirre coales, when the high type of his honour is touched, his fame in maner brought to infamie, and his honour almost blemished & appalled, without his offense or desert: All this brethren you know to be true, the dishonoz of one is the dishonoz of vs all, and the hurt of one is the hurt of all: wherefore, rather than I will liue vnreruenged; or suffer him to reigne, which hath sought my decarie and dishonoz, I will suerlie spend my life, lands, and goods, in setting by that iust and good man king Henrie the sixt: and in deposing this vntrue, vnfaithfull, and vnkind prince (by our onelie means) called king Edward the fourth.

Beside all this, the earle of Marwike, being a far casting prince, perceiued somewhat in the duke of Clarence, whereby he iudged that he bare no great good will towards the king his brother; and thereby on feeling his mind by such talke as he of purpose ministred, vnderstood how he was bent, and so wan him to his purpose: and for better assurance of his faithfull friendship, he offered him his eldest daughter in marriage; with the whole halfe deale of his wimes inheritance. And hereupon, after consultation had of their weightie businesse and dangerous affaires, they sailed ouer to Calis, of the which towne the earle was capteine, where his wife & two daughters then sojourned, whome the duke (being in long with his person) had great desire to visit.

But the earle, hauing in continuall remembrance his purposed enterprize, appointed his brethren, the archbishop and the marquesse, that they should by some meanes in his absence sit by some new rebellion in the countie of Dorke, and other places adioyning, so that this ciuill warre should seme to all men to haue bene begun without his assent or knowlege, being on the further side of the seas. The duke of Clarence being come to Calis with the earle of Marwike, after he had sware on the sacrament to keepe his promise and pact made with the said earle whole and inuiolate, he married the ladie Isabell, eldest daughter daughter to the earle, in our ladies church there. Shortly after, according as had bene aforehand devised, a commotion was begun in Yorkeshire, to the great disquieting of that countrie. The same chanced by this means.

There was in the citie of Yorke an old and rich hospitall, dedicated to saint Leonard, for the harbouring and relieving of poore people. Certaine euill disposed persons of the earle of Marwikes faction, intending to set a boile in the countrie, perswaded the husbandmen to refuse to giue anie thing to the said hospitall, affirming that the corne giuen to that good intent, came not to the vse of the poore; but was conuerted to the behoofe of the master of the hospitall, and the priests, whereby they grew to be rich, and the poore people wanted their due succour and reliefe. And not content with these sayings, they fell to doings: for when the priors of the hospitall, according to their vsage, went about the countrie to gather the accustomed corne, they were sore beaten, wounded, and euill intreated.

Shortly after, the conspiracie of the euill disposed people grew to an open rebellion, so that there assembled to the number of fiftene thousand men, euen readie bent to set on the citie of Yorke. But the lord marquisse Montacute, gouernour and president of that countrie for the king, taking speecie counsell in the matter, with a small number of men, but well chosen, encountred the rebels before the gates of Yorke: where (after a long conflict) he took Robert Huldorne their captaine, and before them commanded his head to be stricken off, and then (because it was a darke euening) he caused his souldiers to enter in to Yorke, and there to refresh them. Where manie men haue marvelled, whie the marquisse thus put to death the captaine of those people, which had procured this their rebellious enterpryse.

Some saie he did it, to the intent to sceme innocent and faultlesse of his brothers doings. But other iudge, that he did it, for that contrarie to his promise made to his brother, he was determined to take part with king Edward, with whom (as it shall after appeare) he in small space entered into grace and fauour. The rebels being nothing dismayed with the death of their captaine, but rather the more bent on mischief, by faire meanes and craftie persuaasions got to them Henrie, sonne to the lord Fitz Hugh, and sir Henrie Percill sonne and heire to the lord Latimer, the one being nephew and the other cousine germane to the erle of Marwike. Although these young gentlemen bare the names of captaines, yet they had a gouernour that was sir John Coniers, a man of such courage & valiantnesse, as few were to be found in his daies within the north parts.

After they saw that they could not get Yorke, because they wanted ordinance, they determined with all speed to march toward London, intending to raise such a toie in the peoples minds, that they should thinke king Edward neither to be a lawfull prince, nor yet profitable to the common-wealth. King Edward hauing perfect knowledge of all the doings of the earle of Marwike, and of his brother the duke of Clarence, was by diuerse letters certified of the great armie of the northerne men, with all speed comming toward London; and therefore in great hast he sent to William lord Herbert, whom (as ye haue heard) he had created earle of Penbroke; requiring him without delate to raise his power, and in counter with the northerne men.

The earle of Penbroke, commonly called the lord Herbert, both readie to obey the kings commandement, according to his dutie, and also desirous to reuenge the malice which he bare to the earle of Marwike, for that he knew how he had bene the onelie let whie he obtained not the wardship of the lord Bonneuilles daughter and heire for his eldest sonne, accompanied with his brother sir Richard Herbert, a ballant knight, and aboue sir or seauen thousand Welshmen, well furnished, marched forward to incounter with the northerne men. And to assist him with archers, was appointed Humfrie lord Stafford of Southwike, named but not created earle of Deuonshire by the king, in hope that he would serue valiantlie in that iourne: he had with him eight hundred archers.

When these two lords were met at Cottesfold, they heard how the northerne men were going toward Northampton: whereupon the lord Stafford, and sir Richard Herbert, with two thousand well horsed Welshmen, rode forth afore the maine armie, to see the demeanour of the northerne men: and at length, vnder a woods side, they couertlie espied them passing forward, and suddenlie set on the rearward: but the northerne men with such nimblenesse turned about, that in a moment the Welshmen were discomfited, and manie taken, the remnant returned to the armie with small gaine. The northerne men well cooled with this small victorie, went no further southwards, but toke their waie toward Marwike, looking for aid of the earle, which was lately come from Calis, with his sonne in law the duke of Clarence, and was raising men to aid his friends and kinsfolke.

The king likewise assembled people to aid the erle of Penbroke, but before either part receiued succour from his friend or partaker, both the armies met by chance in a faire plaine, nere to a towne called Heddecote, foure miles distant from Banberie, where there are three hilles, not in equall quantitie, but lieng in maner (although not fullie) triangle. The Welshmen got first the west hill, hoping to haue recovered the east hill also, which if they might haue obtained, the victorie had bene theirs, as their foolish prophesiers told them before. These northerne men incamped on the south hill; the earle of Penbroke and the lord Stafford of Southwike were lodged in Banberie, the daie before the field, which was saint James daie, and there the earle of Penbroke put the lord Stafford out of an Inne, wherein he delighted much to be, for the loue of a damosell that dwelled in the house: and yet it was agreed betwixt them, that which of them forer obtained first a lodging, should not be displaced.

The lord Stafford in great despise departed with his whole band of archers, leauing the earle of Penbroke almost desolate in the towne, who with all diligence returned to his host, lieng in the field improued of archers. Sir Henrie Percill, sonne to the lord Latimer, toke with him certaine light horsemen, and skirmished with the Welshmen in the euening, iust before their campe, where doing right ballantlie, but a little too hardilie aduenturing himselfe, was taken and yeldeo, and yet cruellie slaine. Which was mercifull act the Welshmen soe rued the next day per night: for the northerne men soe displeased for the death of this noble man, in the next morning valiantlie set on the Welshmen, and by force of archers caused them quicklie to descend the hill, into the valley, where both the hostes fought.

The earle of Penbroke did right ballantlie, and so likewise did his brother sir Richard Herbert, in so much that with his polar in his hand, he twice by fine force passed thorough the battell of his aduersaries, and without anie hurt or mortall wound returned. But see the hap, euen as the Welshmen were at point to haue obtained the victorie, John Clap-pam esquier, seruant to the earle of Marwike, mounted by the side of the east hill, accompanied onelic with five hundred men, gathered of the rascals of the towne of Southampton, and other villages about, having borne before them the standard of the earle of Warwick, with the white beare, crying; A Warwick, a Warwick.

The Welchmen, thinking that the earle of Warwick had come on them with all his puissance, suddenly as men amazed, fled: the northerne men them pursued, and due without merrie, so that there died of the Welchmen that daie, about five thousand, besides them that fled and were taken. The earle of Pembroke, and his brother sir Richard Herbert, with diuerse gentlemen, were taken and brought to Banberie, where the earle with his brother, and other gentlemen, to the number of ten, that were likewise taken, lost their heads. But great mone was made for that noble and hardie gentleman, sir Richard Herbert, being able for his goodlie personage and high balliance, to haue serued the greatest prince in Christendome. But what policie or puissance can either prevent or impugne the force of fate, whose law as it standeth upon an inevitable necessitie; so was it not to be dispensed withall; and therefore destiny hauing preordained the manner of his death, it was patientlie to be suffered, sith puissance it could not be avoided, nor politike prevented, nor violentlie resisted: for

The Southamptonshire men, with diuerse of the northerne men by them procured, in this furie made them a capteine, called Robert Williard, but they named him Robin of Reddesdale, and suddenly came to Crafston, where they took the earle Kiuers, father to the queene, and his son sir John Woodville, whome they brought to Southampton, and there beheaded them both without iudgement. The king aduertised of these mischances, wrote to the shiriffes of Summertshire, and Denonshire, that if they might by any means take the lord Stafford of Southwike, they should without delaie put him to death. Whereupon search was made for him, till at length he was found in a village within Brentmarch, and after brought to Widgewater where he was beheaded.

After the battell was thus fought at Hedgecote commonlie called Banberie field, the northerne men retired toward Warwick, where the earle had gathered a great multitude of people, which earle received the northerne men with great gladnes, thanking sir John Coniers, and other their capteins for their paines taken in his cause. The king in this meane time had assembled his power, and was comming toward the earle, who being aduertised thereof, sent to the duke of Clarence, requiring him to come and loine with him. The duke being not farre off, with all speed repaired to the earle, and so they joined their powers together, and upon secret knowledge had, that the king (because they were entered into termes by waie of communication to haue a peace) took small heed to himselfe, nothing doubting anie outward attempt of his enemies.

The earle of Warwick, intending not to lose such opportunitie of aduantage, in the dead of the night, with an elect companie of men of warre (as secretlie as was possible) set on the kings field, killing them that kept the watch, and per the king was ware (for he thought of nothing lesse than of that which then hapned) at a place called Moline, foure miles from Warwick, he was taken prisoner and brought to the castell of Warwick. And to the intent his friends should not know what was become of him, the earle caused him by secret iournies in the night to be conueied to Spiddeham castell in Dorsetshire, and there to be kept under the custodie of the archbishop of Pothe, and other his friends in those parties. King Edward being thus in captiuitie, spake euer faire to the archbishop, and to his other keepers, so that he had leaue diuerse daies to go hunt. [Which exercise he used, as it should seeme, not so much for regard of his recreation, as for the recouerie of his libertie: which men esteeme better than gold, and being counted a diuine thing, doth passe all the wealth, pleasure, and treasure of the world; according to the old saing:

Non bene profuluo libertas venditur auro, Hoc celeste bonum preterit orbis opes.

Now on a daie upon a plaine when he was thus abroad, there met with him sir William Stanley, sir Thomas a Bozough, and diuers other of his friends, with such a great band of men, that neither his keepers would, nor once durst moue him to returne into prison againe. Some haue thought that his keepers were corrupted with monie, or faire promises, and therefore suffered him thus to scape out of danger. After that he was once at libertie, he came to Pothe, where he was iustlie receiued, and taried there two daies: but when he perceived he could get no armie together in that countrie to attend him to London, he turned from Pothe to Lancaster, where he found his chamberleine the lord Hastings well accompanied, by whose aid and such others as were to him, being well furnished, he came safelie to the citie of London.

When the earle of Warwick, and the duke of Clarence had knowledge how king Edward by the treachery or negligence of them (whome they had put in trust) was escaped their hands, they were in a wonderfull chafe: but sith the chance was past, they began effronies to prouide for the warre, which they saw was like to insue; and found much comfort, in that a great number of men, deliting more in discord than in concord, offered themselves to aid their side. But other good men desirous of common quiet, and lamenting the miserable state of the realme, to redresse such mischiefe as appeared to be at hand by these tumults, took paine, and road betwene the king, the earle, and the duke, to reconcile them each to other.

Their charitable motion and causes alledged, because they were of the chiefest of the nobilitie, and therefore caried both credit and authoritie with them, so aduaged the moods both of the king, the duke, and the earle; that each gaue faith to other to come and go safelie without leopordie. In which promise both the duke and earle putting perfect confidence, came both to London. At Westminster, the king, the duke, and the earle, had long communication together: for to haue come to an agreement: but they fell at such great words upon reherfall of old matters, that in great furie without any conclusion they departed; the king to Canturburie, and the duke and the earle to Warwick, where the earle procured a new armie to be raised in Lincolnshire, and made capteine thereof sir Robert Welles, sonne to Richard lord Welles, a man of great experience in warre.

The king aduertised hereof, without delaie prepared an armie, and out of hand he sent to Richard lord Welles, willing him upon the sight of his letters, to repaire unto him: which to doe he had oftentimes refused, excusing himselfe by sicknesse and feblenesse of bodie. But when that excuse serued not, he thinking to purge himselfe sufficientlie of all offense and blame before the kings presence, took with him sir Thomas Dimmocke, who had married his sister, and so came to London. And when he was come, by being admonished by his friends that the king was greatlie with him displeased, he with his brother in law took the sanctuarie at Westminster.

But king Edward, trusting to pacifie all this busie tumult without anie further bloodshed, promised both those persons their pardons, canling them upon his promise to come out of sanctuarie to his presence, sence, and calling to him the lord Welles, willed him to write to his sonne to leaue off the warre, and in the meane season he with his armie went forward, hauing with him the lord Welles, and sir Thomas Dimmocke. And bring not past two daies iournie from Stamford, where his enemies had pitched their field, and hearing that sir Robert Welles, not regarding his fathers letters, kept his campe still, he caused the lord Welles, father to the said sir Robert, and sir Thomas Dimmocke to be beheaded, contrarie to his promise.

Sir Robert Welles, hearing that the king approached, and that his father and sir Thomas Dimmocke were beheaded, though he was somewhat doubtfull to fight, before the earle of Warwicke were with his powcr assembled, yet hauing a yong and lustie courage, manfullie set on his enemies. The battell was sore fought on both sides, and manie a man slaine; till sir Robert, perceiving his people at point to flie, was buslie in hand to exhort them to stonde, and in the meane time compassed about with enemies was there taken, & with him sir Thomas de Lancashire knight, and manie more. After the taking of their captiue, the Lincolneshire men amazed, threw awaie their coats the lighter to run awaie, and fled amaine, and therefore this battell is called there yet vnto this daie, A loscote field.

The king reioysing at this victorie, caused sir Robert Welles, and diuerse other to be put to execution in the same place. The same went that at this battell were slaine ten thousand men at the least. The earle of Warwicke late at the same time at his castell of Warwicke, and meant to haue set forward the next daie toward his armie in Lincolnshire. But when he heard that the same was ouerthrowne, he took new counsell, and with all diligence imagined how to compass Thomas lord Stanlie, which had married his sister, that he might be one of the conspiracie. Which thing when he could not bring to passe (for the lord Stanlie had answered him, that he would neuer make warre against king Edward) he thought no longer to spend time in wast, and mistrusting he was not able to meet with his enemies, he with his sonne in law the duke of Clarence departed to Creceker, and there tarrying a few daies, determined to saile into France, to purchase aid of king Lewes.

Now resting vpon this point, he hired ships at Dartmouth: and when the same were readie trimmed and decked, the duke and the earle with their wiues, and a great number of seruants imbarked themselves, and first took their course towards Calis, whereof the earle was captiue, thinking there to haue left his wife and daughters, till he had returned out of France. But when they were come before the towne of Calis, they could not be suffered to enter: for the lord Clauclere a Gascoigne, being the earles deputie in that towne, whether he did it by dissimulation, or bearing good will to king Edward (as by the sequelle it may be doubted whether he did or no) in stead of receiuing his master with triumph, he bent and discharged against him diuerse peeces of ordinance, sending him word he should not there take land.

This nauie lieng thus before Calis at anchor, the duchesse of Clarence was there deuoured of a faire sonne, which child the earles deputie would scarce suffer to be christened within the towne; nor without great intreatie would permit two flagons of wine to be conueied aboard to the ladies lieng in the hauen. The king of England aduertised of the refusal made by monsieur de Clauclere to the earle of Warwicke, was so much pleased therewith, that incontinentlie he made him chiefe captiue of the towne of Calis by his letters patents, which he sent to him out of hand, and thereof discharged the earle as a traitor and rebell. Thus was the one in respect of his accepted seruice honorable aduanced; and the other, in regard of his disloyaltie shamefullie disgraced: whereof as the one took occasion of inward delight; so the other could not be void of grudging conceits.

The duke of Burgognie (vnto whom king Edward had writtten, that in no wise he should receiue the earle of Warwicke, nor anie of his friends within his countries) was so well pleased with the doings of monsieur de Clauclere, that he sent to him his seruant Philip de Cumins, and gaue him pence lie a thousand crownes in pension, paying and requiring him to continue in truth and fidelitie toward king Edward, as he had theued and begun. But although monsieur de Clauclere swore in the said Philips presence, trulie to take king Edwards part; yet he sent priuillie to the earle of Warwicke lieng at Whitlanbate, that if he landed, he should be taken and lost: for all England (as he said) took part against him; the duke of Burgognie, and all the inhabitants of the towne, with the lord Duras the kings marshall, and all the retinue of the garrison were his enemies.

The earle, hauing this aduertisement from his feigned enimie, with his nauie sailed toward Normandie, and by the waie spoiled and took manie ships of the duke of Burgognies subjects, and at the last (with all his manie and spoiles) he took land at Diepe in Normandie, where the gouernor of the countrie friendlie welcomed him, and aduertised king Lewes of his arriuall. The French king, desirous of nothing more than to haue occasion to pleasure the erle of Warwicke, of whom the his renowne caused all men to haue him in admiration, sent by to him, requiring both him and his sonne in law the duke of Clarence, to come vnto his castell of Ambois, where he then sojourned. The duke of Burgognie, hearing that the duke and earle were thus receiued in France, sent a post with letters vnto king Lewes, partly by waie of request, and partly by way of menacing, to dissuade him from aiding of his aduersaries, the said duke and earle.

But the French king little regarded this sute of the duke of Burgognie, and therefore answered, that he might and would succour his friends, and yet breake no leage with him at all. In the meane time, the earle made inquirie for such as were knowne to be aiders of the earle of Warwicke within his realme, of whom some he apprehended as guiltie, and some (doubting themselves) fled to sanctuary, and other trusting to the kings pardon, submitted themselves, as John marques Montacute, whom he courteously receiued. When queene Margaret that sojourned with duke Kefner her father, heard tell that the earle of Warwicke was come to the French court, with all diligence she came to Ambois to see him, with her onelie sonne prince Edward.

With him also came Jasper earle of Penbrooke, and John earle of Arfoz, which after diuerse impilliments latelie escaped, fled out of England into France, and came by fortune to this assemble. These persons, after intragat had of their affaires, determined by meanes of the French king to conclude a league and amitie betweene them. And first to begin withall, for the sure foundation of their new intragat, Edward prince of Wales wedded Anne second daughter to the earle of Warwicke, which ladie came with her mother into France. After which marriage, the duke and the earles took a solemne oth, that they should neuer leaue the warre, till either king Henrie the first, or his sonne prince Edward, were restored to the crowne: and that the queene and the prince should should depuſe and appoint the duke and the earle to be gouernours & conſeruatoꝝ of the common wealt, till time the prince were come to eſtate. Manie other conditions were agreed, as both reaſon & the weight of ſo great buſineſſe required.

Whileſt theſe things were thus in doing in the French court, there landed a damſell, belonging to the duchefſe of Clarence; as ſhe ſaid: which made monſieur de Claulere beleeue, that ſhe was ſent from king Edward to the duke of Clarence and the earle of Marwike with a plaine ouerture and declaration of peace. Of the which tidings Claulere was verie glad for the earles ſake. But this damſell coming to the duke, perſuaded him ſo much to leane off the purſute of his conſeuted diſpleaſure towards his brother king Edward, that he promiſed at his returne into England, not to be ſo extreme enemie againſt his brother as he was taken to be: and this promiſe afterward he did keepe. With this answer the damſell returned into England, the earle of Marwike being thereof clearelie ignorant.

The French king lent both ſhips, men, and monie vnto queene Margaret, and to hir partakers, and appointed the baſſard of Bourbon, admirall of France, with a great nauie to defend them againſt the nauie of the duke of Burgognie, which he laid at the mouth of the riuer Saine, readie to encounter them, being of greater force than both the French nauie and the Engliſh fleet. And yet king Keiner did alſo helpe his daughter with men and munition of warre. When their ſhips and men were come together to Harſtue, the earle of Marwike thought not to linger time: becauſe he was certified by letters from his friends out of England, that aſſoone as he had taken land, there would be readie manie thouſands to do him what ſervice and pleaſure they could or might. And beſide this, diuerſe noble men wrote that they would helpe him with men, armes, monie, and all things neceſſarie for the warre, and further to aduenture their owne bodies in his quarell.

Suerlie his preſence was ſo much deſired of all the people, that almoſt all men were readie in armour, looking for his arriuall: for they iudged that the verie ſunne was taken from the world when he was abſent. When he had receiued ſuch letters of comfort, he determined with the duke, and the earles of Orford and Penbroke (becauſe queene Margaret and hir ſonne were not yet ſullie furniſhed for the iourne) to go before with part of the nauie, and part of the armie. And euen as fortune would, the nauie of the duke of Burgognie at the ſame time by a tempeſt was ſcattered, & diuen beſide the coaſt of Dorſetſhire: ſo that the earle of Marwike in hope of a bounne voiage, cauſed ſailes to be halſed vp, and with good ſpeed landed at Dartmouth in Deuonſhire, from whence almoſt ſix moneths paſſed he took his iourne toward France (as before ye haue heard.) When the earle had taken land, he made proclamation in the name of king Henrie the ſirſt, vpon high paines commanding and charging all men able to beare arms, to prepare themſelues to fight againſt Edward duke of Borke, which contrarie to right had vſurped the crowne. It is almoſt not to be beleeued, how manie thouſands men of warre at the firſt tidings of the earles landing reſorted vnto him.

King Edward awakened with the newes of the earles landing, and the great repaire of people that came flocking in vnto him, ſent forth letters into all parts of his realme to raiſe an armie: but of them that were ſent for, few came, and yet of thoſe few the more part came with no great good willes. Which when he perceived, he began to doubt the matter, and therefore being accompanied with the duke of Gloceſter his brother, the lord Haſtings his cham-berlaine, which had married the earles ſiſter, and yet was ener true to the king his maſter, and the lord Seales brother to the queene, he departed into Lincolnſhire. And becauſe he vnderſtood that all the realme was vp againſt him, and ſome part of the earle of Marwikes power was within halfe a daies iourne of him, following the aduiſe of his counſell, with all haſt poſſible he paſſed the Waſhes in great ieopardie, & coming to Lin found there an Engliſh ſhip, and two hulkes of Holland readie (as fortune would) to make ſaile.

Wherevpon he with his brother the duke of Gloceſter, the lord Seales, and diuerſe other his truſtie friends, entered into the ſhip. The lord Haſtings taried a while after, exhorting all his acquaintance, that of neceſſitie ſhould tarie behind, to ſet to themſelues openlie as friends to king Henrie for their owne ſafegard, but hartlie required them in ſecret to continue faithfull to king Edward. This perſuaſion declared, he entered the ſhip with the other, and ſo they departed, being in number in that one ſhip and two hulkes, about ſeuē or eight hundred perſons, hauing no furniture of apparell or other neceſſarie things with them, ſauing apparell for warre. [For it was no taking of leaſure to prouide their corpoꝝall neceſſaries (though the want of them could hardlie be borne) in a caſe of preſent danger; conſidering that they were made againſt by the contrarie faction with ſuch ſwift purſute. And it had bene a point of extreme follie, to be carefull for the accidents, permitting in the meane time the ſubſtance vnto the ſpoile.]

As king Edward with ſaile and oꝝ was thus making courſe towards the duke of Burgognies countrie (whether he determined at the firſt to go) it chanced that ſeuē or eight gallant ſhips of Caſterlings, open enemies both to England and France, were abroad on thoſe ſeas, and eſpieng the kings beſſels, began to chaſe him. The kings ſhip was good of ſaile, and ſo much gat of the Caſterlings, that he came on the coaſt of Holland, and ſo deſcended lower befoze a towne in the countrie called Alquemare, and there caſt anchoꝝ as nere the towne as was poſſible, becauſe they could not enter the hauen at an ebbing water. The Caſterlings alſo approched the Engliſh ſhip, as nere as their great ſhips ſhould come at the low water, intending at the ſlowd to haue their prize: as they were verie like to haue attained it in deed, if the lord Cronture, gouernor of that countrie for the duke of Burgognie, had not by chance bene at the ſame time in that towne.

This lord (vpon knowledge had of king Edwards arriuall there in the hauen, and in what danger he ſtood by reaſon of the Caſterlings) commanded them not to be ſo hardie as once to meddle with anie Engliſhmen, being both the dukes friends and allies. Then did king Edward & all his companie come on land. Who after they had bene well reſreſhed & gentlelie comforted by the lord Cronture, they were by him brought to the Hagh, a rich towne in Holland, where they remained a while, hauing all things neceſſarie miniſtered to them by order of the duke of Burgognie, ſent vnto the lord Cronture, immediatlie vpon certifiat from the ſaid lord Cronture of king Edwards arriuall. [Here we ſee in what perplexities king Edward and his retinue were, partly by enemies at home in his owne countrie, whole hands he was conſtrained to ſie from by the helpe of the ſea; partly alſo by aduerſaries abroad, ſeeking oportunitie to offer him not the incounter onelie, but the ouerthrow. And ſuerly, had not god fortune ſauoured him, in preparing readie meanes for him to auoid thoſe imminent dangers; he had doubtleſſe fallen among the weapons of his owne countymen, and ſo neuer

fol. cix.

So to let all Englishmen (saith Edward Hall) consider (as before is rehearsed) what profit, what commodity, and what helpe in distresse, the mariage of the ladie Margaret, king Edwards sister to the duke Charles, did to him in his extreme necessitie; and but by that meane incurable extremitie: for his allies and confederats in Castile and Arragon were too far from him, either speedie to sie to, or shortly to come fro with any aid or armie. The French king was his extreme enemie, and friend to king Henrie, for whose cause in the king of Scots (for all the leage betwene them) he did put little confidence and lesse trust. The states and all Galliards were with him at open war, and yet by this marriage, God prouided him a place to sie to, both for refuge and release.

Abr. Flein.

[But for the further and clearer explanation of these stratagems, or rather ciuill tumults, it shall not be amisse to insert in this place (such I cannot hit by on one more convenient) a verie good note or addition received from the hands of maister John Hooker chamberlaine of Excester; the contents whereof are of such qualitie, that they cannot stand in concurrence with any matter introduced within the compass of the ninth yeare of this kings reigne (as he had quoted it) and therefore I thought it meet to transfer the same to this tenth yeare; considering that some part of the matter by him largelie touched, is briefelie in the premises already remembred.]

John Hooker, alias Vowell.

This yeare (saith he) was verie troublesome, and full of ciuill wars and great discords. For after that king Edward the fourth was escaped out of prison, at Wolneic besides Warwike, he mustered and prepared a new armie. Whereupon the earle of Warwike and the duke of Clarence, mistrusting themselves, prepared to passe the seas ouer to Calis, and first of all sent awaie the duches of Clarence daughter to the said earle, who was then great with child, and she being accompanied with the lord Fitz Warren, the lord Dinham, and the baron of Carew, and a thousand fighting men came to this citie of Excester the eighteenth daie of March, and was lodged in the bishops palace. Sir Hugh, or (as some saie) sir William Courtneie, who then fauoured the partie of king Edward the fourth, assembled a great trope and armie of all the friends he could make, and intironing the citie, besieged the same; he pulled downe all the bridges, rampered up all the waies, and stopped all the passages, so that no vittels at all could be brought to this citie for twelue daies together, which being done vpon a sudden and vnlooked for, vittels waied short and scant within the citie, and by reason of so great a multitude within the same, the people for want of food began to murmur and mutter.

Lord Dinham, and baron Carew, with

The duches and the lords of hir companie, mistrusting what might and would be the sequels hereof, began to deale with the maior, and required to haue the keyes of the gates to be deliuered into their hands and that they would undertake the safe custodie of the citie. Likewise sir William Courtneie did send his messenger to the maior, and required the gates to be opened and to giue him entrance; or els he would with sword and fier despoile the same. The maior and his brethren being in great perplexities, and hauing to answer not onelie the lords within and the knight without, but most of all doubting the common people within, who being impatient of penurie, were deafe to all persuasions and lient to any counsels: did so order and handle the matter, as that by god speedes and courteous vsages, euery partie was stopped and staied, untill by means and mediations of certeine god and godlie men, an intreatie was made, the matter was compounded and the siege raised, and euery man set at libertie.

The next daie after which conclusion, the gates being opened, to wit, the third of Aprill 1470, the earle of Warwike and the duke of Clarence came to this citie, and here rested, and sojourned themselves untill sufficient shipping was prouided for their passage ouer the seas, and then they all imbarked themselves, and passed ouer to Calis. The king in this meane time mustered his armie, and prepared with all speed all things necessarie to follow and pursue his said aduersaries, and came to this citie, thinking to find them here the fourteenth of Aprill being saturday daie 1470, with fortie thousand fighting men; but the birds were fled awaie before his coming. Nevertheless the king came and entred into the citie, being accompanied with sundrie noble men; namely, the bishop of Elie then lord treasurer, the duke of Suffolke earle marshall, the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Wilshire sonne to the duke of Buckingham, the earle of Worcester constable of England, the earle of Shrewsburie, the earle Kiuers, the lord Hastings, the lord Craie of Cobour, the lord Audelie, the lord Haie, the lord Sturton, the lord Dacres, the lord Pontioie, the lord Stanleie, the lord Ferris, and the baron of Dupleie.

And when the king was come nere to the citie, the maior being verie well attended with foure hundred persons well and seemelie appareled in the cities liuerie, went to the south gate, and without the same attended the kings coming. When he was come, the maior did his most humble obeisance, and therewith Thomas Doluist then recorder of the citie made vnto his grace an humble oration, congratulating his coming to the citie: which ended, the maior deliuered vnto the king the keyes of the gates and the maces of his office, and therewith a purse of one hundred nobles in gold, which his grace toke verie thankfullie. The monie he kept, but the keyes and the maces he deliuered backe to the maior; and then the maior toke the mace and did beare it through the citie bare-headed before the king, untill he came to his lodging.

About foure moneths after this, in August, the duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwike returned againe from Calis, with all their retinue, and landed some at Plimmouth, some at Dartmouth, and some at Ermothy: but all met in this citie, and from hence they all passed towards London, and at euery place they proclaimed king Henrie the first, which when king Edward heard, he was very much troubled therewith; and not able then to withstand their force, he passed the seas to his brother in law the duke of Burgognie.

gouvernement uncerteine, men were in great perplexities, & wist not what to do. And among manie there was one specialtie to be remembred, who to rid himselfe out of these troubles, did devise this practise: his name was sir William Haukeford knight, a man verie well learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the chiefe iustices at the law: he dwelled at Annoie in Devonshire, a gentleman of great possessions, and hauing neuer a sonne, the lord Fitz Warren, sir John Sentleger, & sir William Bulloine, who married his daughters, were his heires. This man being one of the chiefeest lawyers in the land, was daile sought to and his counsell asked: and he considering that when the sould ruled, law had a small course, and finding by experience what fruits in law such counsell as doth not best like the parties, was verie heauie, sorrowfull, and in great agonies.

Hereupon suddenly he called vnto him the keeper of his parke, with whom he fell out and quareled, because (as he said) he was slothfull and careless, and did not walke in the nights about the parke, but suffered his game to be spoiled and his deere to be stolen, wherefore he wished him to be more vigilant and carefull of his charge: and also commanded him that if he met any man in his circuit and walke in the night time, and would not stand nor speake vnto him, he should not spare to kill him what so euer he were. This knight, hauing laid this foundation, and minding to performe what he had purposed for the ending of his dolefull daies, did in a certeine darke night secretlie conueie himselfe out of his house, and walked alone in his parke. Then the keeper in his night walke hearing one stirring and comming towards him, asked who was there: but no answer was made at all.

Then the keeper tolled him to stand, which when he would not do, the keeper nocked his arrow and shot vnto him, and killed him: who when he perceived that it was his master, then he called to remembrance his masters former commandement. And so this knight, otherwise learned and wise, being affraid to displease man, did displesae God, and verie disorderlie ended his life. It is inrolled amongst the records of this citie, of a commission directed to John earle of Devonshire, & from him sent to the maior of the citie of Excester to be proclaimed. The words be these: Decimus quo die Aprilis, v. in vigilia Pasche, An. 49. Hen. 6. commissio domini regis directa Iohanni comiti Devon. iussu et maiori ut proclamaretur. And likewise in an other place: Quatuor marce sunt solute Iohanni comiti Devon. ex assensu maioris. Nowbeit, certeine it is there was no such earle of that name, onelie there was John Holland then living duke of Excester, wherefore something is mistaken herein.

But was this a practise (thinke you) becoming a man of worship, learning, and iudgement, to make awaie himselfe, because he saw a tempozall interruption of his prosperitie? Surelie how much learning so euer he had in the lawes of the land, litle at all or none (as appeareth) had he in suffering the forces of aduersitie, whom the feare of it did so terrifie, that it droue him to his end. Whise therefore is the counsell of the comede-writer, and worthe of imitation, that a man, when he is in best case and highest degre of welfare, should euen then meditate with himselfe how to awaie with hardnesse, with penurie, perils, losse, banishment, and other afflictions: for so shall he prepare himselfe to beare them with patience when they happen: as souldiers trained vp in militarie exercises at home, are so much the forwarder for the field, & fitter to incounter their foes (with lesse dread of danger) when they come abroad to be tried: and therefore it is wiselie (& to the purpose) said of Virgil:

But to returne to the princes affaires. When the same was once spread abroad that R. Edward was fled the realme, an innumerable number of people resorted to the earle of Marwike to take his part, but all R. Edwards trustie friends went to diuerse sanctuaries, and amongst other his wife quene Elizabeth toke sanctuarie at Westminster, and there in great penurie forsaken of all hir friends, was deliuered of a faire son called Edward, which was with a small pompe like a poore mans child christened, the godfathers being the abbat and prior of Westminster, and the godmother the ladie Scrope. [But what might be the heauinesse of this ladies hart (thinke we) upon consideration of so manie counterblasts of unhappinesse inwardlie conceiued? Hir husband had taken flight, his adherents and hir friends sought to shroud themselves vnder the couert of a new protecto, the diuine in distresse sought not that simple refuge which hir hard hap forced vpon hir; and (a kings wife) wanted in hir necessitie such things as meane mens wiues had in superfluitie, & (a corosive to a noble mind) a prince of renowned parentage was (by constraint of unkind fortune) not vouchsafed the solemnitie of christendome due and decent for so honorable personage.]

The Kentishmen in this season (whose minds be ever moueable at the change of princes) came to the suburbs of London, spoiled mansions, robbed heres houses, and by the counsell of sir Gessie Gates and other sanctuarie men, they brake vp the kings Bench and deliuered prisoners, and fell at Ratcliffe, Limehouse, & S. Katharins, to burning of houses, slaughter of people, and rauishing of women. Which small sparkle had growne to a greater flame, if the earle of Marwike with a great power had not suddenly quenched it, and punished the offenders: which benefit by him done, caused him much more to be esteemed and liked amongst the commons than he was before. When he had settled all things at his pleasure, vpon the twelue daie of October he rode to the Tower of London, and there deliuered king Henrie out of the ward, where he before was kept, and brought him to the kings lodging, where he was serued according to his degre.

On the five and twentieth day of the said moneth, the duke of Clarence accompanied with the earles of Marwike and Shrewesburie, the lord Strange, and other lords and gentlemen, some for feare, and some for loue, and some onelie to gaze at the waucering world, went to the Tower, and from thence brought king Henrie apparelled in a long gowne of blew velvet, through London to the church of saint Paule, the people on euerie side the streets reioysing and crieng; God saue the king: as though each thing had succeeded as they would haue had it: and when he had offered (as kings vse to do) he was conueied to the bishops palace, where he kept his household like a king. [Thus was the principallitie passed ouer sometimes to Henrie, sometimes to Edward; according to the waite of the partie preuailing: ambition and disdain still casting fagots on the fire, whereby the heat of hatred gathered the greater force to the consumption of the peeres and the destruction of the people. In the meane time, neither part could secretlie possesse the regalitie, when they obtained it; which highmindednesse was in the end the ouerthrow of both principals and accessories, according to the nature thereof noted in this distichon by the poet:

When king Henrie had thus readapted and effrons gotten his regall power and authoritie, he called his high court of parlement to begin the fir and twentieth day of Nouember, at Westminster, in the which king Edward was adjudged a traitor to the countrie, and an usurper of the realme. His goods were confiscated and forfeited. The like sentence was given against all his partakers and friends. And besides this it was enacted, that such as for his sake were apprehended, and were either in captivitie or at large upon suerties, should be extremelie punished according to their demerits, amongst whome was the lord Dapfer earle of Worcester lieutenant for king Edward in Ireland, exercising there more extreme crueltie than princelie pietie, and namelie on two infants being sonnes to the earle of Desmond.

[His earle of Worcester, being found in the top of an high thire, in the forest of Maibridge, in the countie of Huntingdon, was brought to London, and either for treason to him laid, or malice against him conceived, was attainted, and beheaded at the Tower hill, and after buried at the Blacke friers.] Moreover, all statutes made by king Edward were clearlie revoked, and the crownes of the realmes of England and France were by authoritie of the same parliament intailed to king Henrie the first, and to his heires male; and for default of such heires, to remaine to George duke of Clarence, & to his heires male: and further, the said duke was enabled to be next heire to his father Richard duke of Yorke, and to take from him all his landes and dignities, as though he had bene his eldest sonne at the time of his death. Jasper earle of Penbroke, and John earle of Arford, with divers other by king Edward attainted, were restored to their old names, possessions, and ancient dignities.

Beside this, the earle of Marwicke, as one to whom the common-wealth was much bounden (and ever had in great favour of the commons of this land, by reason of the exceeding household which he daily kept in all countries where ever he sojourned or laie: and when he came to London, he held such an house, that six oxen were eaten at a breakfast, and euerie tauerne was full of his meat, for who that had any acquaintance in that house, he should haue had as much sod and rest as he might carrie upon a long dagger) he (I saie) was made gouernour of the realme, with whom as fellows was associated George duke of Clarence. And thus was the state of the realme quite altered. So that this parliament came the marquesse Pontacute, excusing himselfe, that for feare of death he declined to take king Edwards part, with excuse was accepted. When quene Margaret vnder stood by hir husbands letters, that the victorie was gotten by their friends, she with hir sonne prince Edward and hir traine entered their ships, to take their vantage into England: but the winter was so sharpe, the weather so stormie, and the wind so contrarie, that she was faine to take land againe, and to deferre hir iourne till another season.

About the same season, Jasper earle of Penbroke went into Wales, to visit his lands in Penbroke shire, where he found lord Henrie sonne to his brother Edmund earle of Richmond, hauing not full ten yeares of age; he being kept in maner like a captiue, but honorable brought up by the ladie Herbert, late wife to William earle of Penbroke, beheaded at Banburie (as ye before haue heard.) This Henrie was borne of Margaret the onelie daughter and heire of John the first duke of Summer set, then not being full ten yeares of age, the which ladie though she were after ioined in marriage with lord Henrie sonne to Humfrey duke of Buckingham, and after to Thomas Stanleie earle of Derby, both being young and apt for generation, yet she had neuer ante more children, as though she had done hir part to bring forth a man child, and the same to be a king (as he after was indeed) intituled by the name of Henrie the seventh (as after ye shall heare.)

The earle of Penbroke took this child, being his nephew, out of the custodie of the ladie Herbert, and at his returne brought the child with him to London to king Henrie the first, whome when the king had a good while beheld, he said to such princes as were with him: Lo, suerlie this is he, to whom both we and our aduersaries leauing the possession of all things shall hereafter giue rowne and place. So this holie man shewed before the chance that should happen, that this earle Henrie so ordeined by God, should in time to come (as he did indeed) haue and enjoy the kingdome and whole rule of this realme of England. So that it might seeme probable by the coherence of holie Hennes predictions with the issue falling out in truth with the same; that for the time he was imbued with a propheticall spirit. And suerlie the epithet or title of holie is not for naught attributed vnto him, for it is to be read in wryters, that he was by nature giuen to peaceableness, abhorring blood and slaughter, detesting ciuill tumults, addicted to deuotion, he re frequent in prayer, and not esteeming so highlie of courtlie gallantness as stood with the dignitie of a prince. In consideration wherof, he procured against himselfe an apostasie of his people both native and forren; who revolted and fell from fealtie. And whie The reason is rendred by the same wryter, namelie:

Quod tales homines populus seclerator odit, Fastidit, detestatur: non conuenit inter

Virtutem & vitium, lucem fugere tenebra.]

The earle of Marwicke, vnderstanding that his enemy the duke of Burgognie had receiued king Edward, and meant to aid him for recouerie of the kingdome, he first sent over to Calis foure hundred archers on horsebacke to make warre on the dukes countries; and further, prepared foure thousand balliant men to go ouer shortly, that the duke might haue his hands euen full of trouble at home. And where ye haue heard that the erle of Marwicke was kept out of Calis at his fleeing out of England into France, ye shall note that within a quarter of an houre after it was knowne that he was returned into England; and had chased king Edward out of the realme; not onelie monsieur de Glanciere, but also all other of the garrison & towne shewed themselves to be his friends; so that the ragged staffe was taken up and woene in euerie mans cap, some wore it of gold enameled, some of silver; and he that could haue it neither of gold nor silver, had it of whitish silke or cloth: such wauering minds haue the common people, bending like a reed with euerie wind that bloweth.

The duke of Burgognie, hauing an armie ready at the same time to invade the frontiers of France, to recouer the towne of saint Quintins and Amiens, latelie by the French king taken from him, doubted to be hindered greatly by the Englishmen, if he should be constrained to haue warre with them: for the duke of Burgognie held not onlie at that season Flanders, but also Bulleine, and Wallernois, and all Artois, so that he was thereby in danger to receiue harme out of Calis on each side. Therefore he sent ambassadors thither, which did so much with the counsell there, that the league was netwile confirmed betwixt the realme of England and the dukes countries; onelie the name of Henrie put in the writing in stead of Edward. This matter hindered sore the sute of king Edward, daile suing to the duke for aid at his hands, the more earnestlie indeed, because of such promises as by letters were made vnto him out of England, from his assured friends there.

But duke Charles would not consent openly to aid king Edward; but yet secretly vnder hand by others he lent vnto him fiftie thousand crowens of the cross of S. Andrew, and further caused foure great ships to be appointed for him in the haven of de Clere, otherwile called Camphire in Zeland, which in those daies was free for all men to come vnto, and the duke hired for him fouretene ships of the Casters lings well appointed, & for the more suertie toke a bond of them to serue him trulie, till he were landed in England, and fiftene daies after. The Casters lings were glad of this tournie, trusting if he got againe the possession of England, they should the sooner come to a peace, and obtaine restitution of their liberties and franchises, which they claimed of former time to haue within this realme. The duke of Burgonie cared not much, on whose side the victorie fell, sauing for payment of his monie: for he would oft saie, that he was friend to both parties, and either part was friendlie to him.

In dad, as he was bother in law to the one, so was he of kin to the other, as by his grandmother being daughter to John of Gant duke of Lancaster. When therefore all king Edwards furniture and prouision for his tournie were once readie, hauing now with him about two thousand able men of warre, beside mariners, he entered into the ships with them, in the haven before flissing in Zeland, vpon the second day of March: and because the wind fell not good for his purpose, he taried still aboord for the space of nine daies, before it turned meet for his tournie. But after that the wind once came about (as he wisht) the sails were hoisted vp on the 11 of March being monday, & forwarde they sailed, directing their course straight ouer towards the coast of Dorsetholke. On the next day being tuesday, & the twelue of March, toward the evening, they roode before Cromer, where the king sent to land sir Robert Chamberleine, with sir Gilbert Debenham knights, and diuerse other, to the end they might discouer the countrie, and vnderstand how the people within the land were bent towards him, especiallie those countries there next adioining.

Upon their returne, he vnderstood that there was no suertie for him to land in those parties, by reason of the good order which the earle of Warwike, and the earle of Devon, especiallie had taken in that countrie to resist him: for not onelie the duke of Dorsetholke, but all other the gentlemen (whome the earle of Warwike had in anie suspicion) were by letters of priuie seale sent for, and either committed to safe keeping about London, or else enforced to find suertie for their loiall demeanour towards king Henrie: yet those knights and other that were thus sent south to make inquirie, were well receiued of their friends, and had good cheare. But after the king perceiued by their report, how things stood thereabouts, he caused his ships to make course towards the north parts.

The same night following, a great storme of winds and weather rose, soze troubling the seas, and continued till the fourteenth day of that moneth being thursday, on the which day with great danger, by reason of the tempestuous rage and torment of the troubled seas, he arrived at the head of Humber, where the other ships were scattered from him, each one secured from other, so that of necessitie they were driven to land in sunder where they best might, for doubt to be cast awaie in that perillous tempest. The king with the lord Hastings his chamberleine, and other to the number of foure hundred men being in one ship, landed within Humber on Holdernesse side, at a place called Kaenspurgh, even in the same place where Henrie erle of Derby, after called king Henrie the fourth landed, when he came to depriue king Richard the second of the crowne, and to usurpe it to himselfe.

Richard duke of Gloucester, and three hundred men in his companie, toke land in another place foure miles distant from thence, where his brother king Edward did land. The earle Rivers, and with him two hundred men, landed at a place called Dole, foureteen miles from the haven where the king came on land. The residue of his people landed some here some there, in place where for their suerties they thought best. On the morrow, being the fiftenth of March, now that the tempest ceased, and euerie man being got to land, they dyed from euerie of their landing places towards the king, who for the first night was lodged in a poore village, two miles from the place where he first set foot on land. [As for his traine, though the season of the yere was naturallie cold, & therefore required competent refection by warmth, it is to be supposed, that all their lodgings were hard enough, with the principals prouision was sozie enough. But what of that? Better (in cases of extremite) an hard shift than none at all.]

Touching the folks of the countrie, there came few or none to him. For by the incensing of such as had bin sent into those parts from the erle of Warwike, and other his aduersaries, the people were the more induced to stand against him. But yet, in respect of the good will that manie of them had borne to his father, they could haue bene content, that he should haue inioied his right to his due inheritance of the duchie of Yorke, but in no wise to the title of the crowne. And herevpon they suffered him to passe, not seeking to annoie him, till they might vnderstand more of his purposed meaning. The king, perceiuing how the people were bent, noised abroad that he came to make none other chalenge but to his inheritance of the duchie of Yorke: and withall ment to passe first into the citie of Yorke, and so forwarde towards London, to incounter with his aduersaries that were in the south parts.

For although his nereest waite had bene through Lincolneshire: yet because in taking that waite he must haue gone againe to the water, in passing ouer Humber, he doubted least it would haue bin thought that he had withdrawne himselfe to the sea for feare. And to auoid the rumors that might haue bene spread thereof, to the hinderance of his whole cause, he refused that waite, and toke this other, still byuting it (as before we said) that his coming was not to chalenge the crowne, but onelie to be restozed vnto his fathers right and inheritance of the duchie of Yorke, which was descended to him from his father. And here it seemed that the colour of iustice hath euer such a force in it selfe amongst all men, that where before few or none of the commons could be found that would offer themselves to take his part: yet now that he did (as they thought) claime nothing but that which was his right, they began straight to haue a liking of his cause.

And where there were gathered to the number of six or seuen thousand men in diuerse places, vnder the leading chiefe of a priest and of a gentleman called Martine de la Mare, in purpose to haue stopped his passage: now the same persons toke occasion to assist him. And when he perceiued mens minds to be well qualified with this feined deuise, he marched south till he came to Benerleie, which stood in his direct waie as he passed toward Yorke. He sent also to Kingston vpon Hull, distant from thence six miles, willing that he might be there receiued: but the inhabitants, who had bene laboured by his aduersaries, refused in anie wise to grant therevnto.

The earle of Warwike aduertised by messengers of king Edwards arrivall, and of his turning toward Yorke, with all hast wrote to his brother the marquisse Montacute, who had laine at the castell of Pomfret all the last winter with a great number of soldiers, willing him to consider in what case their affaires stood, and thereupon with all speed to set upon king Edward, or else to keepe the passages, and to staie him from comming anie further forward, till he himselfe as then being in Warwicke shire busie to assemble an armie, might come to his aid with the same. Thus laboured the earle of Warwicke by policie and puaissance, as well of his owne as others power, to further his owne purpose, hauing sworne in heart a due performance of that, which he had solemnlie vowed and promised before.]

But this notwithstanding, although there were great companies of people of the countries there abouts assembled, yet they came not in sight of the king, but suffered him quietly to passe; either because they were persuaded that he went (as he in outward words pretended) not to claime anie title to the crowne, but onelie his right to the duchie of Yorke; or else for that they doubted to set upon him, although his number were farre unequal to theirs; knowing that not onelie he himselfe, but also his compaignie were minded to sell their liues dearlie, before they would thinke an inch from anie that was to incounter them. It maie be that diuerse of the captiues also were corrupted: and although outwardlie they showed to be against him, yet in heart they bare him right good will, and in no wise minded to hinder him. So forward he marched, till he came to Yorke, on a monday being the eighteenth day of March.

Before he came to the citie by the space of thre miles, the recorder of Yorke, whose name was Thomas Coniers (one knowne in deed not to beare him anie faithfull good will) came vnto him; & gaue him to vnderstand, that it stood in no wise with his sacredtie, to presume to approach the citie: for either he should be kept out by force, or if he did enter, he shuld be in danger to be cast away by his aduersaries that were within. King Edward neuertheless, sith he was come thus farre forward, knew well enough there was no going backe for him, but manfullie to proceed forward with his begun iourne, and therefore kept on his way. And hostlie after there came to him out of the citie, Robert Clifford, and Richard Burgh, who assured him that in the quarell which he pretended to pursue, to wit, for the obtaining of his right to the duchie of Yorke, he should not faile but be receiued into the citie.

But immediatlie after came the said Coniers againe, with the like tale and information as he had brought before. And thus king Edward one while put in comfort, and another while discouraged, marched forth till he came to the gates of the citie, where his people staied; whilst he and about sixtene or seuentene other such as he thought meetest, went forth and entered the citie with the said Clifford & Burgh. And (as some write) there was a priest readie to saie masse, in which masse time the king receiued the sacrament of the communion, & there solemnlie swore to keepe and obserue two speciall articles: although it was farre unlike that he minded to obserue either of them: the one was that he should vse the citizens after a gentle and courteous maner: and the other, that he should be faithfull and obedient vnto king Henries commandments.

For this wilfull periturie (as hath bene thought) the issue of this king suffered (for the fathers offense) the deprivation not onelie of lands and worldly possessions, but also of their naturall liues, by their cruell uncle E. Richard the third. And it may well be. For it is not likelie that God, in whose hands is the bestowing of all soueraintie, will suffer such an indignitie to be done to his sacred maiestie, and will suffer the same to passe with impunity, And surely, if an oth among pinate men is religi-ouslie to be kept, sith in the same is an exact trial of faith and honestie; doublelesse of princes it is verie nicelie and preciselie to be obserued: yea they shoul rather susteine a blemish and disgrace in their roialtie, than presume to go against their oth and promise, speciallie if the same stand upon conditions of equitie: otherwise they proue themselves to be impugn-ers of fidelitie, which is a ietwell surpassing gold in price and estimation, as the poet prouidentlie saith:

When king Edward had thus gotten into the citie of Yorke, he made such meanes among the citizens, that he got of them a certaine summe of monie; and leauing a garison within the citie contrarie to his oth, for feare least the citizens after his departure, might happilie moue some rebellion against him, he set forward the next day toward Doncaster, a towne ten miles from thence, belonging to the earle of Northumberland. The next day he toke his waie toward Wakefield and Shendall, a castell and lordship belonging to the inheritance of the dukes of Yorke, leauing the castell of Pontefract upon his left hand, where the marques Montacute with his armie laie, and did not once offer to stop him.

Whether the marques suffered him to passe by so with his good will or no, diuerse haue diuerlie coniectured. Some thinke that it lay not in the power of the marques grea tie to annoie him, both for that the king was well beloued in those parties; & againe, all the lords & commons there for the most part were towards the earle of Northumberland, and without him or his commandment they were not willing to stirre. And therefore the earle in sitting still and not moving to and fro, was thought to do king Edward as good seruice as if he had come to him, and raised people to assist him; for diuerse happilie that shoul haue come with him, remembryng displeasures past, would not haue bene so faithfull as the earle himselfe, if it had come to the sumpe of anie hazard of battell.

About Wakefield and the parts there adioining, some compaignie of his frends came to him, whereby his power was increased; but nothing in such numbers as he looked for. From Wakefield he crossed on the left hand, so to come againe into the high waie, and came to Doncaster, and from thence vnto Nottingham. Here came to him sir William Barre, and sir James Harrington, with six hundred men well armed and appointed: also there came to him sir Thomas Burgh, & sir Thomas Montgomerie with their aids, which caused him at their first comming to make proclamation in his owne name, to wit, of E. Edward the fourth, boldlie affirming to him, that they would serue no man but a king.

Whilst he remained at Nottingham, and also before he came there, he sent abroad diuerse of his auant courters to discouer the countrie, and to vnderstand if there were anie power gathered against him. Some of them that were thus sent, approached to Retwarke, and vnderstood that within the towne there, the duke of Cresseier, the earle of Drenford, the lord Bardolfe, and other were lodged with a great power to the number of foure thousand men, with a power as they had assembled in Essex, Suffolke, Suffolke, and in the shires of Cambridge, Huntington, and Lincolne. The duke of Cresseier, and the earle of Drenford, with other the chiefe captiues, advertised that king Edwards supporters had bene afore the towne in the evening, supposed verelie that he and his whole armie were comming towards them.

Whereupon, they not thinking it good to abide longer there, determined with all speed to dislodge, and is about two of the clocke after midnight they departed from Retwarke, leauing some of their peotheir fellows. In deed the foreriders that so discou-red them within the towne of Newark, advertised the king thereof in all post haste, who incontinentlie assembled his people, and forthwith marched to-the towne, he had knowledge that they were fled and gone from Newark. Whereupon he returned againe to Nottingham, intending to keepe on his narunderstood to be departed from London, and to be come into Warwickshire, where in the countries adjoining he was busied in levying an armie, with the which he purposed to distress him.

The king then from Nottingham came to Leicester, where three thousand able men, and well furnished for the warre came unto him. These were such as he knew would live and die in his quarrell, the most part of them belonging unto the lord Hastings the kings chamberlaine. And thus he, being more strongly accompanied than before, departed from Leicester, and came before the walls of the citie of Coventrie, the nine and twentieth daie of March. The earle of Warwick was withdrawne into this citie, keeping himselfe inclosed therein with his people, being in number six or seven thousand men. The king sent to him, and willed him to come forth into the field, and there to make an end of the quarrell in plaine battell: but the earle at that present refused so to do.

For although, under pretense of king Henries authoritie, he was reputed the kings generall lieutenant of the whole realme, whereby he had got such power together, as was thought able enough to match with the king for number; yet because he doubted how they were bent in his favour, he durst not commit the matter unto the doubtfull chance of battell, till he had more of his trustie friends about him. The king therefore three daies together provoked him to come forth, but when he saw it would not be, he removed to Warwick an eight miles from Coventrie, where he was received as king, and so made his proclamations from that time forth in all places where he came, under his accustomed name and title of king.

He lodged here at Warwick, the rather (as was thought) to provoke the earle to issue forth of Couen-trie to give him battell, howbeit that denie nothing wanted. But yet there came daile diuerse persons on the earls behalfe to treat with the king about a peace, that some good composition might haue bene concluded; & the king for the advancement of peace and tranquillitie within the realme, offered large conditions; as a free pardon of life to the earle, and all his people, with manie other beneficall articles on their behalves, which to manie seemed verie reasonable, considering their heinous offenses. But the earle would not accept any offers, except he might haue compounded so as it pleased himselfe, & as was thought in no wise to stand with the kings honour, and suertie of his estate.

In this meane while, the earle of Warwick still looked for the duke of Clarence, who by the said earls appointment had assembled a power of men of war about London: but when the earle perceived that the duke lingered forth the time, and did not use such diligence as was requisite, as one that had bene in doubt of warre or peace, he began to suspect that the duke was of his brother corrupted, and therein he was nothing deceived. For true it is, that whilst the king was as yet beyond the seas, in the dominion of the duke of Burgonie, the duke of Clarence began to weie with himselfe the great inconvenience into the which as well his brother king Edward, as himselfe and his younger brother the duke of Gloucester were fallen, through the dissention betwixt them: (which had bene compassed and brought to passe by the politike working of the earle of Warwick and his compliers.)

As first the dissentering of them all from their right full title to the crowne; secondlie the mortall and detestable war that could not but insue betwixt them, to such mischance, that to whether part the victorie inclined, the victor should remaine in no more suertie of his owne person or estate after the upper hand got, than before; and thirdlie he well perceived already,
 that he was had in great suspicion, and not heartlie beloved of any the lords and rulers that were assured partakers with king Henrie and the Lancastrian faction: inso much they stuck not daile to go about to breake and make void the appointments, articles, and covenants, made and promised to him, and of likelihood would daile more and more intend thereto: for in truth he saw, that they purposed nothing so much as the destruction both of him and all his blood.

All which things throughlie considered, with manie other as they were laid afore him by right wise and circumspect persons, which in this behalfe had conference with him, he consented that by some secret waies and meanes a reconciliation might be had betwixt him and his brethren, the king and the duke of Gloucester. The which to bring to some good and full effect, these honorable personages following became dealers therein. First of all the duchesse of Burghie their mother, the duchesse of Gloucester, and the duchesse of Suffolke their sisters; the lord cardinall of Cantuarie, the bishop of Bath, the earle of Essex; but most speciallie the duchesse of Burgonie their sister also, and diuerse other right wise and prudent personages, who wrought by mediation of certeine priuie messengers, such as they vied for messengers betwixt them.

Finallie, by the earnest trauell and diligence shewed by the said duchesse of Burgonie (who incessantlie sent to and fro such hir trustie messengers now to the king being on that side the seas, and then to the duke remaining here in England) at length they were made friends, and a perfect agreement concluded and ratified, with assurance betwixt them so strong-lie as might be. To the furthering whereof the kings chamberlaine the lord Hastings failed not to doe his best, so as by his good diligence, it was thought the king was the sooner induced to wish to soine ef-fowes in true friendship with his said brother of Clarence. And as it well appeared, the duke of Clarence acquitted himselfe faithfullie therein.

For hearing now that his brother king Edward was landed and comming forthward towards London, he gathered his people, outwardlie pretending to passe with them to the aid of the earle of Warwicke against his brother: although inwardlie he meant the contrarie, and so accompanied with about foure thousand men, he marched forth towards the place where he thought to find his brother. King Edward being then at Warwick, and understanding that his brother of Clarence approached, in an after-none issued forth of that towne with all his forces, and passed on till he came into a faire large field three miles distant from Warwick towards Banburie, where he might behold his brother of Clarence in good arraie of battell, comming towards him.

When they were now within halfe a mile appro-ched together, the king placed his people in order of battell under their baners, and so left them standing still, and appointed them to keepe their ground, whilst he taking with him his brother of Gloucester, the lord Hastings, and others,

The brethren meet louinglie together.

Buchan, in
p. 413.

Kinners, the lord Hastings, & a few other, went forth to meet his brother of Clarence: and in like sort the duke of Clarence took with him a few of the nobilitie that were about him, and leaving his armie in good order, departed from them to meet the king, and so they met betwixt both the hoasts, with so sweet salutations, louing demeanour, and good countenances, as better might not be deuised betwixt brethren of so high and noble estate. What a hearts ioy was this to the people, to see such an accord and mutual at-

Besides this, the like friendlie intertainment, and courteous demeanour appeared in the saluting of other noble men that were on them attendant; where of all such as saw it, and loved them, greatlie reioiced; giuing God thanks for that ioyfull meeting, vnitie, and concord, appearing thus manifestlie betwixt them: and herewith the trumpets and other instruments sounded, & the king withall brought the duke vnto his armie, whom he saluting in most courteous wise, welcomed them into the land; and they humbly thanking him, did to him such reuerence as appertained to the honour of such a worthy personage. This was a goodlie and a gracious reconcilment, beneficiall to the princes, profitable to the peeres, and pleasurable to the people, whose part had bene deepe in dangers and losse, if discord had not bene discontinued.

This done, the king leauing his hoast againe, keeping their ground with the same few persons which he took with him before, went with his brother of Clarence vnto his armie, and saluting them with sweete and courteous words, was so fullie of them welcomed: and so after this, they all came together toying in one. And either part shewing themselves glad thus to meet as friends with the other, they went louinglie together vnto Warwicke with the king, where and in the countrie thereabouts they lodged, as they thought stood most with their ease and safeties. Herewith the duke of Clarence desired a boue all things to procure some good and perfect accord betwixt his brother the king, and the earle of Warwicke.

In this was he the more studious, because he saw that such an accord should bring great quietnesse to the land, and deliuer the common-wealth of manie dangers that might insue by reason of such numbers of partakers, as well lords as other that were confederat with the earle. The said duke treated with the king present, and sent messengers vnto Countreie to the earle, mouing as well the one as the other most instantlie to frame their minds vnto a pacification. The king at the instance of his brother was contented to offer large conditions, and verie beneficiall for the earle and his partakers; if they would haue accepted them.

But the earle, whether vtterlie despairing of his owne safetie, if he should agree to any peace; or else hapilie for that he thought it stood with his honour to stand vnto such promises and covenants as he had made with the French king, and with the queene Margaret, and his sonne prince Edward (to whom he was bound by oth not to thinke or sparue from the same) he refused all manner of such conditions as were offered. Insomuch that when the duke had sent to him, both to excuse himselfe of the act which he had done, and also to require him to take some good waie with king Edward, now while he might, the earle (after he had patientlie heard the dukes message) he seemed greatlie to abhorre his vnfaithfull dealing, in turning thus from his confederats and allies, contrary to his oth and fidelitie.

To the messengers (as some write) he gave none other answer but this, that he had rather be like himselfe, than like a false and perjured duke; and that he was fullie determined neuer to leaue warre, till he had either lost his owne life, or vtterlie subdued his enemies. As it was thought, the earle of Wrenfords persuasion wanted not, to make him the more listlie to hold out; and rather to trie the bittermost hazard of warre, than to agree to acknowledge king Edward for his lawfull soueraigne lord and king. Whereupon no appointment nor any agreement at all could be brought to passe; and so all that treatie, which the duke of Clarence had procured, brake off & took none effect. There came to the earle of Warwicke, whilste he late thus at Countreie (besides the earle of Wrenfords) the duke of Excester, and the lord marquisse Montacute, by whose coming that side was greatlie strengthened, and the number much increased.

The king, vpon consideration hereof, and perceiving he could not get the earle to come forth of Countreie, departed from Warwicke, and estones shewing himselfe with his people before the citie of Countreie, desired the earle and his power to come forth into the fields, that they might end their quarrell by battell: which the earle and the other lords with him vtterlie refused as then to do. This was the first of April being fridaie. The king hereupon was resolved to march towards London, where his principall aduersarie king Henrie remained, vnto his kinglie authoritie by diuerse such of the nobilitie as were about him, whereby king Edward was barred and disappointed of manie aids and assistants, which he was sure to haue, if he could once breake that force of the roiall authoritie, that was still thus exercised against him in king Henries name.

Wherefore (by the aduise of his brethren and others of his counsell) accordinglie as it had bene ordeined before this his last setting forth from Warwicke, he kept on his waie towards London, coming to Dantrie on the saturday at night: & on the morow being Palmesundae, he heard seruice in the church there, & after rode to Portsmouth, where he was so fullie receiued. From thence he took the next way towards London, leauing continually behind him (as he passed forth) a competent band of speares and archers, to beat backe such of the earle of Warwicks people, as peraduenture he might send abroad to trouble him and his armie by the waie. Which providence and foresight he thought it not vnneccessarie to be; for that he knew well enough, that the heart of an enimie, frieng in the fire of hateful hostility, will pretermitt no oportunitie either of time or place to laie in wait for his destruction, against whom he beareth an inward grudge, with a desire of vengeance to the death.

In this meane while, that things passed in manner (as before ye haue hard) Edmund duke of Summerset, & his brother John marguerite Dorset, & Thomas Courtneie earle of Deuonshire, and others being at London, had knowledge by aduertisements out of France, that queene Margaret with her sonne prince Edward, the countesse of Warwicke, the prior of St. Johns, the lord Wenlocke, and diuerse others their adherents and partakers, with all that they might make, were ready at the sea side, purposing with all speed to saile ouer into England, and to arrive in the west countrie. Whereupon they departed forth of London, and with all hast possible betwixt westward, there to raise what forces they could, to ioine with those their friends, immediatlie after they should once come on land, and so to assist them against king Edward.

Edward and his partakers.

True it is, that the queene with hir sonne, and the other persons before mentioned, toke their ships, the foure and twentieth daie of March, continuing on the seas before they could land (thorough tempests and contrarie winds) by the space of twentie daies, that is, till the thirtieth of Aprill: on which daie, or rather on the fourteenth, they landed at Welmouth, as after shall appeare. But now touching king Edwards proceeding forward on his iourne toward London, ye haue to vnderstand, that vpon the tuesdaye the ninth of Aprill he came to saint Albons, from whence he sent comfortable aduertisements to the queene his wife remaining within the sanctuarie at Westminister, and to others his faithfull friends in and about London, to vnderstand by couert meanes how to deale to obtaine the fauour of the citizens, so as he might be of them receiued.

The earle of Marwick, vnderstanding all his doings and purposes, wrote to the Londoners, willing & charging them in anie wise to keepe king Edward out of their citie, and in no condition to permit him to enter: and withall he sent to his brother the archbishop of Poike, willing him by all meanes possible to perswade the Londoners not to receiue him; but to defend the citie against him for the space of two or three daies at the least: promising not to faile but to come after him, and to be ready to assaile him on the backe, not doubting but wholie to distresse his power and to bring him to utter confusion. The archbishop hereupon, on the ninth of Aprill, called vnto him at Paules, all such lords, knights, and gentlemen, with others that were partakers on that side, to the number in all of six or seauen thousand men in armour.

Here with also he caused king Henrie to mount on horsebacke, and to ride from Paules thorough Cheape downe to Walbrooke, & so to fetch a compasse (as the custome was when they made their generall processions) returning backe againe to Paules vnto the bishops palace, where at that time he was lodged. The archbishop supposed, that shewing the king thus riding thorough the streets, he should haue allured the citizens to assist his part. True it is, the mayor & aldermen had caused the gates to be kept with watch and ward: but now they well perceiued that king Henries power was too weake, as by that the which had well appeared, to make full resistance against king Edward, and so not for them to trust vnto, if king Edward came forward, and should attempt to enter the citie by force: for it was not vnknowne vnto them, that manie of the worshipfull citizens, and others of the commons in great numbers, were fullie bent to aid king Edward, in all that they might, as occasion serued.

Thus, what thorough loue that manie bare to king Edward, and what thorough feare that diuerse stood in, least the citie being taken by force might happlie haue bene put to the sacke; with the losse of manie an innocent mans life; the mayor, aldermen, and others the worshipfull of the citie fell at a point among themselves, to keepe the citie to R. Edwards use, so as he might haue free passage and entrie into the same at his pleasure. The archbishop of Poike, perceiuing the affections of the people, and how the most part of them were now bent in fauour of king Edward vpon the said kings approach towards the citie, he sent forth secretlie a messenger to him, beseeching him to receiue him againe into his fauour, promising to be faithfull to him in time to come, and to acquit this good tunc hereafter with some singular benefit and pleasure.

The king, vpon good causes and considerations shew vnto him mouing, was contented to receiue him againe into his fauour. The archbishop hereof assured, reioiced greatlie, well & tralie acquitting him concerning his promise made to the king in that behalf. The same night following was the Tower of London recovered to king Edwards use. And on the morowe being thursdaie, and the eleuenth of Aprill, king Edward quietlie made his entrie into the citie with his power, hauing five hundred smoke gunners marching foremost, being strangers, of such as he had brought ouer with him. He first rode vnto Paules church, & from thence he went to the bishops palace, where the archbishop of Poike presented himselfe vnto him, and hauing king Henrie by the hand, deliuered him vnto king Edward, who being seized of his person, and diuerse other his aduersaries, he went from Paules to Westminister, where he made his deuout prayers, giving God most heartie thanks for his safe returne thither againe.

This done, he went to the queene to comfort hir, who with great patience had abidden there a long time, as a sanctuarie woman, for doubt of hir enemies; and in the meane season was deliuered of a yong prince, whome she now presented vnto him, to his great hearts reioicing & comfort. From Westminister the king returned that night vnto London againe, hauing the queene with him, and lodged in the house of the duchesse his mother. On the morowe being good fridaie, he toke aduise with the lords of his blood, and other of his counsell, for such businesse as he had in hand; namelie, how to subdue his enemies as sought his destruction. Thus with consultation preventing his actions, he obtained fortunate successe, wherewith his hart was the more aduanced to soine issue with his aduersaries, whome (rather than they should triumph ouer him) he was resolute minded to banquish, if his proceedings might proue prosperous as his present good lucke.

The earle of Marwick, calling himselfe lieutenant of England, vnder the pretended authoritie of king Henrie, hoping that king Edward should haue much ado to enter into London, marched forth from Couentrie with all his puissance, following the king by Northampton, in hope to haue some great advantage to assaile him, speciallie if the Londoners kept him out of their citie, as he trusted they would; for then he accounted himselfe sure of the vpper hand: or if he were of them receiued, yet he hoped to find him vnprepared in celebrating the feast of Easter; and so by setting vpon him on the sudden, he doubted not by that meanes to distresse him. But king Edward, hauing intelligence of the earles intention, prouided all things necessarie for battell; & hearing that the earle of Marwick was now come vnto S. Albons with his armie, he determined to march forth to encounter him before he should approach neare the citie.

The earle of Marwick, accompanied with John duke of Gloucester, Edmund duke of Summerset, John earle of Oxford, and John Penill marquisse Montacute his brother, vnderstanding that king Edward was not onelie receiued into London, but also had got king Henrie into his hands, perceiued that the trial of the matter must needs be committed to the hazard of battell, and therefore being come to the towne of saint Albons, he rested there a while, partlie to refresh his souldiers, and partlie to take counsell how to proceed in his enterprisse. At length, although he knew that his brother the marquisse Montacute was not fullie well perswaded with himselfe, to like of this quarell which they had in hand; yet the brotherlie affection betwixt them toke auaile all suspicion from the earle, and so he utterly resolved to giue battell, meaning to trie whereto all this tumult would grow; and counting it a blemish to his honor, not to prosecute that with the sword, which he had so lemmellie lemnelie tolced to do on his word.]

Herupon remoued they towards Barnet, a towne standing in the midwaie betwixt London and saint Albons aloft on a hill; at the end whereof towards saint Albons there is a faire plaine for two armies to meet vpon, named Gladmore heath. On the further side of which plaine towards saint Albons the earle pight his campe. King Edward on the other part, being furnished with a mightie armie (hauing ioined to that power which he brought with him certaine new supplies) vpon Easter euen the thirteenth of Aprill in the after none marched forth, hauing his said armie diuided into foure battels. He took with him king Henrie, and came that euening vnto Barnet, ten small miles distant from London; in which towne his foreriders finding certaine of the earle of Marwikes foreriders, beat them out, & chased them somewhat further than halfe a mile from the towne, where, by an hedge side they found readie assembled a great number of the earle of Marwikes people.

The king after this comming to Barnet, would not suffer a man to remaine in the towne (that were of his host) but commanded them all to the field, and with them drew toward his enemies, and lodged with his armie more nere to them than he was aware of, by reason it was darke, so as he could not well discern where they were incamped, fortifying the field the best he could for feare of some sudden inuasion. He took his ground not so euen asore them as he would haue done, if he might haue discovered the place where they had lien; and by reason thereof he incamped somewhat aside slips of them, causing his people to keepe as much silence as was possible, least making anie noise with the busseling of their armour and weapons or otherwise with their tongues, the enemy might haue come to some knowledge of the kings priuie purpose, and so by preuention haue disappointed his policie by some ppointment deuise; which because they wanted for the present time, it turned to their disadvantage; after the old prouerbe:

Artillerie.

They had great artillerie on both parts, but the earle was better furnished therewith than the king, and therefore in the night time they shot off from his campe in maner continuallie; but doing little hurt to the kings people, still overshooting them, by reason they late much nerer than the earle or anie of his men did esteeme. And such silence was kept in the kings campe, that no noise betwixt them where they late. For to the end it should not be knowne to the enemies, how nere the king with his armie was lodged vnto them, the king would not suffer anie of his gunnes in all that night to be shot off, least thereby they might haue gessed the ground, and so leuelled their artillerie to his annoyance.

A good policie.

Carelie on the next morning betwixt foure and siue of the clocke, notwithstanding there was a great mist that letted the sight of both parts to discover the fields, the king aduanced his banners, and caused his trumpets to sound to the battell. On the other part, the earle of Marwike, at the berie beake of the date, had likewise set his men in order of battell in this maner. In the right wing he placed the marquisse Montacute, and the earle of Driford with certaine horsemen, and he with the duke of Excester took the left wing. And in the middell betwixt both, he set archers, appointing the duke of Sumner to set to guide them as their chieftaine. King Edward had set the duke of Gloucester in the foreward. The middleward he himselfe with the duke of Clarence, hauing with them king Henrie, did rule & gouerne. The lord Hastings led the reerward, and beside these three battels, he kept a companie of fresh men in store, which did him great pleasure before the end of the battell.

Here is to be remembred, that aswell the king on his part, as the earle of Marwike on his, used manie comfortable words to incourage their people, not forgetting to set forth their quarrels as iust and lawfull; the king naming his aduersaries traitors and rebels, & the earle accounting him a tyrant, & an inuicious usurper. But when the time came that they once got sight either of other, the battell began berie sharpe and cruell, first with shot, and after by ioining at hand blowes. Yet at the first they ioined not front to front, as they should haue done, by reason of the mist that took awaie the sight of either armie, and suffered the one not to discern perfectly the order of the other; insomuch that the one end of the earle of Marwikes armie ouerran the contrarie end of the kings battell which stood westward, and by reason thereof (through the baliance of the earle of Driford that led the earles toward) the kings people on that part were ouermatched, so that manie of them fled towards Barnet, and so to London, bringing newes that the earle of Marwike had wonne the field.

[Which report happilie might haue bene iustified and fallen out to be true, had not preposterous fortune happened to the earle of Driford and his men, who had a sharre with streames on their lieries; as king Edwards men had the sunne with streames on their lieries: whereupon the earle of Marwikes men, by reason of the mist not well discerning the badges so like, shot at the earle of Drifords men that were on their owne part, and then the earle of Driford and his men cried treason, and fled with eight hundred men.]

But touching the kings people which were pursued in the chase as they fled, and were put to the worst, manie were wounded, and manie slaine outright. But the residue of those that fought in other parts could not perceiue this distresse of the kings people, because the thicke mist would not suffer them to see anie space farre off, but onlie at hand; and so the kings battell that saw not anie thing that was done beside them, was nothing discouraged. For (a few excepted that stood next to that part) there was not anie one that wist of that discomfiture; and the other of the earle of Marwikes men, that fought in other places somewhat distant from them, were nothing the more incouraged by this prosperous successe of their fellows, for they perceiued it not. And in like case as at the west end the earles battell ouer-reached the kings, so at the east end the kings ouer-reached the earle, and with like successe put the earles people in that place to the worst.

At length after sore fight, and greater slaughter made on both sides, king Edward hauing the greater number of men (as some sayte, though other ascribe the contrarie) began somewhat to preuaile; but the earle on the other side remembryng his ancient fame and renowne, manfully stricke to it, and incouraged his people, still supplieng with new successe in places where he saw expedient, and so the fight renewed more cruell, fierce, & bloodie than before, insomuch that the victorie remained still doubtfull, though they had fought from morning till it was now far in the date. As Edward therefore willing to make an end of so long a conflict, caused new power of fresh men (which he had for this purpose kept in store) to set on his enemies.

The earle of Marwike was nothing abashed herewith, but vnderstanding that this was all the residue of king Edwards power, comforted his men to beare out this last brunt, and in so doing the victorie was sure on their side, and the battell at an end: but king Edward so manfully and valiantly assailed his aduersaries, in the middle and strongest part of their battell, that with great violence he bare downe all that stood in his waie; for he was followed and assisted by a number of most hardie and faithfull men of warre, that shewed notable proofe of tried manhood in that instant necessitie. The earle of Warwicke (when his souldiers all wearied with long fight, and soe weakened with woundes and hurts received in the battell) gaue little heed to his words (being a man of an invincible stomach) rushed into the middest of his enemies, whereas he (aduenturing so farre from his companie, to kill and slea his aduersaries, that he could not be rescued) was amongst the preasse of his enemies stricken downe and slaine.

The marquesse Montacute, thinking to succour his brother, was likewise overthowne and slaine, with manie other of good calling, as knights and es-quiers, beside other gentlemen. [But some saie that the said marquesse, having agreed priuillie with king Edward, did weare his luerie, whome one of his brother the earle of Warwicks men espieing, fell vpon him and killed him outright.] Some write that this battell was so giuen to the vttermoost point, that king Edward was constrained to fight in his owne person, and that the earle of Warwicke, which was wont euer to ride on horsebacke from place to place, and from ranke to ranke, comforting his men, was now abused by the marquesse his brother, to leaue his horse, and to trie the extremitie by hand strokes, [which may be probable & likelie. But by the report of some it seemeth that he was not slaine in the heat of the combat, among the rout of the fighting men, but afterwards in this sort. For when he saw the kings power preuaile and his owne soe impaired and past hope of good speed, with the slaughter of his adherents (gentlemen of name) and himselfe in the verie mouth of the enimie in possibilitie to be deuoured, he lept vpon a horse to flee, and comming into a wood where was no passage, one of king Edwards men came to him, killed him, and spoiled him to the naked skin. Sir William Tirrell knight was killed on the earle of Warwicks part.]

On both parties were slaine (as Ed. Hall saith) ten thousand at the least, where Fabian saith but fiftene hundred and somewhat above. Other write that there died in all about thre thousand. Upon the kings part were slaine, the lord Crumwell, the lord Saie, the lord Mortons sonne and heire, sir Humfre Bour-cher sonne to the lord Berners, and diuerse other knights, esquiers, and gentlemen. The battell inded the space of thre hours verie doubtfull by reason of the mist, and in skirmishing and fighting, now in this place, now in that, but finallie the victorie fell on the kings side; and yet it could not be esteemed that his whole armie passed nine thousand fighting men (as some write) where his aduersaries (as by the same writers appeareth) were farre about that number.
But because those that so write, saie altogether to fauor king Edward, we maie beleue as we list.

The duke of Summerfet, and the earle of Orford fled in companie of certeine northerne men, which had bene at the battell; and (as some write) the earle of Orford kept forth with them, and retired after into Scotland. But yet as well the duke of Summer-fet, as the said earle of Orford, in fleeing toward Scotland, changed their purpose vpon the waie, and turned into Wales to Jasper earle of Penbrok.
The duke of Cresser being stricken downe and sore wounded, was left for dead in the field, amongst other the dead bodies, because he was not knowne, and by reason the reof comming to himselfe, got vp, and in great danger escaped vnto Westminster, and there toke sanctuarie. [But some say, that after hee had lien in the field, spoiled, wounded, and (to see to) betwixt life, from seven of the clocke in the morning, till foure at after none, he was caried to a seruants house of his there by (named Ruthland) where (after his woundes were seached and dressed by a surgian) he was conueied into Westminster sanctuarie.]

King Edward hauing got this victorie, refreshing himselfe and his people a while at Barnet, returned the same date vnto London, like a triumphant conqueroz, leading with him king Henrie as a captiue prisoner: & so making a solemne entrie at the church of saint Paule, affred his standard. The dead bodies of the earle and marques were brought to London in a coffin, & before they were buried, by the space of thre daies lay open visaged in the cathedrall church of S. Paule, to the intent that all men might easilie perceiue, that they vnfaineable were dead. The common byute ran, that the king was not so ialous of the erles death, as sorrowfull for the losse of the marques, whom he full well knew (and no lesse was euident to other) to be his faithfull friend and well-willer; for whose onelie sake, he caused both their bodies to be buried with their ancestors in the priorie of William.

On the tuesdaie in Easter weeke came knowledge to king Edward, that quene Margaret the wife of king Henrie, with hir sonne prince Edward was landed vpon Easter day at Weimouth in Dor-setshire, accompanied with John Longbrother prior of saint Johns, commonlie called lord treasurer of England, who went ouer into France to fetch them: also the lord Wenlocke, a man made onelie by king Edward, beside diuerse other knights and esquiers, of whome part had bene long forth of the realme, and part newlie gone ouer thither to them, in com-panie of the lord treasurer. They toke their ships at Hundne, the foure and twentieth of March (as before you haue heard) but through contrarie winds and tempests, they were giuen backe, and constrained to abide for conuenient wind.

Now, although it came sometimes about fit for their purpose, yet it continued not long in that end; so as if there vpon they toke the sea at anie time, they were forced to returne backe againe to land per they could passe halfe the way ouer. And thus being diuerse times vnder sail, in hope to passe the seas hither into England, they were still giuen backe againe, till the thirtenth of Aprill being Easter euen; on which day the wind comming fauorable about, they toke the seas, and sailed forward towards this land. The countesse of Warwicke, hauing a ship of aduantage, arriued before the other at Portesmouth, and from thence she went to Southhampton, meaning to haue gone to Weimouth, where she understood that the quene was landed: but here had she knowledge of the losse of Barnet field, and that hir husband was there slaine. Wherevpon she went no further towards the quene, but secretlie got hir ouer the water into the new forest, and toke sanctuarie within the abbey of Beaulieu.

Quene Margaret, and hir sonne prince Edward, with the other that landed at Weimouth, went from thence to an abbey nere by called Cerne. Thither came vnto them Edmund duke of Summerfet, and Thomas Courtneie earle of Denonshire, with others, and welcommed them into England, comforting the quene in the best maner they could, and willed hir not to despair of god successe; for albeit they had lost one field (whereof the quene had knowledge the same day being mondaie in easter weeke, the fifteenth of Aprill, and was therefore right sorrowfull) yet they doubted not but to assemble such a puissance (and that verie shortly) forth of diuerse parts of the realme, as being faithfull, and wholie bent to spend their liues, and shed the best blond in their bodies for hir sake, & hir sonnes, it should be hard for king Edward to resist them with all the power he had or could could make.

The presence of these noble men greatly comforted him, and relieved him of the sorowes that in manner overwhelmed his penitence heart: for he doubted for the end of all these proceedings, the which they concluded to follow upon the advancement of him and his. Speciallie it misgaue him, that some euill should chance to his sonne prince Edward, for he greatly feared not of his owne perill (as he himselfe confessed) and therefore he would gladly haue had them either to haue deferred the battell till a more conuenient time: or else that his sonne might haue bene conveyed ouer into France againe, there to haue remained in safetie, till the chance of the next battell were tried: but they being of a contrarie mind, and namely the duke of Somerset, he at length consented vnto that which they were resolved vpon.

Thus euery man being bent to battell, gathered his power by himselfe, first in Summersetshire, Dorsetshire, and part of Wilshire, and after in Devonshire and Cornwall. For the better incouraging of which countries to ioin with them in their quarrell, they repaired to Excester. Here they sent for sir John Arundell, and sir Hugh Courtenie, and manie other in whom they had any confidence. To be short, they wrought so, that they raised the whole powers of Cornwall and Devonshire, and with a great armie departing forth of Excester, they took the right waie to Clattenburie, and from thence to Bath, raising the people in all parts where they came: for those countries had bene so laboured, first by the earle of Marwick, and after by the duke of Somerset, and the earle of Devonshire (which two noble men were reckoned as old inheritors of the same countries) that the people feared there greatly inclined to the fauor of king Henrie.

King Edward, being at London, was daily aduertised by faithfull espials of all the doings of his aduersaries, and was in no small agonie, because he could not learne what waie his enemies ment to take: for he purposed to encounter them in one place or other, before they should approach nere to London. And vpon such resolution, with such an armie as he had got about London, furnished with all artillerie and other provisions necessarie, he set forward the nineteenth of Aprill, and came to Windsor, where he staid a season, as well to celebrate the feast of saint George, as to abide the coming of such bands as he had appointed to repaire thither vnto him, making there his generall assemblie.

His enemies to make him the more, sent forth their foreriders vnto sundrie townes, both aswell to raise people in the countries about, as to make the king beleue that their purpose was to passe those waies, where they ment not once to come. And here vpon when they departed from Excester, they sent first their foreriders straight to Shaftesburie, and after to Salisbury, and then they took the straight waie to Taunton, Clattenburie, and after to Wells, where houerling about in the countrie, they sent another time their foreriders to a towne called Puell, and to Winton, as if their meaning had bene to draw towards Reading, and so through Berkshire, and Oxfordshire to haue marched straight to London, or else to haue set vpon the king at some aduantage, if it were offered.

But king Edward, considering aduersitie of the matter, perceived well that they being in an angle of the realme, if they ment to go to London, they must either hold the straight waie south by Salisbury, or else drawing by to the sea side, passe along through Hampshire, Sussex and Kent: or happlie if they mistrusted their owne strengths, as not able to match with his puissance, they would then slip on the left hand, and draw towards Cheshire, and Lancashire, there to increase their forces, and peradventure by the waie to ioin with a power of Welshmen, vnder the leading of Jasper earle of Penbrooke, who had bene sent into Wales long agoe, to frame and put in a readines the people there to assist king Henries friends at their coming thitherwards. And such was their purpose in deed, for they had great confidence in such aid, as they trusted to haue of the Cheshire and Lancashire men.

King Edward, meaning to approach nere vnto them, that he might the sooner make waie to stop them of their passage, on which hand sooner they drew, departed from Windsor the morrow after saint Georges day, being the foure and twentieth day of Aprill, keeping forth his iournie, till on saturday the twentieth and seventh of Aprill he came to Abington, where he laie sundrie all daie. On mondaie he marched forward to Chichester, where he had first aduertisement, that they intended to be at Bath the next daie being tuesday, and on wednesday to come forward to giue him battell. Where vpon king Edward, desirous to see his people in order of battell, drew them forth of the towne, and incamped in the field three miles distant from thence, still busying himselfe about his necessarie affaires, allowing no time to idleness or loitering: for he knew that there was no waie more expedite and readie to tire him in trauell, than to be giuen to negligence and slouth, the two wearers of well doing, as the old saying is:

On the morrow, hearing no certaintie of their coming forward, he marched to Spalnesburie, still seeking to encounter them: but here he had knowledge, that they hauing changed their purpose, meant not to giue him battell; and therefore were turned aside, and gone to Wiltshire, where they were receiued, releued, and well refreshed by such as favoured their cause, as well with vittels, men, and monie, as good store of artillerie. Where vpon they were so encouraged, that the thursdaie after they took the field againe, purposing to giue king Edward battell indeed; and for the same intent had sent their foreriders to a towne, distant from Wiltshire nine miles, called Sudburie, appointing a ground for their field, a mile from the same towne, toward the kings campe, called Sudburie hill.

The king hereof aduertised, the same thursdaie, being the first of Maie, with his armie faire ranged in order of battell, came towards the place by them appointed for their field: but they came not there. For hearing that king Edward did thus approach, vpon a new change of resolution, they left that waie: albeit some of their herbingers were come as farre as Sudburie towne, and there surprised five or six of the kings partie, which were rashly entred that towne, attending onelie to prouide lodgings for their masters. The lords thus hauing estones changed their purpose, not meaning as yet to fight with the king, directed their waie straight towards Berkeley, travelling all that night. From Berkeley they marched forward towards Gloucester.

The king in the meane time, on the thursdaie in the after none, came to the same ground called Sudburie hill, and there staid a certaine space, sending forth scotziers, to hearken what they might understand of the enemies, whom he took to be somewhere at hand. But when he could not heare any certaintie of them, he advanced forward, leading his vanguard in a ballie beyond the hill, towards the towne of Sudburie, and laie himselfe (with the residue of his people) at the same place, called Sudburie hill. About three of the clocke after midnigh, he was aduertadvertised, that his enemies had taken their waie by Berkeley, towards Gloucester. Whereupon, taking aduise of his counsell what was best to do, he was counsell'd to send some of his seruants with all speed vnto Gloucester, to Richard Beauchampe, sonne and heire to the lord Beauchampe of Powicke, to whom he had (before this present) committed the rule and custodie of the towne and castell of Gloucester.

The king sent therefore with all speed vnto him, commanding him to do his best to defend the towne and castell against his enemies, if they came to assault the same, as it was supposed they intended: and if they so did, he promised to come with his whole armie presentlie to the rescue. The messengers did their diligence, and so being sofallie receiued into Gloucester, the towne and castell, by the vigilant regard of the said Richard Beauchampe, was put in safe keeping. And this message was done in good time, for true it is, there were diuers in the towne, that could haue bene well contented that the queene, and the lords with hir, should haue bene receiued there, and would haue aduentured to haue brought it to passe, if they had not bene thus prevented.

Againe, the queene and the lords with hir had good intelligence, with diuerse in the towne, so as they were put in great hope to haue entred the same: whereupon they trauelled their people right soe all that night and morning, comming before the towne of Gloucester vpon the fridaie about ten of the clocke. And when they perceived that they were disappointed of their purpose, and their entrie flatlie denied, they were higlye therewith displeased; for they knewe verie well, that diuerse within the towne bare their good willes towards them: but after they had vied certeine menacing braueries, and made a shew as if they had meant to assault the gates and walles, & so to haue entred by force, they departed their waies, marching with all speed possible towards Tewkesburie.

Gloucester, where was marshalled,

It might be marvelled at, that they attempted not the winning of Gloucester indeed, considering the friends which they knewe they had within it. But the cause which moued them chiesly to forbear, was, for that as well they without, as the other within the towne, knewe that king Edward approached at hand, and was readie to set vpon them on the backes, if they had once begun to haue assaulted the towne: and so, neither they within the towne that were the kings friends doubted the enemies forces, nor the enemye indeed durst attempt anye such enterprise against them. About foure of the clocke in the afternone, they came to Tewkesburie, hauing trauelled that night last past, and that daie, six and thirtie long miles, in a foule countrie, all in lanes and stonie waies, betwixt woods, without anye good refreshing, so that as well the men as the horses were right wearie.

Long march,

And where the more part of their armie consisted of footmen, the captiues could not haue gone anye further, except they would haue left their footmen behind them, and so of necessitie they were drinen to staie there, determining to abide the aduenture that God would send them. For well they knewe that the king followed them verie nere at hand, so as if they should haue gone further, and left the most part of their companie behind, as it could not otherwise haue chanced, he would haue bene readie to haue taken the aduantage wholie, so to distresse them. Whereupon they pight their field in a close, euen hard at the townes end, hauing the towne and the abbeye at their backes, and directlie before them, and vpon each side of them, they were defended with cumbersome lanes, deepe ditches, and manie hedges, beside hills and dales, so as the place seemed as noisome as

The place where the lords were pight, might be to approach vnto.

The king on this fridaie, verie erlie in the morning, aduanced his standards, and in good order of battell hauing diuided his armie into thre wards, marched through the plaines of Cotteswold. The daie was verie hot, and hauing in his armie about thre thousand footmen, he trauelled with them and the residue thirtie miles and more. By all which waie, they could find neither horsemeat, nor mans meat, no not so much as water for their horses, except one little brooke, of the which they receiued no great reliefe; for that with the horses and carriages that passed thorough it, the water became so troubled, that it serued them to no vse: and still all that daie king Edward with his armie was within five or six miles of his enemies, he in the plaine countrie, and they among the woods.

The painfull march of king Edward with his armie.

King Edward had euer good espials, to aduertise him still what his enemies did, and which waie they toke. At length he came with all his armie vnto a villiage called Chiltonham, like a five miles distant from Tewkesburie, where he had certeine knowledge that his enemies were alreadye come to Tewkesburie, and were incamped there, purposing to abide him in that place, and to deliuer him battell. King Edward thereupon made no long delaie, but tooke a little refection himselfe, and caused his people to do the like, with such prouision of vittells as he had appointed to be conueied forth with him for the reliefe of himselfe and his armie. This done, he set forth ward towards his enemies, and lodged that night in a field not past thre miles distant from them.

Chiltonham

On the morrow being saturday, and fourth of Maie, he drew towards his enemies, and marshalled his armie, diuided into thre battells in this sort. He put his brother the duke of Gloucester in the foreward, and himselfe in the middle-ward. The lord Sparques, and the lord Hastings led the reere-ward. Where with he approached the enemies campe, which was right hard to be assailed, by reason of the deepe ditches, hedges, trees, bushes, and cumbersome lanes, wherewith the same was fenced, both a front, and on the sides, so as the king could not well approach them to anye aduantage: and to be the better in a readinesse to beat backe the kings power, when he should come to assault them, they were imbattelled in this order.

The ordering of king Edwards battell,

The duke of Summerfet, and his brother the lord John of Summerfet led the fore-ward. The middle-ward was gouerned by the prince, vnder the conduct of the lord of saint John, and the lord Wenlocke (whome king Edward had aduanced to the degree of a baron.) The reere-ward was appointed to the rule of the earle of Deuonshire. Thus may ye perceiue, that king Edward was put to his shifts, how (so anye aduantage) to assault his enemies. Neuertheless, he being well furnished with great artillerie, the same was aptlie lodged to annoie the enemies, that they receiued great damage thereby; and the duke of Gloucester, who lacked no policie, galled them greuouslie with the shot of arrowes: and they rewarded their aduersaries home againe with like payment, both with shot of arrowes, and great artillerie, although they had not the like plentie of guns as the king had. The passages were so cumbersome, that it was not possible to come vpon anye euen hand, to ioinc at handblowes.

The ordering of the lords host.

The duke of Gloucester.

Tewkesburie field.

The duke of Gloucester, vpon a politike purpose (as some haue written) recoiled backe with all his companie, which when the duke of Summerfet perceived, either moued therewith; or else because he was so sore annoied with the shot in that place where he and his fore-ward stood, like a knight more courageous than circumspect, came out of his strength with his whole battell, and aduanced himselfe somewhat what aside slips the kings bowward, and by certeine passages afoze hand, and for that purpose prouided (to the kings part, although unknowne) he passed a lane, and came into a faire open close right before the king, where he was imbattelled, not doubting but the prince and the lord Wenlocke, with the middle-ward, had followed iust at his backe. But whether the lord Wenlocke dissembled the matter for king Edwards sake, or whether his hart serued him not, still he stood, and gaue the looking on.

Edw. Hall.

The king, or (as other haue) the duke of Glocester, taking the aduantage that he aduentured for, turned againe face to face vnto the duke of Summerfet his battell, and winning the hedge and ditch of him, entred the close, and with great violence put him and his people vp towarde the hill from whence they were descended. Where is to be noted, that when the king was come before his enemies, yet he gaue the onset, he perceived that vpon the right hand of their campe there was a parke, and much store of wood growing therein; and doubting least his aduersaries had laid an ambush within that wood, he chose forth of his companies two hundred speares, commanding them to keepe a file, like a quarter of a mile from the field, to attend vpon that corner of the wood out of the which the ambush, if anye were, was to issue, and to incounter with them, as occasion serued: but if they perceived that there was no ambush at all, then to implete their seruice as they should see it expedient and behouefull for the time.

The politike foresight of the king.

This politike prouision for danger that might haue ensued (although there was none that waite forth) serued yet before the end of the battell, to great good purpose. For when those speares perfectly understood that there was no ambush within the wood, and withall saw convenient time to implete themselves, they came and brake with full randon vpon the duke of Summerfet and his bowward a flanke, in so violent wise vpon the sudden, that where they had before enough to doe with those with whom they were first matched, now with this new charge giuen on them by those two hundred speares, they were not a little dismayed; and to conclude, so discouraged, that straightwaie they took them to flight. Some fled into the parke, other into the meadow there at hand, some into the lanes, & some hid them in ditches, each one making what shift he could, by the which he hoped best to escape: but manie neuertheless were beaten downe, slaine, and taken prisoners.

The battard of the lords distressed.

The duke of Summerfet seeing this unfortunate chance, as some write, turned to the middle-ward, and there finding the lord Wenlocke standing still, after he had reuiled him, and called him traitor, with his ar he stroke the haines out of his head. The duke of Glocester pursuing after them that fled with the duke of Summerfet to their campe, where the rest of their armie stood, entred the trench, and after him the king, where he bare himselfe so knightlie, that therevpon the quenes part went to wacke, and was put to flight; the king and other falling in chase after them, so that manie were slaine, but especiallie at a mill in the meadow fast by the towne a great sort were drowned. Manie ran towards the towne, some to the church, and diuerse to the abbey, and other to other places, where they thought best to saue themselves. [This was the last fought field or pight battell tried betwene the potentats of this land in king Edward the fourths daies (which chanced on the fourth of Maie, being saturday, in the eleauenth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord, 1471) as Anglorum praelia affirmeth, saieing: Prima postrema locus est Teuxburia pugnae.]

Abr. Flem.

Edw. Hall.
Prince Edwards taken.

In the winning of the campe, such as stood to it were slaine out of hand Prince Edward was taken as he fled towards the towne, by sir Richard Crofts, and kept close. In the field and chase were slaine, the lord John of Summerfet, called marquisse Dorset, Thomas Courtenie earle of Denonshire, sir John Delues, sir Edward Hampden, sir Robert Whittingham, and sir John Leukener, with thre thousand others. After the field was ended, proclamation was made, that whosoever could bring forth prince Edward alive or dead, should haue an annuities of a hundred pounds during his life, and the princes life to be saued, if he were brought forth alive. Sir Richard Crofts, nothing mistrusting the kings promise, brought forth his prisoner prince Edward, being a faire and well proportioned young gentleman; whom when king Edward had well aduised, he demanded of him, how he durst so presumptuously enter into his realme with banier displayed.

Wherevnto the prince boldly answered, saieing; To recouer my fathers kingdome & heritage, from his father and grandfather to him, and from him after him to me lineallie descended. At which words king Edward said nothing, but with his hand thrust him from him, or (as some saie) stroke him with his gantlet; whom incontinentlie, George duke of Clarence, Richard duke of Glocester, Thomas Creie marquisse Dorset, and William lord Hastings that stood by, suddenlie murdered: for the which cruel act, the more part of the doers in their latter daies thanke of the like cup, by the righteous iustice and due punishment of God. His bodie was homelie interred with the other simple corpses, in the church of the monastrie of blacke monks in Teukelburie.

After the victorie was thus achieved, the king repaired to the abbey church there, to giue God thanks for that good successe, which it had pleased him to blesse him with; and there finding a great number of his enemies, that were fled thither to saue themselves, he gaue them all his free pardon; albeit there was no franchise there for rebels, but that he might haue commanded them to haue bene dyawen forth without breach of any liberties of that church. He granted also that the dead bodies, as well of the lords as other, slaine in that battell, might be buried in the same church, or else where it pleased their friends or seruants, without any quartering & branding, or setting by the heads or quarters in any public places. [And the patience and clemencie of this good king, who (besides the putting by of wrongs done to him by violence of foes without vengeance) freely forgave the offenders, and did so honorable temper his affections.]

There were found in the abbey and other places of the towne, Edmund duke of Summerfet, John Lonsfrother lord prioz of S. John, sir Thomas Arlesham, sir Geruets Clifton, and diuerse other knights and esquires, which were apprehended, and all of them being brought before the duke of Glocester, sitting as constable of England, and the duke of Norfolk folke, as marshall in the middell of the towne, they were arreigned, condemned, and iudged to die; and so vpon the tuesday, being the seventh of Maie, the said duke and the lord prioz, with the two forenamed knights, and twelue other knights, were on a scaffold, set vp in the middle of the towne for that purpose, beheaded, and permitted to be buried, without any other dismembryng, or setting up of their heads in any one place or other.

The same tuesday, the king departed from Teukelburie towards Glocester, and by the waie had knowledge that quene Margaret was found in a poore house of religion, not far from thence, into the which she was withdrawen for safegard of hir selfe, on saturday in the morning, being the daie of the battell. She was after brought to London as prisoner, ner, and so kept, till his father ransomed him with great summes of monie, which he borrowed of Lewis the eleventh king of France. And because he was not able to make repayment thereof, he sold unto the said Lewis (as the French writers affirme) the kingdomes of Naples, and both the Sicils, with the countie of Provence. King Edward being at Calicester, had advertisements brought forth of the north parts, that the people there were about to assemble in armour against him, in favour of king Henrie: whereupon he left the right way to London, and rode to Couentrie, meaning to increase the number of his people, and so with a puissant armie to go northwards.

Whereupon, comming to Couentrie the eleventh of Maie, and remaining there three daies, he well refreshed such as had bene with him at Lekeburie field. Whither was brought to him queene Margarete, from whence he was conueied to London, there to remaine in safe keeping (as before you haue hard.) Whilst he was busie in sending abroad unto his friends to leaue an armie, he was advertised that the commotion in the north was pacified. For after it was knowne abroad, how he obtained the victorie, as well at Lekeburie, as at Barnet, and in manner subued all his enemies, the captains that had stirred the people to that rebellion, began to quail, and forsooke their companies.

Whereof the most made sute to the earle of Northumberland, that it might please him to be a mediator to the king for their pardon; so that now, there was no rebellion in all the north parts, but that as well the citie of York, as all other places, were at the kings commandement, ready in all things to obey him as true and loiall subiects. And this was confirmed by the earle of Northumberlands owne mouth, who on the fourteenth of Maie came to the king, as yet remaining at Couentrie: by reason whereof it was not thought needfull, that the king should trauell any further northward at that time, either about the pacifying of the people, or to see execution done upon the offenders, with all was there in good tranquillitie and quiet.

But now when all things seemed to be at rest, and no rebellion after so happie victories doubted, newes came to him before his coming to Couentrie, from the lords of his blood, abiding at London, that one Thomas Greyll, bastard sonne to that valiant captain the lord Thomas Fauconbridge (who had lately before bene sent to the sea by the earle of Warwick, and after fallen to practise piracie) had spoiled diuerse merchants ships, Portugals and others, in breach of the ancient amitie that long had continued betwixt the realms of England and Portugale; and furthermore, had now got to him a great number of mactures, out of all parts of the land, and manie traitors and misgouerned people from each quarter of the realme, beside diuerse also forth of other countries that delighted in theft and robberies, meaning to worke some exploit against the king.

And verelie his puissance increased daily, for having bene at Calis, and brought from thence into Kent manie euill disposed persons, he began to gather his power in that countrie, meaning (as was thought) to attempt some great and wicked enterprise. After the kings comming to Couentrie, he receiued advertisements, that this bastard was come before London, with manie thousands of men by land, and also in ships by water, purposing to rob and spoile the citie. Manie Kentishmen were willing to assist him in this mischieuous enterprise, and other were forced against their wills to go with him, or else to aid him with their substance and monie, inasmuch that within a short time, he had got together sixteen or seuentene thousand men, as they accomplished themselves.

With these he came before the citie of London the twelfth of Maie, in the quarrell (as he pretended) of king Henrie, whom he also meant to haue out of the Tower, & to restore him againe unto his crowne & roiall dignitie. And for that intent, he required to enter the citie with his people, that receiuing king Henrie forth of the Tower, they might passe with him through the citie, and so to march streight towards king Edward, whose destruction they vowed to pursue, with all their uttermost endeours. But the maiors and aldermen of the citie would not in any wise agree to satisfie their request herein, butterlie refusing to receiue him or any of his companie into the citie.

King Edward from time to time by posts was informed of all these doings, & by aduise of his council, the fourteenth of Maie, sent to the succours of the maiors and aldermen sixteen hundred of the choicest souldiers he had about him, that they might helpe to resist the enemies, till he had got such an armie together as was thought necessarie, meaning with all conuenient speed to come therewith to the rescue of the citie, and preservation of the queene, prince, and his daughters, that were within the Tower, not in verie good safegard, considering the euill dispositions of manie within the citie of London, that for the fauour they had borne to the earle of Warwick, and desire to be partakers of the spoile, cared not if the bastard might haue attained to his full purpose and wished intent.

On the sixteenth of Maie, king Edward set forth of Couentrie towards London. But here ye haue to vnderstand, that when the bastard could not be receiued into the citie, neither by gentle persuations, nor grauous threatnings, he made semblance to passe ouer the Thames at Kingston bridge, ten miles from London, and thitherwards he drez with his whole power by land, leauing his ships afore saint Bartharines and thereabouts. His pretense was, to spoile and destroie Westminster, and the suburbs of the citie on that side, and after to assault the citie it selfe, to trie if he might enter by force, and so to be reuenged of the citizens that had refused to receiue him. [Notwithstanding all which stirring of coles & proud port, with haughtinesse of hart & violence of hand thinking to beare downe the people, as an inundation or flowing of water streams doth all before it: yet he came short of his purpose, & pulled upon his owne pate small destruction: though he thought himselfe a man ordeined to glorie, & was tickled with the like flattering persuasion that one had in his hart, who said:

So as he was on wards upon his fornic, he was advertised, that king Edward was preparing to come forwards against him, assisted in manner with all the great lords of the realme, and others in great number, more than he had bene at any time before. By reason whereof, doubting what might follow, if passing the riuer he should fortune so to be inclosed, that he should be diuinen thereby to encounter with the kings power at such ods, he thought it best to alter his purpose; and so returning, came backe againe before London, & mustered his people in S. Georges field, ranged and placed in one enter battell.

And to the intent they might worke their purpose, before the kings comming to the rescue, they resolved with all their forces to assault the citie, and to enter it if they could by plaine strength, that putting it to the sacke, they might conueie the riches to their ships, which late in the riuer betwixt saint Bartharins and Blackewall, nere to Ratcliffe. Whereupon hauing brought certeine pecces of artillerie forth of their ships, they planted the same alongst the water side, right over against the citie, and shot off lustilie, to aske the men within so much as was possible.

But the citizens on the other side lodged their great artillerie against their aduersaries, and with violent shot therof so galled them, that they durst not abide in anie place alongst the water side, but were driven euen from their owne ordinance. Yet the bassard not meaning to leaue anie waie vnassailed that might aduance his purpose, appointed a great number of his retinue to set fire on the brydge, so to open the passage, and to enter into the citie that way forth; and withall, he caused aboue thre thousand other to passe by ships ouer the Thames; giving order, that when they were got ouer, they should diuide themselves into two battels, the one to assault Algate, and the other Bishops gate, which order accordingly was executed.

Algate and Bishops gate assaulted.

Houses burnt
on the brydge.

For they did their best at both places to force the gates, not sparing to bend and discharge such guns as they had brought with them against the same, nor calling with arrowes to annoie those that there stood at defense: whereby much hurt was done, as well at the one place as the other, fire being set on both the gates, in purpose to haue burnt them by, and so to haue entered. The fire which they had kindled on the brydge little assailed them, although they burnt there to the number of a threescore houses. For the citizens had laid such peeces of ordinance directlie in their waie, that although the passage had bene whole open, they should haue had hard entering that waie forth. The maior, aldermen, and other two shipfull citizens were in good arraie, and each man appointed and bestowed where was thought needfull.

The earle of Essex, and manie knights, esquires, and gentlemen, with their friends and seruants, came to aid the citizens, taking great paine to place them in order, for defense of the gates and walles: and furthermore, deuised how and in what sort they might make a sallie forth vpon the enemies to distresse them: and suertie, by the intermingling of such gentlemen and lords seruants in euerie part with the citizens, they were greatly encouraged to withstand their enemies. Yet the rebels, vnder the leading of one Spising, bare themselves so stoutlie at Algate, that they wane the bulwarks there, and drove the citizens backe within the portculice, & entered with them, to the number of six or eight: but some of them were slaine with the fall of the portculice that was let downe vpon them, to keepe the rest due out, and those that were entered within the gate were suddenlie dispatched.

Herewith they lashed frelie the one part at the other with guns and bowes, although no great hurt was done with shot; till at length Robert Wasser alderman (that was appointed to the keeping of this gate, with the most part of the citizens) and the recorder, named Wilselike, either of them being well armed in strong iaches, commanded the portculice to be drawn by, and mantenantly rushed forth vpon their enemies, putting them backe vnto saint Botolphes church. At the same instant, the earle Rivers, hauing got together a foure or fife hundred men, well chosen and apparelled for the warre, issued forth at the posterne by the Towre, and assailing the Bentishmen, euen vpon the point as they were thus put backe, mightilie laid vpon them.

And first he plaged them with the swift and thicke flight of his arrowes, and after joining with them at handstrokes, slue and toke manie of them prisoners; so that the rebels were fullie put to flight, and followed first to Wile-end, and from thence some vnto Poplar, some to Stratford, and Stepnith, and in maner each waie forth about that part of the ci-tie, the chafe being followed for the space of two miles in length. Spanie of them were of Essex, and so made their course homewards; but the more part of them fled to the water side, and getting to their ships, passed ouer the Thames to the rest of their companie. The other likewise that were busie to assault Bishops gate, when they understood that their fellows were discomfited and fled from Algate, they likewise slipped awaie, and made the best that they could to saue themselves.

There were a seauen hundred of them that fled from Algate, and other places, slaine outright, beside the prisoners. And yet there were fiers burning all at once at Algate, Bishops gate, & on the brydge, and manie houses consumed with the same fiers. But now the bassard, vnder whome that companie was directed that had set fire on the brydge, when he saw that he might not preuaile, and understood the euill success of those which he had set ouer the Thames, he withdrew also, and left the brydge. Here the hardie manhood of Rafe Josselin alderman is not to be passed with silence; who (after he had balliantlie resisted the bassard & his band that assaulted the brydge) vpon their retire sallied forth vpon them, and following them in chafe alongst the water side, till they came beyond Katchiffe, slue and toke verie manie of them.

Rafe Jos-

The bassard notwithstanding gathered his companies together, and with such as were willing to remaine with him incamped on Blackehed, by the space of thre daies next ensuing, to wit, the firste, seauenteenth, and eighteenth of Maie, utterlie despairing of his wished preie, sith he had bene repelled from London, to his vtter confusion. And now to conclude, hearing that king Edward was coming with a right puissant armie, the said bassard and his people durst no longer abide; but brake by and dispersed themselves, some one waie, and some an other. They of Calis got them thither againe with all speed, and such as were of other countries repaired likewise to their homes, and manie of the Bentishmen went also to their houses. The bassard with his mariners, and such riotous rebels, robbers, and wicked persons, as sought nothing but spoile, got them to shipboard, and with all their vessels dreyne downe to the coast.

Blackehed.

King Edward, hauing assembled an armie of thirtie thousand men (as some write) and accompanied in maner with all the great lords of England, came to London the one and twentieth of Maie, being tuesday, where he was honourable receiued by the maior, aldermen, and other two shipfull citizens: where euen vpon their first meeting with him he dubbed diuerse of them knights; as the maior, the recorder, & other aldermen, and two shipfull commoners of the citie, which had manfullie and balliantlie acquit themselves against the bassard Fauconbrydge & his wicked companie of rebels. Moreover, here is to be remembered, that poore king Henrie the first, a little before deprived (as ye haue heard) of his realme and imperiall crowne, was now in the Towre spoiled of his life, by Richard duke of Gloucester (as the constant fame can) who (to the intent that his brother king Edward might reigne in more suertie) murdered the said king Henrie with a dagger.

Notwithstanding, some writers of that time, fauoring altogether the house of Yorke, haue recorded, that after he understood what losses had chanced vnto his friends, and how not onelie his sonne, but also all other his chiefe partakers were dead and dispatched, he toke it so to hart, that of pure displeasure, indignation, and melancholie, he died the thre and twentieth of Maie. you will call that a funerall pompe from the Tower to the church of saint Paule, and there laid on a bier of cotten bare faced, the same in presence of the beholders did bleed; where it rested the space of one whole daie. From thence he was caried to the Blackfriars, and bled there likewise: and on the next daie after, it was conueied in a boat, without priest or clerke, to the taper, singing of saiens, vnto the monasterie of Chertseie, distant from London fiftie miles, and there was it first buried: but after, it was remoued to Windelesor, and there in a new balot, netwile intomed. He reigned eight and thirtie yeares, six moneths and od daies, and after his redemption of the crowne six moneths. He liued two and fiftie yeares, hauing by twise one oncle sonne, called Edward, prince of Wales.

He was of a seemlie stature, of bodie slender, to which proportion all other members were answerable; his face beautifull, wherein continuallie was resident the bountie of mind with the which he was inwardlie imbued. Of his owne naturall inclination he abhorred all the vices as well of the bodie as of the soule. His patience was such, that of all the injuries to him done (which were innumerable) he neuer asked vengeance, thinking that for such aduersitie as chanced to him, his sinnes should be forgotten and forgiven. What losses soeuer happened vnto him, he neuer esteemed, nor made anie account thereof; but if anie thing were done, that might sound as an offence towards God, he sore lamented, and with great repentance sorowed for it.

So then berie unlike it is, that he died of anie wrath, indignation, and displeasure because his businesse about the keeping of the crowne on his head toke no better successe: except peradventure ye will saie, that it grieved him, for that such slaughters and mischieues as had chanced within this land, came to passe onlie through his follie and default in government: or (that moze is) for his fathers, his grandfathers, and his owne vniust usurping and deteining of the crowne. But howsoeuer it was, for these before remembred, and other the like properties of reputed holinesse, which was said to rest in him, it pleased God to worke miracles for him in his life time, as men haue listed to report.

Whereof, whereof, king Henric the seauenth sued to Pope Iulio the second, to haue him canonized a saint. But for that the canonizing of a king seemed to be moze coslie than for a bishop, the said king left off his sute in that behalfe; thinking better to saue his monie, than to purchase a new holie daie of saint Henric with so great a price, remitting to God the iudgement of his will and intent. ¶ But because princes princelie qualified, can not be too highlie praised, I will here record a collection of his commendable conditions, doings, and sayings, as I find them set downe to my hand, to his perpetuall remembrance; and right worthie of imitation, not onlie of such as are singled out from among infinite thousands, to be magnified with roialtie; but also of private and meane men that conuerse and liue one with another in the world.

This king hauing inioied as great prosperitie as fauourable fortune could afford, & as great troubles on the other side as the frowning could poure out; yet in both the states he was patient and vertuous, that he maie be a patterne of most perfect vertue, as he was a worthie example of fortunes inconstancie. He was plaine, bright, farre from fraud, wholely giuen to praier, reading of scriptures, and almesdeeds; of such integritie of life, that the bishop which had bene his confessor ten yeares, auouched that he had not all that time committed anie mortall crime: so continent, as suspicion of vnchast life neuer touched him: and hauing in Chistmasse a shew of yong women with their bare breasts laid out presented before him, he immediatlie departed with these words: fie, fie, for shame; forsooth you be to blame.

Before his marriage, he liked not that women should enter his chamber, and for this respect he committed his two brethren by the mothers side, Jasper and Edmund, to most honest & vertuous prelates to be brought up. So farre he was from courtousnesse, that when the executors of his uncle the bishop of Winchester, surnamed the rich cardinall, would haue giuen him two thousand pounds, he plainelie refused it, willing them to discharge the will of the departed, and would scarceleie condescend at length to accept the same summe of monie toward the indowing of his colleges in Cambridge & Eaton. He was religiouslie affected (as the time then was) that at principall holidays, he would weare sackcloth next his skin. Wh he used none, but in most earnest matters these words: forsooth and forsooth.

He was so pitifull, that when he saw the quarter of a traitor against his crowne over Triplegate, he willed it to be taken auaie, with these words: I will not haue anie christian so cruelle humbled for my sake. For anie great offences he willingly pardoned, and receiuing at a time a great blow by a wicked man which compassed his death, he onlie said; forsooth forsooth, ye do fowle to smite a king annointed so. An other also which thrust him into the side with a sword when he was prisoner in the Tower, was by him pardoned when he was restored to his state and kingdome. Not long before his death, being demanded whie he had so long held the crowne of England vniustlie; he replied: My father was king of England, quietlie inioieng the crowne all his reigne; and his father my grandfater was also king of England, and I euen a child in my cradell was proclaimed and crowned king without anie interruption; and so held it fortie yeares well-nere, all the states doing homage vnto me, as to my antecessors: wherefore I maie saie with king Dauid; The lot is fallen vnto me in a faire ground; yea, I haue a goodlie heritage, my helpe is from the Lord which saueth the vpright in heart.

This god king, being of himselfe alwaies naturallie inclined to do good, and fearing least he might seme vnthankefull to almightie God for his great benefites bestowed vpon him, since the time he first took vpon him the regiment of his realme, determined about the six and twentieth yeare of his reigne, for his primer notable worke (as by the words of his will I find expessed) to erect and found two famous colleges in the honor and worship of his holy name, and for the increase of vertue, the dilatation of cunning, and establishment of christian faith, whereof the one in Cambridge, to be called his colledge of our labie and saint Nicholas: and the other at Eaton beside Windelesor, to be called his colledge of our blessed ladie.

And for the performance of this his deuout purpose, he infeofed certeine bishops, with other noble and worshipfull personages, by his letters patents, with lands and possessions, parcell of his inheritance of the duchie of Lancaster, to the cleare value of well nere foure & thirtie hundred pounds by yere. Which letters patents he after confirmed by his act of parliament, declaring also by his will vnto his said scoffes, his intent and meaning, how the same should be imploied vpon the edifications of his said two colleges. Whereof (in my iudgement) the deuise is so excellent, and the buildings so princelie and apt for that purpose, as I cannot omit to set forth vnto you the verie plot of the whole colledge in Cambridge, such as I find mentioned almost verbatim in his will, supposing that if the rest of the house had proceeded according to the chappell already finished (as his full intent and meaning was) the like colledge could scant have bene found againe in anye chistian land. The words of the will are thus.

The chappell. As touching the dimensions of the church of my said colledge of our ladye and S. Nicholas of Cambridge, I have devised and appointed, that the same church shall containe in length 288 foot of assise, without anye gles, and all of the widenesse of fortye foot. And the length of the same church from the west end unto the altars at the quier doze, shall containe an hundred and twentye foot. And from the piousness stall, unto the grace called Gradus chori ninetye foot; for thirtie six stalles on either side of the same quier, answering to threescore and ten fellows, and ten priests conducts, which must be De prima forma. And from the said stalles unto the east end of the said church, threescore & two foot of assise. Also a reredosse bearing the roodloft, departing the quier and the bodie of the church, containing in length fortye foot, and in breadth fourteen foot. The walles of the same church to be in height ninetye foot imbatelled, bawted, and chartered, sufficientlie butteraced, and everie butterace fined with finials. And in the east end of the same church, shall be a window of nine daies, and betwixt everie butterace a window of five daies.

The roodloft.

The height of the chappell.

The east window.

The side chappels.

And betwixt everie of the same butteraces in the bodie of the church, on both sides of the same church, a closet with an altar therein, containing in length twentye foot, and in breadth ten foot, bawted and finished under the foile of the gles windows. And the pavement of the church to be enhanced foure foot above the ground without. And the height of the pavement of the quier one foot and an halfe above the pavement of the church. And the pavement of the altar thre foot above that. And on the north side of the quier a vestrie containing in length fiftye foot, and in breadth twentye and two foot, departed into two houses beneath, & two houses above, which shall containe in height twentye two foot in all, with an entrie from the quier bawted. And at the west end of the church a cloister square, the east pane containing in length an hundred seuentie and five foot, and the west pane as much. The north pane two hundred foot, and the south pane as much, of the which the deambulatorie thirtie foot wide, and in height twentye foot to the cozbill table, with cleare stoies and butteraces with finials, bawted & imbatelled. And the ground thereof foure foot lower than the church ground.

The vestrie.

The cloister.

The steeple.

The base court.

The east pane.

The great gate.

The south gate.

And in the middle of the west pane of the cloister a strong tower square, containing foure and twenty foot within the walles. And in the height one hundred and twentye foot to the cozbill table. And foure small turrets over that finied with pinacles. And a doze into the said cloister inward, but outward none. And as touching the dimensions of the housing of the said colledge, I have devised and appointed in the south side of the said church a quadrant, closing to both ends of the same church; the east pane thereof shall containe two hundred and thirtie foot in length, and in breadth within the walles two and twentye foot. In the same panes middle, a tower for a gatehouse, containing in length thirtie foot, and in breadth two and twentye, and in height threescore foot, with thre chambers over the gate, everie one over the other. And on either side of the same gate foure chambers, everie one containing in length five & twentye foot, and in breadth two and twentye foot. And over everie of these chambers, two chambers above of the same measure or more, with two towers outward, and two towers inward.

The south pane shall containe in length two hundred thirtie and eight foot, and in breadth two and twentye foot within, in which shall be seven chambers, everie one containing in length nine and twentye foot, and in breadth twentye and two, with a chamber parcell of the piousness lodging, containing in length thirtie and five foot, and with a chamber in the east corner of the same pane, containing in length twentye and five foot, and in breadth thirtie and two foot. And over everie of all these chambers two chambers, and with five towers outward, and thre towers inward. The west pane shall containe in length two hundred and thirtie foot, and in breadth within twentye & foure foot, in which at the end toward the church shall be a librarie, containing in length an hundred and ten foot, and in breadth twentye and foure foot. And under it a large house for reading and disputations, containing in length eleven foot. And two chambers under the same librarie, each containing twentye and nine foot in length, and in breadth foure and twentye foot.

And over the said librarie a house of the same largenesse, for diverser stufte of the said colledge. In the other end of the same pane a hall, containing in length an hundred foot, upon a bawt of twelve foot high, ordeined for the cellar and butterie: and the breadth of the hall six and thirtie foot. On everie side thereof a baie window. And in the nether end of the same hall toward the middle of the same pane, a partrie & butterie, everie of them in length twentye foot, and in breadth seuentene foot. And over that two chambers for officers. And at the nether end of the hall toward the west, a goodlie kitchen. And the same pane shall have inward two towers, ordeined for the waies into the hall and librarie. And in everie corner of the said quadrant, shall be two corner towers, one inward, and one outward, more than the towers above rehearsed.

And at the upper end of the hall, the piousness lodging, that is to wit, more than the chambers for him above specified, a parlour on the ground, containing six and thirtie foot in length, and two and twentye foot in breadth, & two chambers above of the same quantitie. And westward closing thereto a kitchen for him, a larderhouse, stables, and other necessarie houseings and grounds. And westward beyond these houses, and the said kitchen ordeined for the hall, a bakehouse, a brewhouse, and other houses of office: betwixt which there is left a ground square of fourscore foot in everie pane for wood and such stufte. And in the middle of the said large quadrant, shall be a conduit, goodlie devised for the ease of the same colledge. And I will, that the edification proceed in large forme of my said colledge cleane and substantiall, setting apart superfluitie of so great curious workes of intaille and busie moulding.

And I have devised and appointed that the precinct of my said colledge, as well on both sides of the garden from the colledge to the water, as in all other places of the same precinct, be inclosed with a substantiall wall, of the height of fourtene foot, with a large tower at the principall entrie against the middle of the east pane, out of the high street. And in the same tower a large gate, and another tower in the middle of the west end at the new bridge. And the same wall to be crested, imbatelled, and fortified with towers, as manie as shall be thought convenient thereunto. And I will that my said colledge be edified of the most substantiall & best abiding stufte, of stone, lead, glasse, and iron, that maie best be had and provided thereto. Thus much I have enlarged by occasion of reading this good kings will: the cunning devulle wherof I leave to the considerate judgement of such as be expert in architecture, heartilie desiring almighty God to put into the heart of some noble prince of this land, one day to make perfect this this roiall worke so charitablie begun.]

But now to returne to king Edward. We shall understand, that after his comming to London, hee rested there but one daie, or two at the most, taking his fourtie forthright into Kent with all his armie, following the bassard, and other his complices, to suppress them, if they were in anie place assembled againe to resist him. But after they were once dispersed, they durst not shew themselves againe in armes, those onlie excepted that were withdrawne unto Sandwich with the bassard; which for the more part were mariners, about eight or nine hundred, besides certeine other euill disposed persons, that accompanied him as his souldiers, and men of warre, with whose assistance the bassard kept that towne by strength, hauing in the haven seuen and forty ships, great and small, vnder his gouernance.

But vpon the kings approaching nere vnto those parties, they sent to him for pardon, promising that vpon a reasonable appointment, for the safeguard of their liues, and other indemnities to be had for their benefit, they would become his faithfull subiects, and deliuer into his hands all the ships. Their offer the king vpon great considerations, and by good deliberate advice of counsell, thought best to accept; and therevpon (being at that time in Canturburie) hee granted to their petitions, and sent immediatlie vnto Sandwich his brother Richard duke of Gloucester, to receiue them to mercie, together with all the ships, which according to their promise they deliuered into his hands.

But notwithstanding that (as some write) the bassard Janconbydge, and other of his companie that were got to Sandwich, had thus their pardons by composition at the kings hands, we find neuertheless, that the said bassard Janconbydge, being afterwards at sea (a rousing belike, as he had used before) came at length into the open haven at Southhampton, and there taking land, was apprehended, and shortly after beheaded. This chanced (as should appeare by Fabian) about the latter end of October. Whereouer, Roger Laughan that had bene sent by king Edward into Wales, anon after Tewkesburie field (being a man of great power in that countrey) to intrap and surprise by some secret sleight the earle of Penbroke, the said earle being thereof aduertised, took the same Roger, and without delay strooke off his head.

After this, was the earle besieged in the towne of Penbroke by Morgan Thomas; but the siege was raised by David Thomas, brother to the said Morgan, a faithfull friend to the earle; and then the earle by his helpe was conueied to Limbie, where he got ships, and with his nepheue the lord Henrie earle of Richmond sailed into Britaine, where, of the duke they were courtcouslie interteined; with assurance made, that no creature should doe them anie wrong or iniurie within his dominions. King Edward visiting diuerse places in Kent, fate in iudgement on such as had aided the bassard in the last commotion, of whom diuerse were condemned and executed, as spilling one of the captiues that assaulted Algate, whose head was set vp ouer the same gate: and so likewise was the head of one Quintine, a butcher, that was an other captiue amongst them, and chiefe of those that assaulted Bishops gate, as some write.

Whereouer, at Canturburie the mayor of that citie was executed, and diuerse other at Rochester, Maidston and Blackheath: for the lord marshall and other iudges, being appointed to hold their oier and determine in that countrey of Kent, there were aboue an hundred indicted and condemned. Diuerse also of other men that had bene partakers in this rebellion with the bassard, & holpe to set fire on Bishops gate and Algate, were hanged betwixt Stratford and London. Many also of the wealthie commons in Kent were put to grievous fines.

Now when the king had made an end of his business in that countrey, he returned to London, comming thither againe vpon Whitsun euen, being the first of June. And hauing thus within the space of eleuen weekes recovered in maner the whole possession of his realme, being relieved of the most part of all his doubtfull feare, he ment to remoue all stops out of the waie. Wherefore he sent the archbishop of Poike, brother to the earle of Marlowe, and to the marques Montacute ouer to Guisnes, there to be kept in safe custodie within the castell, where he continued a long season, till at length he was by friendship deliuered, and shortly after (through verie anguish of mind) departed this life: whome Laurence Bath, and after him Thomas Rotherham in the see of Poike, did ordinarilie succeed. Beside this, John earle of Oxford, which after Barnet field both manfully and valiantlie kept saint Michaels mount in Cornewall, either for lacke of aid, or perswaded by his friends, gaue vp the mount, and yielded himselfe to king Edward (his life onelie saued) which to him was granted. But to be out of all doubtfull imaginations, king Edward also sent him ouer the sea to the castell of Hammes, where, by the space of twelue yerres hee was in strong prison shut vp and warlike looked to.

King Edward was not a litle disquieted in mind, for that the earles of Penbroke & Richmond were not onlie escaped out of the realme, but also well receiued and no worse interteined of the duke of Britaine: he sent therefore in secret wise graue & close messengers to the said duke, the which should not sticke to promise the duke great and rich rewards, so that he would deliuer both the earles into their hands and possession. The duke, after he had heard them that were sent, made this answer, that he could not with his honor deliuer them, to whome he had giuen his faith to see them preserued from all iniurie: but this (he said) he would doe for the king of England, that they should be so looked vnto, as he needed not to doubt of any attempt to be made against him by them, or by their meanes.

The king receiuing this answer, wrote longlie to the duke of Britaine, that he would consider his friendship with conuenient rewards, if it should please him to be as good as his promise. The duke, perceiuing gainie comming by the abode of the two English earles in his countrey, caused them to be separated in sunder, and all their seruants being Englishmen to be sequestred from them, and in their places appointed Britains to attend them. In the thirteenth yere of his reigne, king Edward called his high court of parlement at his palace of Westminster, in the which all lawes and ordinances made by him before that daie were confirmed, and those that king Henrie had abrogated, after his readeption of the crowne, were againe renewed. Also lawes were made for the confiscation of traitors goods, and for the restoring of them that were for his sake fled the realme, which of his aduersaries had bene attainted of high treason, and condemned to die.

Whereouer, towards his charges of late sustained, a competent summe of monie was demanded, and freely granted. There was also a pardon granted almost for all offenses; and all men then being within the realme, were released and discharged of all high treasons and crimes, although they had taken part with his aduersaries against him. In this season the duke of Burgonie had sore wars with the French king; and to be the more speedilie reuenged on his aduersarie, he sent ambassadors into England, to persuade persuade king Edward to make warre also on the French king, for the recouerie of his ancient right to the realme of France, by the same French king against all equitie withholden and detained. In which attempt of his, there was some fauour of discret policie, and a prouident forecast for his greater safetie, besides the likelie possibilitie to obtaine that whereto he made chalenge: with the huger hostes (if the harder hearts) are of most force, according to that saying:

Virtus unita fortior.

And therefore, by procuring the king of Englands powder to loine with his, he supposed his purpose achievable with the more facilitie. King Edward not so much for the loue he bare to the duke of Burgognie, as for desire to be reuenged on the French king, whome he toke to be his enimie for aiding the earle of Marlike, quene Margaret, and his sonne prince Edward, with their complies, gaue god eare to the duke of Burgognie his messengers, and finally (after he had taken aduise of his counsell) the said messengers were answered, that king Edward in the beginning of the next yeare would land at Calis with a puissant armie, both to reuenge such iniuries as he had receiued at the French kings hands, and also to recouer his right, which he wrongfullie detained from him.

Opportunitie not to be neglected.

The earle of Daule.

In deed the time serued verie well for the Englishmen to achieve some high enterpryse in France at that present. For not onelie the duke of Burgognie as then made warre against the French king, but also manie great men within the realme of France, mistaking the manners of their king, began to haue secret intelligence with the said duke; and namelie Lewis of Lutzenburgh earle of saint Daule constable of France was secretlie confederate with the duke of Burgognie, intending verelie to bring the French king to some great hinderance, the better to haue his purpose accomplished in certaine weightie matters. King Edward vnderstanding all these things, was greatlie encouraged to make a iourne into France, and thereupon with all diligence prepared all things readie for the same.

A shift to recouer monie.

But because he wanted monie, and could not well charge his commons with a new subsidie, for that he had receiued the last yeare great summes of monie granted to him by parlement, he deuised this shift, to call asfoze him a great number of the wealthiest sort of people in his realme; and to them declaring his need, and the requisite causes thereof, he demanded of euerie of them some portion of monie, which they sticke not to giue. And therefore the king willing to shew that this their liberalitie was verie acceptable to him, he called this grant of monie, A beneuolence: notwithstanding that manie with grudge gaue great sums toward that new found aid which of them might be called, A maleuolence. But the king vsed such gentle fashions toward them, with frendlie prayer of their assistance in his necessitie, that they could not otherwise do, but franklie and freelie yeld and giue him a reasonable and competent summe.

Abt. Flem. ex Edw. Hall. fol. Cxxvj.

¶ But here I will not let passe a pretie conceipt that hapened in this gathering, in the which you shall not onelie note the humilitie of a king, but more the fantastic of a woman. King Edward had called before him a widow, much abounding in substance, and no lesse groune in peares, of whome he merilie demanded what she gladlie would giue him toward his great charges: By my truneth quoth she, for thy louelie countenance thou shalt haue even twentie pounds. The king looking scarce for the halfe of that summe, thanked hir, and louinglie kiss hir. Whether the flauor of his breath did so comfort hir stomach, or she esteemed the kisse of a king so pretious a reward, she swooze incontinentlie, that he should haue twentie pounds more, which she with the same will paid that she offered it. ¶ This peare the duke of Cresser was found dead in the sea betwene Dover and Calis, but how he came there the certaintie could not be knowne.]

¶ When all things conuenient for such an enterpryse were in a readinesse, the king came to Dover, where he found five hundred ships and boies readie to transport him and his armie. And so the fourth date of Iulie he passed ouer, and landed at Calis with great triumph; but his armie, horses, and munitions of war scarce passed ouer in twentie daies. In this armie (being one of the best appointed that had passed out of England into France in manie yeares before) were fiftene hundred men of armes well horsed, of the which the most part were barbed and rightie trapped, and manie of them trimmed in one sute. There were also fiftene thousand archers with bowes and arrowes, of the which a great number were on horsebacke. There were also a great companie of other fighting men, and of such as serued to set by tents and paulions, to attend the artillerie and to inclose their campe, and otherwise to labour and be imployed in seruice.

In all this armie was there not one page. The king of England was at his annual highlie displeased with the duke of Burgognie, who in the word of a prince had promised to meet him at his landing, with two thousand men of armes and light horsemen, besides a great number of lanceknights and halberdiers, and that he would haue begun the war three moneths before the kings transporting; where as contrarielie the duke laie lingering at the siege of Bussie, and let passe the occasion of achieving a more profitable enterpryse. King Edward incontinentlie dispatched the lord Scales in post vnto the duke, to put him in remembrance of his promise, and to aduise him to come and loine with him before the summer were spent.

Before king Edward departed from Dover, he sent an officer of armes vnto the French king with a defiance. The French king, receiuing the king of Englands letters at the messengers hand, read the same; and after he had considered thereof at leisure, he called the English herald asfoze, and to him declared the litle trust that was to be put in the duke of Burgognie and the constable, by whose procurement he knew that king Edward was procured to come at that season into France; and therefore it should be better for him to haue peace with an old enimie, than to stae vpon the promises and familiaritie of a new dissembling friend, which peace did highlie please God, & was the thing that he most desired. ¶ But to giue the greater grace to the matter in hand, it is good to laie downe the forme of the French kings speech to the said herald, to whome he vttered these words in his wardrobe, as Edward Hall reporteth.

Sir I know and well wot, that the king of England your maister, is neither descended in these parts of his owne free motion, nor yet of vs required; but onelie entised and prouoked by the duke of Burgognie, and somewhat enforced by the commons of his realme. But now you may see that the season of the yeare passeth, and the duke of Burgognie is in poore estate, returning from Bussie almost discomfited. The constable also, with whome the king your some reigne lord (I am sure) hath some intelligence, for fauour that your maister hath married his neece, is not so sure a friend as he is taken for. And if all the world knew how I haue promoted him, and what I haue done for him, they would little thinke, that he would so vntrulie handle me as he doth. For I assure you, he is a depe dissembler, & in continuall dissimulation on intenteth to lead his life, interteining all men for his owne profit. And although the king pour maister be vnware of all his other promyses, yet of one thing he shall be sure, that is, he shall be euer dissembled withall. And therefore I saie to you, and not to your maister, that he were better haue a peace with an old enemie, than the promyses and familiaritie of a new dissembling frend, which peace most pleaseeth God, and is the thing that I most doe desire.]

The herald of France

The duke of Burgoyne cometh to king Edward

When he had thus said, he gaue the herald three hundred crownes, promising him a thousand crownes if anie god appointment came to passe. This herald was borne in Normandie, who being more couetous of the crownes than secret (according as of dutie by his office he ought to haue bene) promised to doe all things that in him lay, and further shewed waies by the which the French king might enter into the port of treatie for peace, the which he doubted not would sort to a good conclusion. The French king glad to heare these things, gaue to the herald when he should depart, beside the other reward, a peece of crimson velvet of thirtie yards long. The lord Scales, coming to the duke of Burgoyne before Hulse, could not persuaide him to raise his field, and (as it stood him vpon) to come and ioine with king Edward, till at length constrained thereto by other means, he left Hulse vnconquered, and sending the most part of his armie into Lorraine, came with a small companie to king Edward lieng before Calis.

King Edward at the first comming of the duke vnto him, seemed much to reprove his vnwise dealing, in making so slow hast to ioine with him at this time, sith for his sake, and at his sute, he had passed the seas with his armie, to the intent to make wars in France in reuenge of both their iniuries; the time seruing their turnes so well as they could wish or desire, the opportunitie whereof could neuer happilie be recovered againe. The duke after he had excused himselfe, with alledging the dishonour that should haue rebounded to him, if he had left the siege of Hulse without meane of some shew of composition, encouraged king Edward to aduance forward with manie golden promyses, aswell of his owne part, as of the constable. The king agreed to the dukes persuasion, and so set forward.

The constable of France a large dull man.

But yet when he was entred into the dukes countries, the Englishmen were not so frendlie interteined as they looked to haue bene: for at their coming to Peronne, there were but a few suffered to enter the gates, the remnant were vsuall to lodge in the fields, better purueied of their owne, than of the dukes prouision. And at their comming before saint Quintines (which towne the constable had promised to deliuer into the hands of the duke of Burgoyne) the artillerie shot off, and they of the towne came forth both on horsebacke and foot to skirmish with them that approached, of the which two or three were slaine. This interteinement seemed strange to king Edward, pondering the last daies promise with this daies doing. But the duke excused the matter, and would haue persuaided him to make countenance to besiege the towne, that the constable might haue a colour to render it into his hands, as though he did it by constraint.

The duke of Burgoyne is reported,

But the king, remembering what had bene told to his herald by the French, how he should be dissembled with, perceiued the French kings words to be to true, and therefore thought it more sure to heare the faire words of the constable and the duke, than to giue credit to their vntrue and deceitfull doings. The Englishmen returned vnto their campe in a great chafe to wards the constable; and the next daie to increase their displeasure, an other cozofine was ministered, that smacked sorer, for duke Charles of Burgoyne toke his leaue suddenlie of king Edward, alledging that he must needs see his armie in Artois, promising shortly with all his puissance to returne againe to the great commoditie of them both. This departing much troubled the king of England, because he looked for no such thing; but thought rather that he should haue had the duke his continuall fellow in armes; and therefore this dissembling and vnstedfast working caused the king to thinke that he neuer thought, and to doe that he neuer intended.

The French king in this meane while had assembled a mightie power; ouer the which he had made monsieur Robert de Cloutille capitaine, whome he sent to Artois, to defend the frontiers there against the king of Englands entrie, and he himselfe tarried still at Senlis: but though he shewed countenance thus of warre, yet inwardlie desirous of peace, according to the aduise giuen him by the English herald, he caused a varlet or peoman (as I may call him) to be put in a coat armour of France, which for hall was made of a trumpet baner. For king Lewis was a man nothing precise in outward shewes of honoz, oftentimes hauing neither officer of armes, trumpet in his court, nor other rotall appurtenances belonging to the port of a prince, which should be glorious and replenished with pompe, as the poet saith:

This counterfeit herald, being thoroughlie instructed in his charge, was sent to the king of England, and so passing forth: when he approached the English campe, he put on his coat of armes, & being espied of the outriders, was brought to a tent, where the lord Holward and the lord Stanleie were at dinner, of whome he was courteously receiued, and by them conueied to the kings presence, vnto whom he declared his message so wittilie, that in the end he obtained a safe conduct for one hundred horses, for such persons as his maister should appoint to meet, as manie to be assigned by king Edward in some indifferent place betwene both armies, to haue a like safe conduct from his said maister, as he receiued from him. The words of which herald are worth the noting, reported in writers as followeth.

A messenger sent to the king of England.

Abt. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. fol. Ccxxxix, cccxxx.

The heralds oration to the king uttered with boldnesse of face and libertie of toong.

Right high and mightie prince, right puissant and noble king, if your excellent wisdom did perfectly know, or your high knowledge did apparantlie perceiue, what inward affection and feruent desire the king my maister hath alwaies had, to haue a perfect peace, a sure unitie, & a brotherlie concord, betwene your noble person and your realme, and his honorable personage and his dominions, you would (for truths sake) should confesse and saie, that neuer christian prince more thirsted for an amitie, nor yet no louer hath more sought to attaine to the fauour of his paramour, than he hath sought to haue with you a perpetuall frendship, amitie, and alliance: to the intent that the subiects of both the realms, quietlie liuing vnder two princes, confederate and combined together in an indissoluble confederacie and league, may mutually imbrace ech other in their harts, may personallie haue resort and frequent each others others princes territories and dominions, with their merchandises and wares: and finallye, the one to live with the other, as friends with friends, brother with brother, companion with companion, in continuall loue, rest, and tranquillitie. And for his part he doth affirme & saie, that since he received first the crowne of his kingdome, and was annointed with the holie ampull, he neuer attempted, nor yet once imagined a nie war, or thing preiudiciall toward your roiall person, your realme, or your people.

If you peradventure will saie, that he supported & maintained the earle of Warwick against your maiestie, he suerlie that doth & will denie: for he aided him against the duke of Burgognie, whom he knew not onelie to be his extreame enemie, but also to laie in wait (both by sea and land) either to take him, or utterly to destroye him. Which duke of Burgognie, onelie for his owne cause, hath excited and sollicitid your highnesse to come ouer the troublous and tempestuous seas, to the intent to cause (yea in maner to compell) the king my master, to condescend to such treatie and appointment, as should be to his onlie profit, and neither to your honour, nor yet to your game. For if he & such other as daile flattered him for their peculiar profits (as he had manie indeed that daile sucked at his elbow) had once obtained the thing that they breathed for, all your affaires were put in obliuion, and left at large for them, or their assistants, euen as they be at this daie. Hath not the duke of Burgognie caused you first to come into France, & after to set forward your armie; and in conclusion, for lacke of his promise, to lose the faire season of the yeare, and to lie in the fields in winter? Which warre (if it continue) shall neither be profitable to you, nor to your nobilitie, nor yet pleasant but painefull to your communitie: and finallye to both the realmes, and especiallie to merchant men shall bring both miserie, pouertie, and calamitie.

Came the duke of Burgognie from Russe to Calis, onlie to visit you: Knde he all that post hast onelie to blind you: Returned he backe into Lozaine againe for anie cause, but onelie to leaue you desolate, & to abandon you: Did he or the constable keepe anie one promise with you? Why do you then beleue, and yet still trust them, in whome you neuer found faith nor fidelitie: But if God will it so ordeine, that you and my master may toine in league and amitie, I dare both saie and sweare, that the fine stele neuer cleaued faster to the adamant stone, than he will sticke & claspe with you, both in wealth and wo, in prosperitie and aduersitie. And if it shall please you, to harken to anie reasonable treatie, I being a poore man, shall on ieopardie of my life which is my chiefe treasure, undertake, that this communication shall sort and come to such an effect, that both you & your nobilitie shall be glad and reioise, and your commons shall be contented and pleased, and they that haue deceived you, shall be both abashed and ashamed. Most humble beseeching your highnesse, if your pleasure shall incline this waie, that I may haue a sure safe conduct for one hundred hostes, for such personages as the king my master shall send into you with further intimation of his mind and purpose. And if your pleasure shall be to haue the communication in anie place indifferent betwene both the armies, then shall I warrant you the like safe conduct for your men, as you do send for ours.

When he had accomplished his message and instructions, the king of England and his counsell highlie commended his audacitie, his tongue, and his sobernesse, giuing to him in rewarde a faire gilt cup, with a hundred angels; deliuering him a safe conduct according to his request and demand, with the which he with speed departed, hauing with him an English herald to bring a like safe conduct from the French king.

After that the safe conducts were deliuered on both parts, the ambassadours met at a village beside Amiens. On the king of Englands side, the lord Howard; sir Thomas Saintleger; doctor Sperton; bishop of Elic; & chancellor of England, were these. For the French king, the bassard of Bourbon admiral of France; the lord Saint Pierre; & the bishop of Cureau called Heberge, were appointed as principall. The Englishmen demanded the whole realme of France, or at the least Normandie and whole Aquitaine. The allegations were proued by the Englishmen, and politikelie defended by the Frenchmen, so that with arguments, without conclusion, the day passed, and the commissioners departed, and made relation to their masters. The French king and his counsell would not consent, that the Englishmen should haue one foot of land within France; but rather determined to put him selfe & the whole realme in hazard and aduensure.

At the next meeting the commissioners agreed by on certaine articles, which were of both the princes accepted and allowed. It was first accorded, that the French king should paie to the king of England without delaie seuentie & five thousand crownes of the tunne; and yearelie fiftie thousand crownes to be paid at London during king Edwards life. And further it was agreed, that Charles the Dolphin should marrie the ladie Elizabeth, eldest daughter to king Edward, and they two to haue for the maintenance of their estates the whole duchie of Guien, or else fiftie thousand crownes yearelie to be paid within the Tower of London by the space of nine yeares; and at the end of that terme, the Dolphin and his wife to haue the whole duchie of Guien, and of the charge the French king to be cleerlie acquit. And it was also concluded, that the two princes should come to an interview, and there take a corporall oth for the performance of this peace, either in sight of other.

On the king of Englands part were compysed as allies (if they would thereto assent) the dukes of Burgognie and Britaine. It was also covenanted, that after the whole summe aforesaid of seuentie and five thousand crownes were paid to king Edward, he should leaue in hostage the lord Howard, and sir John Cheinie master of his house, untill he with all his armie was passed the seas. This agreement was verie acceptable to the French king; for he saw himselfe and his realme thereby deliuered of great perill that was at hand; for not onelie he should haue bene assailed (if this peace had not taken place) both by the power of England and Burgognie, but also by the duke of Britaine, and diuerse of his owne people, as the constable and others. The king of England also understanding his owne state, for want of monie, to mainteine the warres, if they should long continue (though otherwise he desired to haue attempted some high enterpryse against the Frenchmen) was the more easilie induced to agree by those of his counsell, that loued peace better than warre, and their wiues soft beds better than hard armour and a stonie lodging.

But the duke of Glocester & others, whose swords thirsted for French blood, cried out on this peace; saying that all their trauell, paines, & expenses were to their shame lost and cast awaie, and nothing gained but a continuall mocke (and daillie derision of the French king and all his minions. This imagination took effect without delay. For a gentleman of the French kings chamber, after the peace was concluded, did demand of an Englishman, how manie battels king Edward had vanquished: He answered, nine: wherein he himselfe personallie had bene. A great honour said the Frenchman. But I praise you (quoth he smiling) how manie hath he lost: The Englishman perceiving that he meant, said: one, which you by policie, and by no strength, haue caused him to lose.

Well said the Frenchman, you maie ponder in a paire of balance, the gaine of nine gotten battels, and the rebuke of this one in this maner lost: for I tell you, that we haue this saying; The force of England hath and doth surmount the force of France: but the ingenious wits of the Frenchmen excell the dull braines of Englishmen. For in all battels you haue bene the gainers, but in leaguers and treaties our wits haue made you losers: so that you maie content your selues with the losse in treaties, for the spoile that you gat in warres and battels. This communication was reported to the French king, who priuie sent for the Englishman to supper, and not onlie made him good chere, but also gaue him a thousand crownes, to praise the peace and to helpe to mainteine the same. Yet neuertheless, he being not a little moued with these bzags, declared all the communication to the duke of Glocester; who swore, that he would neuer haue set foot out of England, if he had not thought to haue made the Frenchmen once to assaile the strength & puissance of the Englishmen: but what so euer he thought, all things were transferred vnto an other end than he could imagine.]

When the duke of Burgognie heard that there was a peace in hand betwixt king Edward and the French king, he came in no small hast from Lutzeburgh, onelie accompanied with sixtene horses into the king of Englands lodging, and began as one in a great chafe soze to blame his doings, declaring in plaine termes how dishonorable this peace should be vnto him, hauing achieved nothing of that about the which he came. The king of England, after he had giuen him leaue to speake his fantasie, answered him somewhat roundlie againe, openlie reprimanding him for his promise-breaking and vncourteous dealing with him: where for his cause chafie he had passed the seas, and now found him not to keepe touch in a one point which he had covenanted. But to adde more weight to the matter in hand, sith it was so scrupulous debated betwene the two potentats, let vs heare what talke historiens report to haue bene interchanged betwene them. The king of England (saith mine author) not a little abashed both at the dukes sudden coming, and his fierce countenance, like one that would rather bite than bite, demanded of him the cause of his sudden coming. The duke sharpelie answered, to know whether he had either entered into anie communication, or onelie had absolutelie concluded a peace betwene the French king and him. King Edward declared how that for sundrie and diuerse great and vrgent causes, touching as well the vniuersall publike wealth of the whole christianitie, as their owne priuate commoditie and the quietnesse of their realmes, he and the French king had concluded a peace and amitie for terme of nine yeares, in the which were comprised, as fellowes and friends, both he and the duke of Britaine, requiring him to condescend and agree to the same.

Oh Lord, oh saint George (quoth the duke of Burgognie) haue you thus done in deed: Haue you passed the seas, entered into France, and without killing of a poxe die, or burning of a felie theperote, and haue taken a shamefull truce? Did your noble ancestoz, Edward the third, euer make armie into France (as he made manie) in the which he did not either gaine victorie in battell, or profit in conquering cities, towncs, and countries: That victorious prince, as nere kin to me, as you to king Henrie the fifth, I meane whose blood you haue either rightfullie or wrongfullie (God knoweth) extinguished & destroyed, with a small puissance entered into France, conquered whole Normandie, and not alonelie conquered it, but peaceablie kept it, and neuer would either comen or agree to anie league, vntill he had the whole realme of France offered him; & was thereof made regent and heire apparant. And you without anie thing doing, or anie honour or profit gaining, haue condescended to a peace, both as honourable and as profitable to you as a peasecod, and not so wholesome as a pomegranat. Thinke you that I either moued you, or once intiled you to take this iournie for my peculiar aduantage or commoditie (which of my power am able to reuenge mine owne causes, without helpe of others) but onelie to haue you recouer your old rights and possessions, which were from you both tortiouslie and wrongfullie withhelden: And to the intent that you shall know that I haue no need of your aid, I will neither enter into your league, nor take truce with the French king, till you be passed the sea, and haue bene there thre moneths.

When duke Charles had thus said, he furiously threw downe his chaire, and would haue departed. But the king him said & said: Brother Charles, sith you haue spoken at leasure what you would, you must and shall heare againe what you would not. And first, as concerning our entrie into France, no man liuing knoweth that occasion, neither so well, nor hath cause halfe so well to remember it as you: for if you haue not fullie put your greatest things (to be had in memorie) in your booke of oblivion, you be not yet out of mind how the French king, for all your power, took from you the faire towne of Amiens, and the strong pile of saint Quintins, with diuerse other towncs, which you neither durst nor yet were able either to rescue or defend. Since which time, how he hath plagued you, how he hath taken from you your friends; yea, of your priuate chamber and secret counsell (by whome all your secrets be to him reuealed and made open) you know or haue better cause to remember, and not to forget them. And when you determined to bessege the towne of Aulse, you thought your selfe in a great doubt, whether you should lose more at home by your absence (the French king dreaming and waiting like a fox for his preie) or gaine more in Germanie by your power and presence. And to keepe the wolfe from the fold, that is, the French king from your castles and dominions, was the chiefe and principall cause whie you

"you so false praise me, so sore laboured and intised me "to passe ouer the sea, promising mounteins of gold,
 "which turned into snow and wasted into water, boar"ding and craking to send hostemen and footmen; and "yet shewing neither lackie nor page. If we had made "our enterpryse for our selfe solie and in our owne quar-
 "rell, thinke you that we would haue expected your "comming? If the aduenture had bene for to haue "recovered our right, imagine you that we would
 "haue passed the sea so slenderlie as we did, looking for "your aid? Nay, nay, you should haue well knowen,
 "if we had intended a conquest, that we would haue
 "so stronglie invaded & set on the realme of France, "that what with sauer of burning of towncs, and in"fection of the aier, corrupted by the multitude of dead "carcasses of our staine enemies, your countries of "Flanders & Brabant should haue had causes enow "to wonder at: trusting that that which we had got"ten, we would haue kept as well as anie of our suc"cessors haue done.

 Edw. Hall, fol.

"Herewith (being in a great rage) he bad the king of "England farewell, and suddenlie toke his horse, and "rode againe to Lutzenburgh, promising not to enter "into anie league with the French king, till king Ed"ward was passed the seas againe into England, and "had bene there thre moneths: but this promise was "not performed, for of necessitie he toke a wiser waie,
 "and agreed with the French king upon a truce im-"mediatlie after the departure of the English armie "out of his countrie. The constable of France also,
 "doubting that his vntruth would be disclosed to his
 "destruction, by means of this agreement betwene
 "the kings of England and France, as soone as he "heard they were entred into communication there"of, sent to king Edward, requiring him not to credit
 "the French kings promises, which he would no lon"ger obserue, than untill he should once vnderstand, "that he was on the other side of the sea: and rather "than he should agree for want of monie, he offered to "lend him fiftie thousand crownes. But the king of "England, sith the accord was passed and agreed,
 "would not change anie thing for the promises of so
 "slippery a merchant as he knew the constable to be.

"Then was the constable in manner on all sides "in despayre, but yet he wrote to the French king by "his messengers, beseeching him to giue no credit or "beliefe to anie tale told or saied against him, with"out hearing his answer, affirming that the king had "alwaies knowen his truth and fidelitie toward the "crowne of France, and so should he still find him till "his dying daie, promising and warranting him, if "that it should stand with his pleasure, that he would "so compasse the duke of Burgonie, that they two "should vtterlie destroye the king of England and his "armie per they returned. The counsellors of the "French king made answer, that their master and the "king of England were ioined and confedered in a "sure amitie. Wherefore they would in no wise know "nor condescend to anie thing that might be either "preiudiciall, or once sound to the detriment of the "Englishmen: but they said, that the king their ma"ster much trusted the constable, and that for his sake

 "he would talke with them in his priuite chamber. The "French king, before their entrie into his chamber, "caused the lord of Containe, seruant vnto the duke of "Burgonie, accompanied with the lord of Argen"ton, one of his priuite counsell, to stand secretlie be"hind a seeling or hanging in his chamber, & he him"selfe sat in a chaire directlie before that place, so that "what soeuer were purposed to him, they standing be"hind the cloth, might plainlie see and easilie heare the "same.

"Lewes de Creuell and his fellow entered into the "kings chamber, of nothing thinking lesse than of the "spirits inclosed. They declared what paine their ma"ster had taken for the French kings sake, to send,
 "moue and entise the duke of Burgonie to leaue,
 "and cleaue to forsake the king of England, which "duke they found in such a rage and furie against "the Englishmen, that at their request he was not
 "onely vtterlie determined to forsake and refuse "their amitie, but also would send out aduenturers and "lanceknights, to rob and spoile them in their retur"ning. And in speaking these words (thinking suerlie "much to please the king) the said Lewes counterfeited
 "the fashion and gesture of the duke of Burgonie,
 "and began to stampe with his foot on the ground,
 "and beat with his fist on the table, swearing by saint
 "George that the king of England was not extracted "of anie noble house, but was a yeomans sonne; and "that when he was not worth one halfe penie, he was "restored to his kingdome, and made king onlie by "his aid, reproouing and reuiling him with such ill
 "words, and so shamefull termes, that all the hearers "abhorred it.

"The French king, faining that he was thicke of "hearing, caused him to reiterate his saying againe,
 "who so counterfeited the verie gesture of the dukes
 "angrie countenance and rozing voice, that no man
 "hath seene a better counterfeitor or actor in anie co-"medie or tragedie. The lord of Containe was sore dis"pleased to see his master made a iesting stocke; but "he kept all these things secret, till his returne to his "master. When the pageant was played, the king bad
 "the messengers of the constable to haue him com"mended to his brother their master, and to declare to "him that as newes rose & grew, he would therof ad"uertise him, & so gaue them licence to depart to their "master, who thought himselfe now to be in great "suertie of his estate, when in deed he was neuer so "nere his fall and perdition: esteeming the duke of "Burgonie to be his assured friend, who hated him "more than a Painime or Turke, accompting also "the French king to haue no ill suspicion in him, who "neither trusted nor yet beleued anie word, writing "or message that was either written or sent from him.
 "Such end hath dissimulation, such fruit springeth of "double dealing and craftie conuicieng. For if either "the constable had bene faithfull to the king his ma"ster, as of bounden dutie and allegiance he ought to "be, or else had kept his promise made to the king of "England and duke of Burgonie, and not dallied "and dissembled with them, he had suerlie in his extre-"mitie bene aided, succoured and comforted of one of "these thre at the least; where now he was of all thre "forsaken, and yet not forsaken, but sought for, looked "for, and watched for; not for his profit or promotion, "but for his vndoying and destruction: whereof he was "the principall procurer, as manie a one besides; where-
 "to the poet had an eie, when he made this outcrie of "intoward graefe seasoned with sorrow and repentance:

wanted, and had plentie of wine (for the French king had sent into their armie a hundred carts of the best wine that could be gotten) and god there made them of his owne costs. For at the enterie of euerie gate, there were two long tables set on euerie side of the street where they should passe; and at euerie table five or six gentlemen of the best companions of all the countrie were appointed to intertaine the Englishmen as they entered, not onelie to see them serued without lacking (but also to drinke and make god chere, and keepe companie with them. And euer as they entered into the towne, they were taken by the bidels and in maner enforced to drinke, wherefore euer they came they paid no monie, but were sent scot free.] This chere lasted three or foure daies not onelie to the French kings cost, but also to his vniuersitie at length, doubting to haue bene disposed of his towne.

For on a daie there entered the number of nine thousand Englishmen well armed in sundrie companies, so that no Frenchman durst once forbid them to enter. But finally, order was taken by the king of England, who meant no deceit, that no greater number should enter than was conuenient, and the other were called backe; so that the French king and his counsell were well quieted, and rid of casting further perils than need required. After this, both the kings entertained together at Picquenie on the water of Some three leagues about Amiens, shewing great courtesie either to other. The letters of both their agreements were opened and red, & then either prince laid his right hand on the missall, and his left hand on the halie crosse (as it was termed) and toke there a solemne oth to obserue and keepe the treatie for nine yeares concluded betwene them, with all their confederates and allies, compysed, mentioned and specified in the same, and further to accomplish the marriage of their children.

There was with either prince twelve noble men at this meeting, which was upon a bridge cast ouer the water of Some, a grate being set ouerthwart the same in the midst, so from side to side, that the one prince could not come vnto the other; but onelie to imbrace ech other, in putting their armes through the holes of the grate. There were foure Englishmen appointed to stand with the Frenchmen on the bridge to see their demeanour; and likewise foure Frenchmen were appointed to the Englishmen for the same purpose. There were with the king of England his brother the duke of Clarence, the earle of Northumberland, the bishop of Ely his chancelor, the lord Hastings his chamberleine, and eight others. They had louing and verie familiar talke together a good space, both afoze their companie, and secretlie alone, whilst their companie (of courtesie) withdrew somewhat backe.

But it is noteworthie which I read touching both the kings meeting, the manner of their attire, and demeanour; namelie that when the token of meeting by the spot of the artillerie was knowne, the French king with twelve noble men entered the bridge, and came to the clozure, with whome was John duke of Bourbon, and the cardinal his brother, a prelat more meet for a ladies carpet, than for an ecclesiasticall pulpit, and ten other, amongst whome the lord of Argenton was in like disguised attire as the French king wore, for so was his pleasure that daie to haue him adorned. The king of England and foure other with him were apparelled in cloth of gold frised, having on his bonet of blacke velvet a flower delice of gold, set with verie rich and orient stones; he was a goodlie faire and beautifull prince, beginning a litle to grow in flesh. Now when he approached nere the grate, he toke off his cap, and made a low and solemne obedisance: the French king made to him an humble reuerence, but after his fashion somewhat homelie. King Leues imbraced king Edward through the barriers, saying: Cousine you be right hartilie wel come into these parties, assuring you that there is no man in the world that I haue more desired to see and speake with, than with you; and now landed be almightie God, we be here met together for a good and godlie purpose, whereof I doubt not but that we shall haue cause to reioisse. The king of England thanked him, and answered to his words so soberlie, so grauelie, and so princelie, that the Frenchmen thereat not a litle mused. The chancelor of England made there a solemne oration in laud and praise of peace, concluding on a prophesie, which said that at Picquenie should be concluded a peace both honorable and profitable to the realmes of England and France.

When the oth was taken and swoyne (as before you haue heard) the French king said merilie to king Edward; Brother, if you will take pains to come to Paris, you shall be feasted and intertained with ladies; and I shall appoint you the cardinal of Bourbon for your confessor, which shall gladly absolve you of such sinnes, if any be committed. The king of England toke these words pleasantlie and thankfullie, for he was informed that the cardinal was a good companion, and a chapleine meet for such a daling pastime. When this communication was merilie ended, the French king, intending to shew himselfe like a maister amongst his seruants, made all his companie to draw backe from him, meaning to commune with the king of England secretlie. The Englishmen withdrew them without any commandement: Then the two kings communed alone secretlie, I thinke not to the profit of the constable of France. The French king demanded of king Edward, whether the duke of Burgognie would accept the truce: King Edward answered that he would once againe make an offer; and then vpon the refusal, he would referre and report the truth to them both. When king Leues began to speake of the duke of Britaine, whome he would faine haue excepted out of the league. To whom the king of England answered: Brother, I require you to moue no warre to the duke of Britaine; for on my fidelitie, in the time of my need and aduersitie, I neuer found a more friendlie, sure and stedfast louer than he.

Then king Leues called his companie againe, and with most lowlie and amiable commendations toke his leaue of the king of England, speaking certeine friendlie words to euerie Englishman: king Edward doing likewise to the Frenchmen. Then both at one time departed from the barriers, & mounted on horsebacke, and departed; the French king to Amiens, and king Edward to his armie. To whom was sent out of the French kings house, all things necessarie for a prince, inso much that neither torches nor torchets lacked vntill. When the French king was departed from Picquenie, he called to him the lord of Argenton, saying: By the peace of God, the king of England is an amorous and a faire prince, he at the first becke would gladly see Paris, where he might fortune to find such pleasant and talkatiue dames, which with faire words & pleasant pastimes might so allure him to their fantasies; that it might had occasion in him to come ouer the sea againe, which I would not gladly see. For his progenitors haue borne too long and too often both in Paris and Normandie. On this side the sea I loue neither his sight nor his companie; but when he is at home I loue him as my brother, and take him as my friend.

The French king, after this departing, soe desired to make warre on the duke of Britaine: which he could not doe, except he were left out of the treatie.

Therefore he sent the lord of Buchage, and the lord of saint Pierre, to the king of England, intreating him by all waies and motions possible, to leaue the duke of Britaine for his alie, and not to haue him comprehended in the league. The king of England hearing them so serioullie and so feruentlie speake against the duke of Britaine; with an earnest countenance answered, saieing: My lords, I assure you, " if I were peaceable at home in my realme, yet for the defense of the duke of Britaine and his countrie, " I would passe the seas againe, against all them that either would doo him iniurie, or make warre vpon him. The French lords nothing further saieing, much marvelled why the king of England so fuerlie claue to the duke of Britains partie: but they knew not (or else at the least remembred not) that Henrie earle of Richmond was within the power and dominion of the duke of Britaine, whome king Edwards had taste euer gaue him would make once a title to the crowne of England, as next heire to the house of Lancaster. For he knew well, that if the duke of Britaine would transport him into England (where hee had both kinsfolks and friends) with neuer so small an aid (yea, though it were but the shadow of an arme) then were he enforced newlie to begin againe a conquest, as though he had neuer wonne the crowne, nor obtained the possession of the realme, which was the verie cause why he stucke so thye to the duke of Britains part.

The same night the lords returned to Amiens, and reported to their maister king Edwards answer, who therewith was not the best pleased. But pleasure or displeasure, there was no remedie but to dissemble the matter. This same night also, there came the lord Howard, and two other of the king of Englands counsell, who had bene coadiutors toward the peace, to the French king to supper. The lord Howard said to the French king secretlie in his eare, that if it stood with his pleasure, he could persuade the king of England to come to Amiens, yea, peradventure as farre as Paris, familiarlie and friendlie to solace himselfe with him, as his trustie friend and faithfull brother. The French king, to whom this motion was nothing pleasant, calling for water, washed, and rose without anie answer making: but he said to one of his counsell, that he imagined in his owne conceipt, that this request would be made. The Englishmen began againe to commune of that matter, the Frenchmen politikelie brake their communication, saieing: that the king with all celeritie must march forward against the duke of Burgognie.

Although this motion seemed onelie to increase loue and continuall amitie betwene the princes; yet the Frenchmen, hauing in their perfect remembrance the innumerable damages and hurts, which they of late daies had sustained by the English nation (whereby continuall hatred increased against them in France) thought by policie and wisdom, with faire words and friendlie countenance, to put by this request, and to motion them rather to depart homeward, than to picke them forward to Paris; where peradventure they might be so intertained at this time, that they would at another come thither, both undesired and vnwelcomed. This peace was said to be made onelie by the Holie-ghost, because that on the daie of meeting, a white dove sat on the top of the king of Englands tent: whether she fate there to drie hir, or came thither as a token giuen by God, I referre it to your iudgment. At this treatie and meeting was not the duke of Gloucester, nor other lords which were not content with this truce; but the duke came afterwards to Amiens, with diuers other lords of England, to the French king, which both highlie feasted them, and also presented them with plate and hories well garnished.

King Edward, considering what gaine the Englishmen had gotten by making warre in France; and what miserie, what calamitie, and what povertie the French nation had suffered, and manie peeres sustained, by reason of the said warres; determined clearelie rather to pacifie and interteine the English nation by faire words and great rewards (although it were to his great charge) than by too much hardnesse to put himselfe, his nobilitie & realme in hazard, by giuing them battell, as his predecessours had vnwilselie done at Poitiers, and at Agincourt. Wherefore to bnie peace, he granted king Edward for a yearelie tribute fiftie thousand crownes, to be paid at London; which, accounting a crowne at foure shillings, amounteth to ten thousand pounds. And to haue the fauour and good will of his chiefe counsellors, he gaue great pensions, amounting to the summe of sixtene thousand crownes a yeare, that is to saie: to his chancelor, to the lord Hastings his chiefe chamberleine, a man of no lesse wit than vertue, and of great authoritie with his maister, and that not without cause; for he had as well in time of aduersitie, as in the faire flattering world, well and truelie serued him: and to the lord Howard, to sir Thomas Montgomerie, to sir Thomas Sentleger, to sir John Cheynie maister of the kings hories, to the marques Dorset, sonne to the queene, and diuerse other, he gaue great and liberrall rewards, to the intent to keepe himselfe in amitie with England, while he wan and obtained his purpose and desire in other places.

These persons had giuen to them great gifts, beside yearelie pensions. For Argenton his counsellor affirmed of his owne knowledge, that the lord Howard had in lesse than the tearme of two yeares, for reward in monie and plate, foure and twentie thousand crownes; & at the time of this meeting, he gaue to the lord Hastings the kings chiefe chamberleine, (as the Frenchmen write) an hundred markes of siluer, made in plate, whereof euerie marke is eight ounces sterling. But the English writers affirme, that he gaue the lord Hastings foure and twentie dozen bolles, that is to saie, twelue dozen gilt, & twelue dozen bngilt, euerie cup beinge senentene nobles: which gift, either betokened in him a great liberrall nature, or else a great and especiall confidence that he had reposed in the said lord chamberleine. Beside this, he gaue him yearelie two thousand crownes pension, the which summe he sent to him by Piers Cleret, one of the maisters of his house, giuing him in charge to receiue of him an acquittance for the receipt of the same pension, to the intent that it should appeare in time to come, that the chancelor, chamberleine, admerall, maisters of the hories to the king of England, and manie other of his counsell, had bin in fee and pensionaries of the French king, whose yearelie acquittances (the lord Hastings onelie excepted) remaine of record to be shewed in the chamber of accounts in the palace of Paris.

When Piers Cleret had paid the pension to the lord Hastings, he gentlie demanded of him an acquittance for his discharge. Which request when he denied, he theronlie asked of him a bill of these lines to be directed to the king, testifying the receipt of the pension: to the intent that the king your maister should not thinke the pension to be imbevelled. The lord Hastings, although he knew that Piers demanded nothing but reason, answered him: Sir, this gift cometh onelie of the liberrall pleasure of the king his maister, and not of my request: if it be his determinat will that I shall haue it, then put you it into my steue; and if not, I praye you render to him his gift againe: for neither he nor you shall haue either letter, acquittance, or scroll signed with my hand of the receipt of anie pension, to the intent to byge another daie, that the kings chamberleine of England hath bene pensionarie with the French king, & shew his acquittance in the chamber of accounts, to his dishonor. Whers left his monie behind, and made relation of all things to his maister: which although that he had not his will, yet he much more praised the wisdom and policie of the lord Hastings, than of the other pensionaries, commanding him perforce to be paid, without anie discharge demanding.]

When the king of England had receiued his monie, and his nobilitie their rewards, he trassed by his tents, laded his baggage, and departed towards Calis. [But per he came there, he remembryng the craftie dissimulation, and the vntrue dealing of the earle of saint Paule, high constable of France, intending to declare him to the French king in his verie true likenesse and portrature, sent unto him two letters of credence, twittyn by the said constable, with the true report of all such words and messages as had bene to him sent, and declared by the said constable and his ambassadours. Which letters the French king gladlie receiued, and thankfullie accepted, as the cheefe instrument to bring the constable to his death: which he escaped no long season after, such is the end of dissemblers.] When king Edward was come to Calis, and had set all things in an order, he toke ship, and sailed with a prosperous wind into England, and was roiallie receiued upon Blackheath by the maior of London and the magistrates, and five hundred commoners apparrelled in murrie, the eight and twentieth daie of September, and so conueied through the citie of Westminster, where for a while (after his long labour) he reposed himselfe: euerie daie almost talking with the queene his wife of the marriage of his daughter, whome he caused to be called Dolphine: thinking nothing surer than that marriage to take effect, according to the treatie. The hope of which marriage caused him to dissimble, and do things which afterward chanced greatlie to the French kings profit, & smallie to his.]

About the same season, the French king, to compass his purpose for the getting of the constable into his hands, toke truce with the duke of Burgonie for nine peares, as a contractor in the league, and not comprehender as an other princes alie. The king of England advertised hereof, sent ouer sir Thomas Spontgonmerie to the French king, offering to passe the seas againe the next summer in his aid, to make warres on the duke Burgonie: so that the French king should paie to him fiftie thousand crownes for the losse which he should susteine in his custome, by reason that the wolles at Calis (because of the warres) could haue no bent, and also paie halfe the charges and halfe the wages of his souldiers and men of warre. The French king thanked the king of England for his gentle offer, but he alledged that the truce was already concluded, so that he could not then attempt anie thing against the same without reproch to his honour.

But the truth was, the French king neither loved the sight nor liked the companie of the king of England on that side the sea; but when he was here at home, he both loved him as his brother, and toke him as his friend. Sir Thomas Spontgonmerie was with place rightie rewarded, and so dispatched. Where returned with him the lord Howard and sir John Cheinie, which were hostages with the French king, till the English armie were returned into England. King Edward, hauing established all things in good order, as men might iudge, both within his realme and without, was yet troubled in his mind, for that

Henrie the earle of Richmond (one of the blood of king Henrie the first) was alieue, and at libertie in Britaine: therefore to attempt to stonke the mind of Francis duke of Britaine, he sent ouer unto the said duke, one doctor Stillington, and two other his ambassadours laden with no small summe of gold.

These ambassadours, declaring their message, affirmed that the king their maister willed to haue the earle of Richmond onellie for this purpose, to ioine with him in aliance by marriage, and so to plucke by all the leauings of discord betwene him and the contrarie faction. The duke gentlie heard the orators. And though at the first he by excuses denied their request, yet at the length, beleuing that king Edward would giue to the earle his eldest daughter, the labie Elizabeth in marriage, he consented to deliuer him, and receiued of the English orators a great summe of monie. But per they were imbarked with their price, the duke being aduertised, that the earle of Richmond was not so earnestlie sought for, to be conpled in marriage with king Edwards daughter; but rather that his head might be chopped off with an hatchet, caused his treasurer, Peter Lantolfe to conueie the said earle of Richmond into a sanctuarie at St. Spalo, where the English ambassadours then laie, onellie staleng for a conuenient wind: who complained, that they were euill bled, to be spoiled both of their monie and merchandize.

Yet because the matter was so handled, that it seemed the earle escaped into the sanctuarie through their owne negligence, after they had receiued him into their hands, they were sone answered: but yet promise was made, that the earle should be safellie kept, either in the sanctuarie, or else as prisoner in the dukes house, that they should not need to feare him more than his shadow. And thus the king of England purchased for his monie the keeping of his enemie, the space onellie of thre daies and no more. King Edward was somewhat displeased with this chance, but yet trusting that the duke of Britaine would (according to promise) see the earle of Richmond safellie kept from doing anie greuaunce to him or his subiects, put all doubts therof out of his mind, and began to studie how to keepe a liberall princelie house, and thereupon stoyng his chests with monie, he imploied no small portion in good housekeeping.

But hauing spoken thus much of the earle of Richmond, whome Edward Hall compareth to a sheepe bestraid into the teth and clauies of the wolfe, you shall vnderstand, that at such time as his troubles were set fresh abroach, and he knowing that he was going towards his death, for vertie penitencelie and inward thought, fell into a seruent and sore ague. In which verie season, one John Cheulet, so esteemed among the princes of Britaine as few were in all the countrie, and in much credit, and well accepted with the duke, was (when these things were thus concluded) for his solace in the countrie. Who being hereof certified, was chased with the abhominatton of the fact, resorted to the court, and familiarlie came to the dukes presence, where he stood so sadlie and so palte, without anie word speaking, that the duke was much abashed, and suddenlie maruelled at his sad and frowning countenance, and demanded of him what should signifie that dampnesse of mind, and inward sighing, the which by his countenance manifestlie appeared and was euident. He modestlie answered; Most noble and redoubted lord, this palnesse of visage and deadlie loke doth prognosticate the time of my death to approach and be at hand, which if it had chanced to me before this daie, I assure you, it had much lesse hurt me. For then had I not bene reserued to feele the dolorous pangis and sorrowfull sighings, which a fact by you done (that I thought impossible

England,

C. lxxviij.

When the king of England had receiued his monie, and his nobilitie their rewards, he trusted by his tents, laded his baggage, and departed towards Calis. [But yet he came there, he remembryng the craftie dissimulation, and the vntreue dealing of Helmes earle of saint Paule, high constable of France, intending to declare him to the French king in his verie true likenesse and portraiture, sent vnto him two letters of credence, written by the said constable, with the true report of all such wordes and messages as had bene to him sent, and declared by the said constable and his ambassadours. Which letters the French king gladly receiued, and thankesfullie accepted, as the cheefe instrument to bring the constable to his death: which he escaped no long season after, such is the end of dissemblers.] When king Edward was come to Calis, and had set all things in an order, he took ship, and sailed with a prosperous wind into England, and was roiallie receiued vpon Blackheath by the maior of London and the magistrates, and five hundred commoners apparelled in murrie, the eight and twentieth daie of September, and so conueied through the cite of Westminster, where for a while (after his long labour) he reposed himselfe: euerie daie almost talking with the quene his wife of the marriage of his daughter, whom he caused to be called Dolphynesse: thinking nothing sorer than that marriage to take effect, according to the treatie. The hope of which marriage caused him to dissemble, and do things which after ward chanced greatlie to the French kings profit, & smallie to his.

Edw. Hall
C. lxxviij.

About the same season, the French king, to compass his purpose for the getting of the constable into his hands, took truce with the duke of Burgonie for nine yeares, as a contractor in the league, and not comprehended as an other princes alie. The king of England aduertised hereof, sent ouer sir Thomas Spontgonmerie to the French king, offering to passe the seas againe the next summer in his aid, to make warres on the duke Burgonie: so that the French king should paie to him fiftie thousand crownes for the losse which he should susteine in his custome, by reason that the wolles at Calis (because of the warres) could haue no bent, and also paie halfe the charges and halfe the wages of his souldiers and men of warre. The French king thanked the king of England for his gentle offer, but he alledged that the truce was already concluded, so that he could not then attempt anie thing against the same without reproch to his honour.

Sir Thomas Spontgonmerie.

But the truth was, the French king neither loved the sight nor liked the companie of the king of England on that side the sea; but when he was here at home, he both loved him as his brother, and took him as his friend. Sir Thomas Spontgonmerie was with plate richly rewarded, and so dispatched. Where returned with him the lord Howard and sir John Cheine, which were hostages with the French king, till the English armie were returned into England. King Edward, hauing established all things in good order, as men might iudge, both within his realme and without, was yet troubled in his mind, for that

Edw. Reg. 15.

Henrie the earle of Richmond (one of the blood of king Henrie the first) was alieue, and at libertie in Britaine: therefore to attempt cōsones the mind of Francis duke of Britaine, he sent ouer vnto the said duke, one doctor Stillington, and two other his ambassadours laden with no small summe of gold.

Henrie earle
of Richmond.

These ambassadours, declaring their message, affirmed that the king their maister willed to haue the earle of Richmond onelie for this purpose, to ioine with him in aliance by marriage, and so to plucke by all the leauings of discord betwene him and the contrarie faction. The duke gentlie heard the orators. And though at the first he by excuses denied their request, yet at the length, beleuing that king Edward would giue to the earle his eldest daughter, the ladie Elizabeth in marriage, he consented to deliuer him, and receiued of the English orators a great summe of monie. But yet they were imbarcked with their price, the duke being aduertised, that the earle of Richmond was not so earnestlie sought for, to be coupled in marriage with king Edwards daughter; but rather that his head might be chopped off with an hatchet, caused his treasurer Peter Landouise to conueie the said earle of Richmond into a sanctuarie at St. spalo, where the English ambassadours then laie, onelie staing for a conuenient wind: who complained, that they were euill bled, to be spoiled both of their monie and merchandize.

Ambassadours into BritaineThe earle of Richmond
taketh sanctuarie.

Yet because the matter was so handled, that it seemed the earle escaped into the sanctuarie through their owne negligence, after they had receiued him into their hands; they were sone answered: but yet promise was made, that the earle should be safelie kept, either in the sanctuarie, or else as prisoner in the dukes house, that they should not need to feare him more than his shadow. And thus the king of England purchased for his monie the keeping of his enemie, the space onelie of thre daies and no more. King Edward was somewhat displeased with this chance, but yet trusting that the duke of Britaine would (according to promise) see the earle of Richmond safelie kept from doing anie grēuance to him or his subjects, put all doubts therof out of his mind, and began to studie how to keepe a liberall princelie house, and there vpon storing his chests with monie, he imploied no small portion in god housekeeping.

But hauing spoken thus much of the earle of Richmond, whom Edward Hall compareth to a sheepe betrayed into the teeth and clawes of the wolfe, you shall vnderstand, that at such time as his troubles were set fresh abroach, and he knowing that he was going towards his death, for verie pensifensse and inward thought, fell into a feruent and sore ague. In which verie season, one John Cheulet, so esteemed among the princes of Britaine as few were in all the countrie, and in much credit, and well accepted with the duke, was (when these things were thus concluded) for his solace in the countrie. Who being hereof certified, was chafed with the abhominatō of the fact, resorted to the court, and familiarlie came to the dukes presence, where he stood so sadlie and so pale, without anie word speaking, that the duke was much abashed, and suddenlie maruelled at his sad and frowning countenance, and demanded of him what should signifie that dumphysnesse of mind, and inward sighing, the which by his countenance manifestlie appeared and was euident. He modestlie answered, Most noble and redoubted lord, this palenesse of visage and deadlie loke doth prognosticate the time of my death to approach and be at hand, which if it had chanced to me before this daie, I assure you, it had much lesse hurt me. For then had I not bene referred to feeble the dolorous pangs and sorrowfull sighings, which a fact by you done (that I thought and in my heart deeple grauen: so that I well per-ceiue, that either I shall lose my life, or else liue in perpetuall distresse and continuall miserie.

“ For you my singular god lord, by your vertuous acts and noble feats, haue gotten to you in manner an immortall fame, which in euerie mans mouth is extolled & auanced aboue the high clouds. But alas me seemeth (I praie you pardon me my rudenesse) that now that you haue obtained so high praise and glorie, you nothing lesse regard than to keepe and preserue the same inuiolate, considering that you, forgetting your faith and faithfull promise made to Henrie earle of Richmond, haue deliuered the most innocent yong gentleman to the cruell tormentors, to be afflicted, rent in peeces, and slaine.
“ Wherefore all such as loue you, of the which number I am one, cannot chuse but lament & be sorie, when they see openlie the fame and glorie of your most renowned name, by such a disolatie and vntruthgainst promise, to be both blotted and stained with a perpetuall note of slander and infamie. Peace mine owne god John (quoth the duke) I praie thee, be leue me there is no such thing like to happen to the earle of Richmond: for king Edward hath sent for him, to make of him, being his suspected enimie, his good and faire sonne in law.

“ Well well (quoth John) my redoubted lord, giue credence vnto me: the earle Henrie is at the ve-rie brinke to perill, whome if you permit once to set is no mortall creature able hereafter to deliuer him from death. The duke being moued with the persuasions of John Cheulet, which either little belueed, or smallie suspected king Edward, to desire the earle for anie fraud or deceit, or else seduced by blind auarice and loue of monie, more than honestie, fidelitie, or wisedom would require, did not consider what he vnapuisedlie did, or what he aduisedlie should haue done. Wherefore, with all diligence he sent forth Peter Landoise his chiefe treasurer, commanding him to intercept and stae the earle of Richmond, in all hast possible, as before you haue heard.]

“ In this yeare deceased sir John Crosbie knight, (not long before this, maior of London) and was buried in the parish church of saint Helen in Bishops gate street, vnto the reparing of which parish church he gaue five hundred marks, and thirtie pounds to be distributed to poore householders in the ward of Bishops gate: to the reparing of the parish church at Heneworth in Spidlese fortie pounds: to the reparing of London wall one hundred pounds: toward the making of a new towre of stone at the south end of London bridge, if the same were begun by the maior and communalte within ten yeares next after his decess, one hundred pounds: to the reparations of Rochester bridge ten pounds: to euerie the prisons in and about London liberallie. Also he gaue to the wardens and communalte of the grocers in London two large pots of silver chased halfe guilt, weieing thirtene pounds and five ounces of Troy weight, to be occupied in their common hall, and elsewhere, at their discretions.

In this yeare were inhanced to the honour of knighthood, after the custome of England, in the time of peace the kings eldest son Edward prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earle of Chester, his second sonne the duke of York, and with them the earle of Lincolnes sonne and heire, the duke of Suffolke, the lord Thomas Greie, the quenes sonne, and Richard his brother, the earle of Shrewsburie, the earle of Wilshire, master Edward Woodville, the lord Beuil, the lord Barkleis sonne and heire, the lord Audelies sonne and heire, the lord saint Amand, the lord Stanleis sonne and heire, the lord Suttons sonne and heire, the lord Hastings sonne and heire, the lord Ferrers of Charles sonne and heire, master Herbert brother to the earle of Penbroke, master Waughan Brian chiefe iudge, Littleton one of the iudges of the common pleas, master Bocking-ham, master Brian Stapleton, knicuit, Pilkinton, Luelow, Charleton, &c. The same daie the king created the lord Thomas marquesse Dorset, before dinner, and so in the habit of a marquesse aboue the habit of his knighthood he began the table of knights in saint Edwards chamber. At that time he ordeined that the kings chamberleine should go with the ancient and well nurtered knight, to aduertise and teach the order of knighthood to the esquieres, being in the baine. The king himselfe came in person and did honour to all the companie with his noble counsell.]

This yeare the duke of Burgognie was slaine, by the Switzers, before the towne of Prancie in Lo-raigne, after whose death the french king wan all the townes which the said duke held in Picardie and Artois. And because that the towne of Bullen and coun-tie of Bullenais appertained by right of inheritance vnto the lord Bertham de la Courte, earle of Au-uergne, the french king bought of him his right and title in the same, and recompensed him with other lands in the countie of Fforest, and in other places.
And because the forenamed towne and countie were holden of the earle dome of Artois, he changed the tenure, and auowed to hold the same towne & coun-tie of our ladie of Bolongne, and therof did homage to the image in the great church of Bolongne, offerring there an hart of gold, weieing two thousand crovnes; ordeining further, that his heires and successors at their entrie into their estates, by themselues or their deputies, should offer an hart of like wright and value, as a relesse and homage for the same towne and countie.

This yeare was Robert Basset maior of London, who did sharpe correction vpon bakers, for making of light bread, he caused diuerse of them to be set on the pilloie in Cornehill. And also one Agnes Daintie a butterwife for selling of butter new and old mingled together, being first trapped with butter dishes, was then set on the pilloie. The countesse of Driford deceased and was buried at Windsoie. Also this yeare Richard Ratson one of the thirtees of London, caused to be builded one house in the church yard of S. Marie hospitall without Bishops gate of London, where the maior of that cite and his brethren the aldermen use to sit and heare the sermons in the Easter holidaies, as in times past appeared by an inscription on the front of the same house, now by weathering defaced, which I haue read in these wordes: Praie for the soules of Richard Ratson late Sherer and alderman of London, and Isabell his wife, of whose gods this worke was made and founded. Anno Dom. 1488.]

By the diligence of Ralph Tosseline maior of London, the wall about London was new made betwixt Algate and Creplegate: he caused the spore field to be searched for claic, and bricke to be made and burnt there: he also caused chalcie to be brought out of Kent, and in the same spore field to be burnt into lime, for the furtherance of that worke. The maior with his companie of the drapers made all that part betwixt Bishops gate and Alhalowes church in the same wall. Bishops gate it selfe was new built by the merchants Almans of the Stilliard, and from Alhalowes church toward spore gate a great part of the same was builded of the goods, & by the erectors of sir John Crosbie sometimes an alderman of London, as may appeare by his armes in two places fired. The companie of Skinners made that part of the wall betwene Algate and Buries markes to wards Bishops gate, as may appeare by their armes in these places fired: the other companies of the citie made the other deale of the said wall, which was a great worke to be done in one yeare.

Also this yeare Thomas Burdet an esquier of Arrol in Warwicksheire, sonne to sir Nicholas Burdet (who was great butler of Poymandie in Henrie the first daies) was beheaded for a word spoken in this sort. King Edward in his progresse hunted in Thomas Burdets parke at Arrol, and slue manie of his deer, amongst the which was a white bucke, whereof Thomas Burdet made great account. And therefore when he understood thereof, he wished the buckes head in his bellie that moued the king to kill it. Which tale being told to the king, Burdet was apprehended and accused of treason, for wishing the buckes head (horne and all) in the kings bellie: he was condemned, drawne from the Tower of London to Tyburne, and there beheaded, and then buried in the Greie friers church at London. Wherefore it is good counsell that the wiseman giueth, saieing: Keep thy tong & keep thy life, for manie times we see, that speech offendeth & procureth mischance, where silence is author neither of the one nor the other, as it is true and in praise of silence spoken by the poet:

-nulli in oculis nocet, nocet esse loquutum.]

About this season, through great mishap, the sparke of priuie malice was newlie kindled betwixt the king and his brother the duke of Clarence, inasmuch that where one of the dukes seruants was suddenlie accused (I can not saie whether of truth, or vntrulie suspected by the dukes enemies) of poisoning, forcerie or enchantment, and thereof condemned, and put to execution for the same, the duke which might not suffer the wrongfull condemnation of his man (as he in his conscience iudged) nor yet forbeare but to murmur and reprove the doing thereof, moued the king with his daile exclamation to take such displeasure with him, that finally the duke was cast into the Tower, and therewith aduised for a traitor, and priuie drowned in a butt of malmesie, the eleuenth of March, in the beginning of the seventeenth yeare of the kings reigne.

Some haue reported, that the cause of this noble mans death rose of a foolish prophesie, which was, that after K. Edward one should reigne, whose first letter of his name should be a C. Wherewith the king and quene were sore troubled, and began to conceiue a greuous grudge against this duke, and could not be in quiet till they had brought him to his end. And as the diuell is wont to incommber the minds of men which delite in such diuells fantasies, they said afterward, that that prophesie lost not his effect, when after king Edward, Gloucester vsurped his kingdome. And ther alledged, that the cause of his death was for that the duke, being destitute of a wife, by the meanes of his sister the ladie Margaret, duchesse of Burgognie, procured to haue the ladie Marie, daughter and heire to his husband duke Charles.

Which marriage king Edward (enuieng the prosperitie of his brother) both gaine said and disurbed, and thereby old malice renewed betwixt them: which the quene and his blood (euer mistrusting, and priuie barking at the kings image) ceased not to increase. But sure it is, that although king Edward were consenting to his death; yet he much did both lament his infortunate chance, & repent his sudden execution: inasmuch that when ante person sued to him for the pardon of malefactors condemned to death, he would accustomable saie, & openlie speake: Oh infortunate brother, for whose life not one would make sute. Openlie and apparantlie meaning by such words, that by the meanes of some of the nobles tie he was deceased and brought to confusion.

This duke left behind him two yong infants be got of the bodie of his wife, the daughter of Richard late earle of Marwike: which children by destinie as it were, or by their owne merits, following the steps of their ancestozs, succeeded them in like misfortune and semblable euill chance. For Edward his heire, whom king Edward had created earle of Marwike was three and twentie yeares after, in the time of Henrie the seauenth, atteinted of treason, and on the Tower hill lost his head. Margaret his sole daughter married to sir Richard Pole knight, and by Henrie the eight restored to the name, title, & possessions of the earldome of Salisburie, was at length for treason committed against the said Henrie the eight atteinted in open parlement; and sixtie two yeares after his father had suffered death in the Tower, she on the greene within the same place was beheaded. In whose person died the verie surname of Plantagenet, which from Geoffrie Plantagenet so long in the blood roiall of this realme had flourished and continued.

After the death of this duke, by reason of great heat and disemperance of aire, happened so fierce & quicke a pestilence, that sixtine yeares warre past consumed not the third part of the people, that one lie foure moneths miserable and pittfullie dispatched & brought to their graues. So that if the number had bene kept by multipleng of unities, & out of them to haue raised a complet number, it would haue moued matter of verie great admiration. But it should seeme that they were infinit, if consideration be had of the comparision, inferred for the more effectually setting forth of that cruell and ceaselesse contagion. And suerlie it soundeth to reason, that the pestilence should fetch awaie so manie thousands, as in iudgement by proportion of sixtine yeares warre one maie gather; and manie more to. For euerie man knoweth that in warres, time, place, persons, and meanes are limited: time of warre begun and ended; place circumscribed; persons imbatteled, and weapons also whereby the fight is tried: so that all these haue their limitations, beyond which they haue no extant. But the pestilence, being a generall infection of the aire, an element ordeined to maintain life, though it haue a limitation in respect of the totall compasse of the world; yet whole climats maie be poisoned: and it were not absurd to saie, that all and euerie part of the aire maie be pestilentlie corrupted; and so consequentlie not limited: wherefore full well it maie be said of the pestilence (procuring so great a depopulation) as one saith of surfetting: Ense cadunt multi, perimit sed crapula plures.

The counsellors of the yong duchesse of Burgognie sent to K. Edward for aid against the French king. About the same time had the quene of England sent to the ladie Margaret duchesse of Burgognie, for the preferment of his brother Anthoine erle of Fluers to the yong damsell. But the counsell of Flanders, considering that he was but an earle of meane estate, and she the greatest inheritrice of all christendome at that time, gaue but deafe eare to so vnnat a request. So which desire, if the Flemings had but giuen a liking eare by outward semblance, and with gentle words delayed the sute, she had bene both succoured and defended. Whether king Edward was not contented with this refusal, or that he was loth to breake with the French king, he would in no wise consent to send an armie into Flanders against the French king: but yet he sent ambassadours to him with louing and gentle letters, requiring him to grow to some reasonable order & agreement with the yong duchesse of Burgognie, or at the least to take a truce with his request.

Prophesies touching the king.

The ambassadours of England were highlie received, bountifullie feasted, and liberallie rewarded, but answer to their desire had they none; saying that shortly after, the French king would send ambassadours, hostages, and pledges to the king of England their master, for the perfecting and concluding of all things depending betwene them two; so that their soveraigne lord & they should have cause to be contented and pleased. These faire words were one lie delaies to due time, untill he might have space to spoile the yong damsell of hir townes and countries. And beside this, to staie king Edward from taking part with hir, he wrote to him, that if he would ioine with him in aid, he should have and intioie to him and his heires the whole countie & countrie of Flanders, discharged of homage, superiozitie and reioit, to be claimed by the French king, or his successors.

Large offers made to the king of England by the French king.

He also wrote that he should have the whole duchie of Brabant, whereof the French king offered at his owne cost and charge to conquer foure of the chiefest and strongest townes within the said duchie, & them in quiet possession to deliuer to the king of England: granting further to paie him ten thousand angels toward his charges, with munitions of warre and artillerie, which he promised to lend him, with men and carriage for the conueiance of the same. The king of England refused to make any warres against those countries that were thus offered to him: but if the French king would make him partner of his conquests in Picardie, rendering to him part of the townes already gotten, as Bologne, Spontereil, and Abail, then he would suerlie take his part, and aid him with men at his owne costs and charges.

1479 Anno Reg. 19.

Thus passed faire words and golden promises betwene these two princes: and in the meane time the yong duchesse of Burgognie was spoiled of hir townes, castles & territories, till at length for maintenance she condescended to marrie with Maximilian sonne to the emperor Frederike, that he might keepe the wolfe from the fold. King Edward in the nineteenth yeare of his reigne began (more than he was before accustomed) to serch the forfeiture of penall lawes and statutes, as well of the cheefe of his nobilitie as of other gentlemen, being proprietaries of great possessions, or abundantlie furnished with goods; likewise of merchants, and other inferior persons. By reason whereof, it was of all men iudged that he would proue hereafter a foze and a rigorous prince among his subjects. But this his new inuented practise and covetous meaning (by reason of foureine affaires and abridgement of his daies in this transitorie life, which were within two yeares after consumed) took some (but not great) effect.

Abn. Fl. ex l. 5. pag. 747, 748. Pestilence.

In this yeare was great mortalitie and death by the pestilence, not onelie in London, but in diuerse parts of the realme, which began in the latter end of September in the yeare last before passed, and continued all this yeare till the beginning of Nouember, which was about fourtene moneths: in the which space died innumerable of people in the said citie & else-where. This yeare also the maior of London being in Paules, kneeling in his deuotions at saint Ethelwalds thyrine, Robert Wilsford one of the thyriffes vnadvisedlie kneeled doune nigh vnto the maior: whereof afterward the maior charged him to haue done more than becomed him. But the thyriffe answering rudelie and stubboznie, would not acknowledge to haue committed any offense: for the which he was afterward by a court of aldermen fined at fiftie pounds to be paid toward the reparations of the conduits in London, which was trulie paid. This yeare Thomas Ham one of the thyrifs of London newlie builded the great conduit in Cheape, of his owne charges. This yeare also king Edward began his Christmasse at Walsking, and at fine daies end removed to Greenewich, where he kept out the other part of his Christmasse with great roialtie.

Ambassadours were sent to and fro betwixt the king of England and France, and still the French king fed the king of England with faire words, putting him in hope to match his sonne and heire the Dolphin with the ladie Elizabeth daughter to the king of England, according to the conclusions of agreement had and made at Picquene betwixt them, although in verie deed he meant nothing lesse. His ambassadours euer made excuses if any thing were amisse, and he used to send change of ambassadours; so that if those which had bene here before, and were returned, had said or promised any thing (though they were authorized so to do) which might turne to their masters hinderance, the other that came after, might excuse themselves by ignorance of that matter; affirming that they wanted commission once to talke or meddle with that matter: or if he perceived that any thing was like to be concluded contrarie to his mind, for a shift he would call his ambassadours home in great hast, and after send an other with new instructions nothing depending on the old.

Thus the French king used to dally with king Edward in the case of this marriage, onelie to keepe him still in amitie. And certeinlie the king of England, being a man of no suspicious nature, thought sooner that the sunne should haue fallen from his circle, than that the French king would haue dissembled or broken promise with him. But there is none so soone beguiled, as he that least mistrusteth; nor any so able to decelue, as he to whome most credence is giuen. But as in mistrusting nothing, is great lightnesse; so in too much trusting, is too much follie: which well appeared in this matter. For the French king, by cloking his inward determinate purpose with great dissimulation and large promises, kept him still in friendship with the king of England, till he had wrought a great part of his will against the yong duchesse of Burgognie. Which king Edward would not haue suffered, if he had put any great doubt in the French kings faire promises, considering that the crowne of France was in this meane time so much increased in dominions, to the great reinforcement of that realme.

On the two and twentieth of Februarie were five notable thieues put to death, for robbing the church called saint Martins le grand in London, and other places; three of them were drawne to the Tower hill, hanged & burnt, the other two were pressed to death. A foze and seuerer kind of execution no doubt, but yet thought by iustice meritorious in the malefactors, for their offenses of sacrilege. Heinous enough had it bene to spoile a priuat man of his goods, and by law of nations punishable with death; but much more horrible, that prophane persons with polluted hands should pziuilie or openlie so touch holie & consecrated things, as to take them out of a sacred place, where to (for holy uses) they were dedicated, & apply them to the satisfieng of the corrupt concupiscences of their owne hearts, the bottomlesse gulfe whereof because no booties nor spoiles could satifie; it stood with the high praise of iustice that they and their ceaselesse desires were seuered by deservied death; wherefore it is wiselie said by the comical poet of such gracie guts:

Quam quis anidus possit escam auariter,

Decipitur in transfenna perique auaritia.

In this yeare king Edward required great sums of monie to be lent him. The citizens of London granted him five thousand marks, which were seised of the five and twentie wards: which five thousand marks Unadvised & drunkenlie becoming pziuilie killed with a sine.

marks was truly repaid againe in the next yeare following. ¶ Also this yeare on Whitfundaie k. Edward the fourth created the lord Berkeley, vicount Berkeley, at Crænethwiche. ¶ In this yeare also an house on London bridge called the common steege, or pitie, fell downe into the Thames, where thorough it five persons were drowned. ¶ This yeare the king with his quene kept a roiall Christmas at Windsor.

Also this yeare was one Richard Chalze ma-10 for of London, whome king Edward so greatlie favoured, that he took him (with certeine of his brethren the aldermen, & commons of the citie of London) into the forest of Waltham, where was orde-ned for them a pleasant lodge of greene boughs, in which lodge they dined with great chere; & the king would not go to dinner untill he saw them served.
Whereupon he caused the lord chamberlaine, with other lords, to chere the said maior and his companie sundry times whilst they were at dinner. After dinner they went a hunting with the king, and sue manie deare, as well red as fallow, whereof the king gave unto the maior and his companie good plentie, and sent unto the ladie maistrice and hir sisters the al-dermens wives, two harts, six bucks, and a tun of wine to make them merrie with, which was eaten in the dyapers hall. The cause of which bountie thus shewed by the king, was (as most men did take) for that the maior was a merchant of wondrous adventures into manie and sundrie countries. By reason whereof, the king had pearelie of him notable summes of monie for his customes, beside other pleasures that he had shewed unto the king before times.
¶ This yeare the Scots began to stir, against whom the king sent the duke of Gloucester & manie others, which returned againe without any notable battell.]

In this berie season James the third of that name king of Scots sent into England a solemne ambas-sage for to haue the ladie Cicilie, king Edwards second daughter, to be married to his eldest sonne James, prince of Scotland, duke of Rothesaie, and earle of Caricke. King Edward and his counsell, perceiving that this affinitie should be both honourable and profitable to the realme, did not onelie grant to his desire; but also before hand disbursed cer-teine summes of monie, to the onelie intent that the marriage hereafter should neither be hindered nor broken. With this condition, that if the said marriage by anie accidentall meane should in time to come take none effect; or that king Edward would notifie to the king of Scots, or his counsell, that his pleasure was determined to haue the said marriage dissolved: then the prouost and merchants of the towne of Edinburgh, should be bound for repayment of the said summes againe. All which things were with great deliberation concluded, passed, and sealed, in hope of continuall peace and indissoluble amitie.

But king James was knowne to be a man so wedded to his owne opinion, that he could not abide them that would speake contrarie to his fantasie: by meanes whereof, he was altogether led by the counsell and aduise of men of base linage, whome for their flatterie he had promoted unto great dignities and honourable offices. By which persons diuerse of the nobilitie of his realme were greatlie misused and put to trouble, both with imprisonment, exactions, & death; insomuch that some of them went into voluntarie exile. Amongst whome Alexander duke of Al-banie, brother to king James, being exiled into France, & passing through England, taried with k.
Edward: and upon occasion moued him to make warre against his brother, the said king James, for that he forgetting his oth, promise, and affinitie concluded with king Edward, caused his subsidies to make roads and forayes into the English borders, spoiling, burning, and killing king Edwards liege people.

King Edward, not a little displeased with this un-principellie doing, prouoked and set on also by the duke of Albanie, determined to invade Scotland with an armie, as well to reuenge his owne iniuries recei-ued at the hands of king James, as to helpe to restore the duke of Albanie unto his countrie and possessions againe. Whereupon all the winter season he mustered his men, prepared his ordinance, rigged his ships, and left nothing unprouided for such a tour-10 nie: so that in the beginning of the yeare, all things appertaining to the warre, and necessarie for his voi-age, were in a readinesse. To be the cheefest of his host, and lieutenant generall, Richard duke of Glocester was appointed by his brother king Edward; and with him were adioined as adlocats, Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, Thomas lord Stanleie lord steward of the kings house, the lord Lonell, the lord Greiesfocke, and diuerse other no-20 ble men and worthy knights.

These valliant capteins came to Alnewike in Northumberland, about the beginning of Iulie, where they first incamped themselves, & marshalled their host. The fore-ward was led by the earle of Northumberland, under whose standard were the lord Scrope of Bolton, sir John Mordaunt, sir John Wichfeld, and diuerse other knights, esquires, & soldiers, to the number of six thousand and seauen hun-30 dred. In the middle-ward was the duke of Gloucester, and with him the duke of Albanie, the lord Lonell, the lord Greiesfocke, sir Edward Mordaunt, and other, to the number of five thousand & eight hundred men. The lord Percie was appointed to follow, accompanied with three thousand. The lord Stanleie led the wing on the right hand of the dukes battell with foure thousand men of Lancashire & Cheshire.
The lord Fitz Hugh, sir William a Barre, sir James Harrington, with the number of two thou-40 sand soldiers, guided the left wing. And beside all these, there were one thousand appointed to giue their attendance on the ordinance.

¶ In this yeare Edmund Shato goldsmith and mafor of London newlie builded Creplegate from the foundation, which gate in old time had bene a prison, whereunto such citizens and other as were arrested for debt (or like trespasses) were committed, as they be now to the counters, as mate appeare by a writ of king Edward the second, in these wordes: Rex vic 50 London salutem. Ex graui querela capti & detenti in prisona nostra de Creplegate, pro x. li. quas coram Radulpho Sandwi- co, tunc custode civitatis nostre London, & l. de Blackwell custode recognovit. debitorum, &c. King Edward held his Christmas at Eltham, and kept his estate all the whole feast in his great chamber; and the quene in hir chamber, where were daillie more than two thousand persons. The same yeare on Candlemas day, he with his quene went on procession from saint Ste-phans chappell into Westminster hall, accompanied with the earle of Angus, the lord Greie, & sir James Liddall, ambassadors from Scotland. And at his proceeding out of his chamber he made sir John Wood under-treasurer of England, & sir William Cates-bie one of the iustices of the ocmmon places, knights.]

But to returne to the kings affaires concerning Scotland. The roiall armie aforesaid, not intending to lose time, came suddenly by the water side to the towne of Berwike, and there (that with force, and what with feare of so great an armie) took and entered the towne: but the earle of Bothwell, being capteine of the castell, would in no wise deliuer it; wherefore the capteins, upon good and deliberate aduise, planted a strong siege round about it. When this siege was laid, the two dukes and all the other souldices / except the lord Stanleie, sir John Cloington treasurer of the kings house, sir William a Parre, and foure thousand men that were left behind to keepe the siege before the castell departed from Ber-wikke toward Edenburgh; and in marching thitherward, they burnt and destroied manie towne and bastilles. King James hauing small confidence in his communkaltie, and lesse trust in his nobilitie, kept himselfe within the castell of Edenburgh.

The duke of Gloucester entered into the towne, and at the especial desire of the duke of Albanie saued the towne, and the inhabitants from fire, blood, and spoil, taking onlie of the merchants, such presents as they gentlie offered to him and his capteins, causing Garter principall king at armes to make a publike proclamation at the high crosse in the market place of Edenburgh; by the which he warned and admonished king James, to keepe, obserue, and per-forme, all such promises, compacts, concenants, and agreements, as he had concluded and sealed with the king of England, and also to make sufficient recompense vnto his subiects, for the tyrannie, spoil, and cruellie which he and his people had committed and done, contrarie to the league, within the marches of his realme of England, before the first daie of August next insuing; and further without delay to restore his brother the duke of Albanie to his estate, & all his possessions, offices, and authorities, in as large manner as he occupied & intied the same before. Where the duke of Gloucester, lieutenant generall for the king of England, was readie at hand to destroy him, his people, and countries, with slaughter, flame, and famine.

King James would make no answer, neither by word nor writing, but kept himselfe close within the castell. But the lordes of Scotland being at Waddington with a great puissance, determined first to practice with the duke of Gloucester for a peace, and after by some meanes to allure the duke of Albanie from the English amitie. And vpon this motion, the second daie of August they wrote to the duke of Gloucester, requiring that the marriage betwene the prince of Scotland, and king Edwards daughter might be accomplished, according to the covenants; and further, that a peace from thenceforth might be longie concluded betwene both the realmes. The duke of Gloucester answered againe vnto these demands; that for the article of the marriage, he knew not the king his brothers determinate pleasure, either for the affirmance or deniall of the same; but nevertheless he desired full restitution of all the sums of monie pressed out in lone vpon the same marriage. And as for peace, he assured them that he wold agree to none, except the castell of Berwicke might be to him deliuered; or at the least wise, that he should undertake that the sieg being afore the same should not be troubled by the King of Scots, nor by anie of his subjects, nor by his or their procurement or meanes.

The Scottish lords, upon this answer and demands of the duke of Gloucester, sent to him the elect of Bur- 60 reie, and the lord Wernleie, which excused the matter touching the repaiment of the monie: for that the time of the lawfull contract of the said mariage was not yet come, and no daie appointed for the monie to be paid before the contract begun. But for further assurance either for the contract to be made, or for the payment of the monie, they promised the rebnto accordinglie (as reason should require) to agree. Se-condarily, as touching the castell of Wervilke, they alleged that it appertained to the realme of Scotland, as the old inheritance of the same.

The duke, notwithstanding all that they could say, would agree to no peace, except the castell of Berwike might be deliuered to the K. of England,

And so the messengers departed. The same Daie the archbishop of S. Andrews, the bishop of Dunblae, Colin earle of Argyle, lord Campbell, and lord Ardris earle of Anandale, chancelor of Scotland, wrote to the duke of Albanie, a solemne and an authentick instrument, signed and sealed with their hands and seales, concerning a generall pardon to him and his seruants, vpon certaine conditions to be granted; which conditions seemed to be so reasonable, that the duke of Albanie, desirous to be redrested to his old estate, possessions, and native countrie, willinglie accepted the same.

But before he departed from the duke of Gloucester, he promised both by word and twitting of his own hand, to do and performe all such things, as he before that time had sworn and promised to king Edward: notwithstanding anie agreement now made, or after to be made with the lords of Scotland. And for performance of the effect hereof, he againe toke a corporall oth, and sealed the twitting before the duke of Gloucester, in the English campe at Lewington besides Haddington, the third daie of August, in the yeare 1482. After he was restored, the lords of Scotland proclaimed him great lieutenant of Scotland; and in the kings name made proclamation, that all men within eight daies shoulde be ready at Crausghans, both to raise the siege before the castle, and for the recovering againe of the towne of Berwick.

The duke of Albanie wrote all this preparation to the duke of Glocester, requiring him to haue no mistrust in his dealings. The duke of Glocester wrote to him againe his mind verie roundlie, promising that he with his armie would defend the besiegers from all enimies that should attempt to trouble them, or else die in the quarell. To be brieue, when the lords of Scotland saw that it booted them not to assaile the raising of the siege, except they should make account to be fought with all, they determined to deliuer the castell of Berwolke to the Englishmen, so that thereupon there might be an abstinence of warre taken for a season.

And herewith they sent to the duke of Gloucester a charter indented, which was dated the foure and twentieth daie of August, in the said yeare 1482, contracted betwene the duke of Gloucester lieutenant generall for the king of England, & Alexander duke of Albanie lieutenant for James king of Scots; that an especiall abstinence of warre should be kept betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland, as well by sea as by land, to begin the eighth daie of September next comming, & to indure till the fourth daie of November next following. And in the same season, the towne & castle of Berwike to be occupied and remaine in the reall possession of such, as by the king of Englandes devoute should be awointed.

Whereunto the duke of Gloucester agreed, and so then was the castoll of Berboishe deliuered to the lord Stanleie; and other thereto appointed: who therein put both Englishmen and artillerie, sufficient to defend it against all Scotland, for six months. The duke of Albanie also caused the prouiss and burgesses of Edenburgh, to make a sufficient instrument obligatorie to king Edward, for the true satisfaction and contentation of the same monie, which he also sent by the said prouiss to the duke of Gloucester to Ainslieke: the better to remember hereafter followeth.

whole fellowship, merchants, burgesses, & communalitie of the same towne, to be bound and obliged by these presents, unto the most excellent, and most mightie prince Edward, by the grace of God king of England. That where it was communed and agreed betwene his excellencie on the one part, and the right high & mightie prince our soueraigne lord, James king of Scots on the other part, that mariage and matrimonie should haue bene solemnized and had betwixt a mightie and excellent prince James the first begotten sonne and heire apparant to our soueraigne lord aforesaid, & the right noble princeesse Cicilie, daughter to the said Edward k. of England; and for the said mariage to haue bene performed, certeine and diuers great summes of monie bene paid and contented by the most excellent prince, unto our soueraigne lord aforesaid, as by certeine writings betwixt the said princes thereupon made moze at large plainlie appeares.

That if it be the pleasure of the said Edward king of England, to haue the said mariage to be performed and completed, according to the said communication in writing, that then it shall be well and trulie, without fraud, deceit, or collusion observed, kept, and accomplished on the partie of our soueraigne lord aforesaid, & the nobles spiritual and temporal of the realme of Scotland. And if it be not the pleasure of the said excellent prince Edward king of England, to haue the said mariage performed and completed; that then we Walter, prouost, burgesses, merchants, and commons of the aboue named towne of Edinburgh, or anie of vs, shall paie and content to the king of England aforesaid, all the summes of monie that was paid for the said mariage, at such like termes & daies immediatlie insuing after the refusall of the said mariage, and in such like maner & forme as the said summes were afore delivered, contented and paid; that then this obligation and bond to be void, and of no strength. Provided alwaies, that the said Edward king of England, shall giue knowledge of his pleasure and election in the premises in taking or refusing of the said mariage, or of repayment of the said sums of monie, to our said soueraigne lord, or lords of his counsell, or to vs the said prouost, merchants, or any of vs, within the realme of Scotland, being for the time, betwixt this & the feast of Allhalowes next to come.

To the which paiement well and trulie to be made, we bind and oblige vs, & our heires, successors, executors, and all our goods, merchandises, & things what soeuer they be, where soeuer, or in what place, by water or by land, on this side the sea or beyond, we shall happen to be found, anie league, anie cruce or safegard made or to be made, notwithstanding. In witness whereof to this our present writing, and letters of bond, we, the said prouost, burgesses, merchants, and communi-tie, haue set our common seale of the said towne of Edinburgh, the fourth daie of August, the peare of our Lord God, 1482. Given in the presence of the right mightie prince Richard duke of Gloucester, Alexander duke of Albanie, the reuerend father in God James bishop of Dunkeld, & the right noble lord Herrie earle of Northumberland, Colin earle of Argile, Thomas lord Stanleie, maister Alexander English, and others, &c.

So that you see it was contained in the said instrument or writing, that king Edward should intimate his pleasure unto the said prouost and burgesses of Edinburgh, before the feast of Allsaints next following, whether he would the mariage should take place, or that he would haue the payment of the monie. According to which article, king Edward sent Garter his principall king of armes, and Northumberland hersele, to declare his refusall of the mariage, and the election and choise of the repayment of the monie. They came to Edinburgh eight daies before the feast of Allsaints, where (according to their commission and instructions) Garter declared the pleasure of the king his master, unto the prouost and burgesses of Edinburgh, to whom he openlie said as followeth, Garter king of armes is sent into Scotland.

The intimation of Garter king of armes to the Edinburghers.

Garter king of armes, seruant, prouost and messenger unto the most high and mightie prince, my most dread soueraigne lord Edward, by the grace of God king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, by vertue of certeine letters of procuracie here readie to be shewed come, by my said soueraigne lord made and giuen, make notice and giue knowledge unto you prouost, burgesses, merchants and communalitie of the towne of Edinburgh in Scotland, that whereas it was sometime communed and agreed betwene my said soueraigne lord on the one partie, and the right high & mightie prince James king of Scots on the other partie, that mariage and matrimonie should haue bene solemnized, and had betwene James the first begotten sonne of the said king of Scots, and ladie Cicilie, daughter to my said soueraigne lord the king of England.

And for the said mariage to haue bene performed, certeine and diuers great summes of monie bene paid and contented by my said soueraigne lord, which summes of monie, in case of refusall of the said mariage, by my said soueraigne lord to be made and declared, by the said prouost, burgesses, merchants, and communalitie, and euery one of you are bound and obliged by your letters, vnder your common seale of your towne of Edinburgh, to repaie vnto his highnes vnder like forme, & at such termes as they were first paid. So that the king my soueraigne lord would make notice and knowledge of his pleasure and election in taking or refusing of the said mariage, of the repayment of the said sums of monie, before before the feast of Allhalowes next to come; like as in your said letters, bearing date at Edinburgh the fourth daie of August last past, it was contained all at large.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. fol. Ccxlvij.

The pleasure and election of my said sovereign lord, for diuerse causes and considerations him mouing, is to refuse the accomplishment of the said mariage, and to haue the repayment of all such summes of monie, as (by occasion of the said betruised mariage) his highnesse had paid. The said repayment to be had of you prouost, burgesses, merchants, and communalitie, and euerie of you, your heires and successours, according to your bond and obligation afoze rehearsed. And therefore I giue you notice & knowledge by this writing, which I deliuer vnto you, within the terme in your said letters limited and expessed, to all intents and effects, which thereof may insue.

When Cartier had thus declared all things giuen to him in charge, the prouost and other burgesses made answer, that they now knowing the kings determinat pleasure, would (according to their bond) prepare for the repayment of the said summes; and gentle interteining Cartier conuied him to Berwikke, from whence he departed to Newcastle, to the duke of Gloucester, making relation to him of all his doings: which duke with all speed returned to Wythuton, and there abode. Shortly after Cartiers departing, the duke of Albanie, thinking to obtaine againe the high fauour of the king his brother, deliuered him out of captiuitie and prison, wherin he had a certaine space continued (not without the dukes assent, which besieged him in the castell of Edinburgh a little before) and set him at large, of whome outwardlie he receiued great thanks, when inwardlie nothing but reuenging & confusion was in the kings stomacke fullie settled. So that shortly after in the kings presence he was in leopordie of his life, and all vnprovidid for dread of death, constrained to take a small balinge, and to saile into France, where shortly after riding by the men of armes, which encountered at the tilt, by Lewis then duke of Orleans, after French king, he was with mischarging of a speare by fortunes peruerse countenance pittifullie slaine and brought to death, leaving after him one onellie son named John, which being banished Scotland, inhabited & married in France, and there died.

How dolorous, how sorrowfull is it to write, and much more painefull to remember the chanches and infortunitie that happened within two yeares in England & Scotland, betwene naturall brethren. For king Edward, set on by such as enuied the estate of the duke of Clarence, forgetting nature and brotherlie amitie, consented to the death of his said brother. James king of Scots, putting in obliuion that Alexander his brother was the onellie organ and instrument, by whome he obtained libertie & freedom, seduced and led by vile and malicious persons, which maligne at the glorie and indifferent iustice of the duke of Albanie, imagined and compassed his death, and exiled him for euer. What a pernicious serpent, what a venomous toade, and what a pestiferous scorpion is that diuellish helpe, called priuie enuie? Against it no fortresse can defend, no caue can hide, no wood can shadowe, no fowle can escape, nor no beast can auoid. His poison is so strong, that neuer man in authoritie could escape from the biting of his teeth, scratching of his pawes, blaspheming of his breath, & filth of his taile. Notable therefore is the Greke epigram in this behalfe, touching enuie of this kind, which saith, that a worse thing than enuie there is not in the world, and yet hath it some goodnesse in it; for it consumeth the eyes and the hart of the enuious. The words in their owne tonge sententiouslie sound thus:

ὁ φθόνος ὁ δὲ κακίστος ἐνέχει δὲ τὴν καρδίαν ἐν αὐτῷ, τὴν αὖ φθόνος ἐν ὀφθαλμοῖς καὶ κερὰν ἔχει.

Although king Edward reioiced that his businesse came to so good a conclusion with the Scots, yet he was about the same time soze disquieted in his mind towards the French king, whome he now perceived to haue dallied with him, as touching the agreement of the mariage to be had betwixt the Dolphin and his daughter the ladie Elizabeth. For the lord Howard, being as then returned out of France, certified the king (of his owne knowledge) how that he being present, saw the ladie Margaret of Austria daughter to duke Maximilian, come to the emperor Frederike, receiued into France with great pompe and roialtie, and at Ambois to the Dolphin contracted and espoused. King Edward highlie displeased with such double and vnjust dealing of the French king, called his nobles together, and opened to them his griefes; who promised him for reuenge thereof, to be readie with all their powers to make warres in France at his pleasure and appointment.

But whilst he was busie in hand to make his pursuance for warres thus against France, whether it was with melancholie and anger, which he took with the French kings doings and vn courteous vsage; or were it by any superfluous surfeit (to the which he was verie much giuen) he suddenly fell sicke, and was so greivouslie taken, that in the end he perceived his naturall strength in such wise to decaye, that there was little hope of recouerie in the cunning of his physicians, whome he perceived onlie to prolong his life for a small time. Wherefore he began to make readie for his passage into another world, not forgetting (as after shall appere) to exhort the nobles of his realme (aboue all things) to an vnitie among themselves. And hauing (as he took it) made an attonement betwixt the parties that were knowne to be scant friends, he commended vnto their grace wisedomes the gouernment of his sonne the prince, and of his brother the duke of Borke, during the time of their tender yeares. But it shall not be amisse to adde in this place the words which he is said to haue spoken on his death-bed, which were in effect as followeth.

The words of king Edward vttered by him on his death-bed.

My welbeloued and no lesse betruised friends, counsellors, and allies, if we mortall men would vailie and humilie with our selues reuolue, and intentiue in our hearts ingraue, or in our minds seriousslie ponder, the fraille and fading imbecillitie of our humane nature, and the vnstabilitie of the same: we should apparantlie perceiue, that we being called reasonable creatures, and in that predicament compared and ioined with angels, be more worthy to be named and deemed persons vnreasonable, and rather to be associate in that name with brute beasts called vnreasonable (of whose life and death no creature speaketh) rather than in that point to be resembled to the angelicall societie and reasonable companie. For while health in vs flourisheth, or prosperitie aboundeth, or the glosing world laugheth, which is he, so reasonable of vs all, that can saie (if he will not cry from the truth) that he once in a weeke remembereth his fatal end, or the prescribed terme of his indurring; or once prouided by labour, studie, or otherwise, to set a stedfast and sure number for the securitie, profit, and continuance either of his possessions & dominions, or of his sequels and posteritie which after him shall naturallie succede. Such is the blindness of our fraile and weake nature, euer giuen to carnall concupiscence and worlde delectations, daile darkened and seduced with that lithargious and deceiua-ble serpent called hope of long life, that all we put in obliuion our due tie present, and lesse remember the politike prouidence for things to come: for blindlie we walke in this fraile life, till we fall groueling with our eyes suddentlie vpon death.

The vanities of this world be to vs so agreeable, that when we begin to liue, we esteeme our life a whole world; which once ouerpasse, it sheweth no better but dust dyuen awaie with a puffe of wind. I speake this to you of my selfe, and for your selues to you; for lamenting and inwardlie bewailing, that I did not performe & finally consummate such politike deuises, & god and goodlie ordinaunces, in my long life and peaceable prosperitie, which then I folke determined to haue begun, set forward, and complette to haue finished. Which now for the extreme paines and tortures of my angrie maladie, and for the small terme of my naturall life, I can neither performe, neither yet liue to see either to take effect, or to sort to any god conclusion.

For God I call to record, my heart was fullie set, and my mind deliberatlie determined, so to haue adorned this realme with wholesome lawes, statutes and ordinaunces; so to haue trained and brought vp mine infants and children in vertue, learning, actiuetie, and policie, that, what with their totall puissance, & your frendlie assistance, the proudest prince of Europe durst not once attempt to moue any hostilitie, against them, you, or this realme. But oh Lord, all things that I of long time haue in my mind reuolued and imagined, that stealing these death goeth about to subuert, and in the moment of an heure clerelie to ouertred. Wherefore (as men saie) I now being dyen to the verie hard wall, haue perfect confidence and sure hope in the appoyued fidelitie, and constant integritie, which I haue euer experimented and knowne to be rooted and planted in the hearts of your louing bodies, towards me and mine.

So that I may saie and auouch, that neuer prince bearing scepter and crowne ouer realmes and regions, hath found or proued more faithfull counsellors, nor truer subiects, than I haue done of you; nor neuer potentate nor gouernour put more assisance and trust in his vassals and seruants, than I, since the adeption of the crowne, firmly haue fixed in your circumspect wisdoms and sober discretions.
And now of very force compelled, lieng in a doubtfull hope, betwene liuing and dieng, betwene remembrance and obliuion, I do require you, and instantlie moue you, that as I haue found you faithfull, obedient, and to all my requests and desires (while I was here in health conuersant with you) diligent and in-continue: so after my death, my hope is with a sure anchour grounded, & mine inward conceipt vndoubtedlie resolved, that the expectall confidence and inward fidelitie, which so long hath continued betwene vs, being together liuing, shall not wholie by my death be extinct and banished like smoke.

For what aualeth friendship in life, when trust deceiueth after death? What profiteth amitie in apparant presence, when confidence is fraudulentlie beguiled in absence? What loue groweth by coniuence of matrimonie, if the offspring after do not agree and accord? What profiteth princes to aduance and promote their subiects, if after their death, the bountifullnesse by them shewed, be of the recei-uers of the same and their sequels neither regarded nor yet remembred? The parents make the marriage for an indissoluble amitie. Princes promote sometime for fauour, sometime for desert, & sometime for pleasure: yet (if you will consider) the verie scope, to the which all gifts of promotions do finally tend, is to haue loue, fauour, faithfull counsell, and diligent seruice, of such as be by them promoted and crated, not onelie in their owne lines, being but briefe and transitorie: but also that they and their progenie, calling to remembrance the fauour, estimation, and aduancement, which they of so liberall and munificent a prince had receiued and obtained, shoulde with speare and shield, long and wit, hand and pen, conti-nuallie studie to defend, counsell and preferre, not onelie him during his life; but also to serue, assist, and mainteine his sequels and lineall succession, as the verie images and carnall portraictures of his stirpe, line, and stemme, naturallie descended.

In this case am I, whome you know, not without unspeakable trouble & most dangerous war to haue obtained the scepter and diadems of this realme and empire. During which reigne, I haue had either little peace, or small tranquillitie; and now when I thought my selfe sure of a quiet life, and worlde rest, death hath blowne his terrible trumpet, calling and summoning me (as I trust) to perpetuall tranquillitie and eternall quietnesse. Therefore now, for the perfect and vnmoueable confidence that I haue euer had in you, and for the vnfeined loue that you haue euer shewed vnto me, I commend and deliuer into your gouernance, both this noble realme, and my naturall children, and your kinsmen. My children by your diligent oversight and politike prouision to be taught, informed, and instructed, not onelie in the sciences liberall, vertues morall, and good literature: but also to be practised in triches of martiall actiuitie, and diligent exercise of prudent policie. For I haue heard clarkes saie, although I am vnlettered, that fortunate is that realme where philosophers reigne, or where kings be philosophers and louers of wisedom.

In this tender age, you may with and turne them into euerie forme and fashyon. If you bring them vp in vertue, you shall haue vertuous princes.
If you set them to learning, your gouernours shall be men of knowledge. If you teach them actiuitie, you shall haue valiant capteins. If they practise policie, you shall haue both politike and prudent rulers.
On the other side, if by your negligence they fall to vice (as youth is to all euill prone and readie) not onelie their honor, but also your honestie shall be spotted and appalled. If they be sluggards and giuen to sloth, the publike wealth of this realme must shortlie decaye. If they be vnlearned, they may by flatterie some be blinded, and by adulation often de-ceiued. If they lacke actiuitie, euerie creature (be he neuer so base of birth) shall soile and ouerthrow them like dumb beastes and beestlie daffards. Therefore I desire you, and in Gods name adure you, rather to studie to make them rich in goodlie knowledge, and vertuous qualities; than to take paine to glorie them with abundance of worlde treasure, and mundane superfluitie.

And certeinlie, when they come to ripenesse of age, and shall peraduenture consider, that by your omission and negligent education, they haue not such graces, nor are indued with such notable qualities as they might haue bene, if you had performed the trust to you by me committed: they shall not onelie deplore and lament their vngarnished estate, and naked condition; but also it may fortune, that they shall conceiue

conceiue inwardlie against you such a negligent truth, that the sequels thereof may rather turne to displeasure than thanks, and sooner to an ingratitude than to a reward. My kingdome also I leave in your gouernance, during the minoritye of my children, charging you (on your honours othes and fidelitie made and sware to me) so indifferentlie to order and gouerne the subiects of the same, both with iustice and mercie, that the wilis of malefactoris haue not too large a scope, nor the hartis of the good people by too much extremitie be neither sorrowfullie damned, nor unkindlie kept vnder. Wh I am so sleepe, that I must make an end. And now before you all I commend my soule to almightie God my sauiour and redeemer, my bodie to the wormes of the earth, my kingdome to the prince my sonne: and to you my louing friends my heart, my trust, and my whole confidence. [And euen with that he fell on sleepe.]

Having thus spoken, and set things in god staie, as might be supposed, he shortly after departed this life at Westminster the ninth of Aprill, in the yeare 1483, after he had reigned two and twentie yeares, one moneth, and eight daies. His bodie was with funerall pompe conueied to Windsor, and there buried. He left behind him issue by the queene his wife two sonnes, Edward and Richard, with five daughters; Elizabeth that was after queene, married to Henrie the seauenth; Cicilie married to the viscount Welles; Margaret a nunne professed in Ston or Dertford, as sir Thomas More saith; Anne married to the lord Thomas Howard, after earle of Surrie, and duke of Norfolk; Katharine wedded to the lord William Courtenie sonne to the earle of Denonshire. Beside these he left behind him likewise a base sonne named Arthur, that was after viscount Lisle. For the description of his person & qualities I will referre you to that which sir Thomas More hath written of him in that historie, which he wrote and left unfinished of his sonne Edward the first, and of his brother king Richard the third: which we shall (God willing) hereafter make you partaker of, as we find the same recorded among his other workes, word for word; when first we haue (according to our begun order) rehearsed such writers of our nation as liued in his daies.

As first, Nicholas Berton borne in Suffolke a Carmelit frier in Gippeswich, prouinciall of his order through England; Henrie Parker a Carmelit frier of Doncaster, preached against the pride of prelates, and for such doctrine as he set forth, was imprisoned with his fellow Thomas Holden, and a certaine blacke frier also for the like cause; Parker was forced to recant thre speciall articles, as Bale noteth out of Leland; John Harding an esquier borne in the north parts, wrote a chronicle in English verse, and among other speciall points therein touched, he gathered all the submissions and homages had and made by the Scottissh kings, euen from the daies of king Athelstan [whereby it euidentlie may appeare, how the Scottissh kingdome euen in manner from the first establishing thereof here in Britaine, hath bene appertaining vnto the kings of England, and holden of them as their cheefe & superior lords.]

William Iue a doctoz of diuinitie and prebendarie of saint Pauls in London; Thomas Willton a diuine, and deane of the said church of Pauls in London; Julian Bemis, a gentlewoman indued with excellent gifts both of bodie and mind, wrote certaine treatises of hawking and hunting, delighting greatly hir selfe in those exercises and pastimes;

she wrote also a booke of the lawes of armes, and knowledge appertaining to heralds; John Stamberie borne in the west parts of this realme, a Carmelit frier, and confessor to king Henrie the first, he was also maister of Eaton colledge, and after was made bishop of Bangor, and removed from thence to the see of Hereford; John Shuclete an Augustine frier, prouinciall of his order; John Fortescue a iudge and chancelor of England, wrote diuerse treatises concerning the law and politike gouernement.

Rochus a Charterhouse monke borne in London, of honest parents, and studied in the vniuersitie of Paris, he wrote diuerse epigrams; John Heycas borne also in London was fellow of Ballioll colledge in Oxford, and after went into Italie, where he heard Guarinus that excellent philosopher read in Ferrara, he proued an excellent physician and a skilfull lawier, there was not in Italie (whilst he remained there) that passed him in eloquence & knowledge of both the tongues, Græke and Latine; Walter Hunt a Carmelit frier, a great diuine, and for his excellencie in learning sent from the whole bodie of this realme, vnto the generall counsell holden first at Ferrara, and after at Florence by pope Eugenius the fourth, where he disputed among other with the Grækes, in defense of the order and ceremonies of the Latine church; Thomas Willgenhall a monke of the order called Hermonistratensis in the abbie of Durham in Norfolk.

John Gunthorpe went into Italie, where he heard that eloquent learned man Guarinus read in Ferrara, after his comming home into England he was deane of Welles, and keeper of the priuie seal; John Hambois an excellent musician, and for his notable cunning therein made doctoz of musike; William Carton wrote a chronicle called Fructus temporum, and an appendix vnto Trenis, beside diuerse other bookes and translations; John Spiluerston a Carmelit frier of Bristow, and prouinciall of his order through England, Ireland, and Scotland, at length (because he defended such of his order as preached against endowments of the church with temporall possessions) he was brought into trouble, committed to prison in castell S. Angelo in Rome, where he continued thre yeares, and at length was deliuered thorough certeine of the cardinals that were appointed his iudges; David Spoggan a Welles man, tresuroz of the church of Landaffe, wrote of the antiquities of Wales, & a description of the countrie.

John Tiptoft, a noble man borne, a great traveler, excellentlie learned, and wrote diuerse treatises, and finally lost his head in the yeare 1471, in time of the ciuill warre betwixt the houses of York and Lancaster; John Shirwood bishop of Durham; Thomas Bent an excellent philosopher; Robert Huggon borne in Norfolk in a towne called Hardingham, wrote certeine vaine prophesies; John Partfeld a learned physician; William Greene a Carmelit frier; Thomas Horton borne in Bristow an alchemist; John Peare a monke of Bristow; Richard Poland borne in Norfolk a Franciscane frier, and a doctoz of diuinitie; Thomas Willing a monke of Westminster, a doctoz of diuinitie and preferred to the bishopricke of Hereford; Scogan a learned gentleman and student for a time in Oxford, of a pleasant wit, and bent to merrie deuises, in respect whereof he was called into the court, where giuing himselfe to his naturall inclination of mirth & pleasant pastime, he played manie sporting parts, although not in such vniuall maner as hath bene of him reported.

The historie of king Edward the fift, and king Richard the third vnfinished, vvritten

by maister Thomas More then one of the vnder shiriffes of London, about the yeare of our Lord 1513, according to a copie of his owne hand, printed among his other workes.

King Edward the fourth of that name, after that he had liued fiftie & thre yeres, seven moneths, and six daies, and thereof reigned two and twentie yeres, one moneth, & eight daies, died at Westminster the ninth daie of Aprill, the yeare of our redemption, a thousand foure hundred fourescore and thre; leaving much faire issue, that is to wit, Edward the prince, a thirtene yeres of age; Richard duke of Yorke two yeres yonger; Elizabeth, whose fortune and grace was after to be queene, wife vnto king Henrie the seuenth, and mother vnto the eight; Cicillie, not so fortunate as faire; Briget, which representing the vertue of hir, whose name she bare, professed and obserued a religious life in WERTFORD, an house of clove nunnnes; Anne, that was after honorable married vnto Thomas, then lord Howard, and after earle of Surrie; and Katharine, which long time tolled in either fortune, sometime in wealth, oft in aduersitie, at the last, if this be the last (for yet she liueth) is by the benignitie of hir nepheue king Henrie the eight, in verie prosperous estate, and worthie hir birth and vertue.

He liued at such times as his daye
was passed,

The love of his people.

This noble prince deceased at his palace of Westminster, and with great funerall honor and heauines of his people from thence conueied, was interred at WINDSOR. A king of such gouernance & behauior, in time of peace (for in warre each part must needs be others enimie) that there was neuer anie prince of this land, attaining the crowne by battell, so hearti-lie beloued with the substance of the people: nor hee himselfe so speciallie in anie part of his life, as at the time of his death. Which fauour and affection, yet after his deceasse, by the crueltie, mischief, and trouble of the tempestuous world that followed, highlie toward him more increased. At such time as he died, the displeasure of those that bare him grudge for king Henries sake the first, whome he deposed, was well allwaged, & in effect quenched, in that manie of them were dead in more than twentie yeres of his reigne, a great part of a long life: and manie of them in the meane season growne into his fauour, of which he was neuer stränge.

He was a goodlie personage, and princelie to behold, of heart courageous, politike in counsell, in ad-uersitie nothing
abashed, in prosperitie rather iollfull than proud, in peace iust and mercifull, in warre sharpe and fierce, in the field bold and hardie,
and natheles no further (than wisdom would) aduenturous,

whose warres who so well considered, he shall no lesse commend his wisdom where he voided, than his manhood where he vanquished. He was of visage louelie, of bodie mightie, strong, and cleane made: howbeit, in his latter daies with ouer liberall diet somewhat corpulent and bozelle, and nathelesse not vncamelie. He was of youth greatlie giuen to flesh-lie wantonnesse: from which health of bodie, in great prosperitie and fortune, without a speciall grace hard-lie restraineth, the poet implieng no lesse and saieing:

Mens erit apta capi tunc cum latissima rerum, Et feges in pingui luxuriabit humo.

This fault not greatlie greued the people: for neither could anie one mans pleasure stretch and extend to the displeasure of verie manie, and was without violence, and ouer that in his latter daies lesse, and well left. In which time of his latter daies this realme was in quiet and prosperous estate, no feare of outward enimies, no warre in hand, nor none toward, but such as no man looked for. The people toward the prince, not in a constrained feare, but in a willing and louing obedience: among themselves the commons in good peace. The lords, whome hee knew at variance, himselfe in his death bed appeased: he had left all gathering of monie (which is the onely thing that withdaweth the hearts of English men from the prince) nor anie thing intended he to take in hand, by which he should be diuened therto: for his tribute out of France he had before obtained; and the yeare foregoing his death, he had obtained Berwik.

And albeit that all the time of his reigne he was with his people, so benigne, courteous, and so familiar, that no part of his vertues was more esteemed: yet the condition in the end of his daies (in which manie princes by a long continued soveriegnitie decline into a proud port from debonaire behauior of their beginning) marvellouslie in him grew and increased: so farre forth, that in summer (the last that euer hee saw) his highnes being at WINDSOR in hunting, sent for the maior & aldermen of London to him for none other errand, but to haue them hunt & be merrie with him, where he made them not so statelie, but so frendlie and familiar there, and sent benison from thence so frelie into the citie, that no one thing in manie daies before gat him either more hearts, or more heartie fauour amongst the common people; which oftentimes more esteeme and take for greater kindnesse a little courtesie, than a great benefit.

So deceased (as I haue said) this noble king, in that time in which his life was most desired. Whose loue of his people, and their entier affection toward him,

See before
pag. 705.

him, had bene to his noble chylzen (having in themselves also as manie gifts of nature, as manie princelie vertues, as much goodlie towardnesse as their age could receiue) a maruellous fortresse and sure armoz, if diuision and dissention of their friends had not vnarmed them, and left them destitute, and the execrable desire of soueraintie prouoked him to their destruction: which if either kind or kindnesse had holden place, must needs haue bene their chiefe defense. For Richard the duke of Gloucester, by nature their vncle, by office their protectoz, to their father beholden, to themselves by oth and allegiance bounden, all the bands broken that bind man and man together, without any respect of God or the world, unnaturalie contrived to bereue them, not onelie their dignitie, but also their liues.

But forsomuch as this dukes demeanoz ministred in effect all the whole matter whereof this booke shall intreat, it is therefore conuenient somewhat to shew you yet further go, what manner of man this was, that could find in his hart such mischief to conceiue.

Richard duke of
of Yorke.

Richard duke of Yorke, a noble man and a mightie, began not by warre, but by law to challenge the crowne, putting his claime into the parliament, where his cause was either for right or fauor so farre forth advanced, that king Henrie his blond (albeit he had a goodlie prince) vtterlie reieted, the crowne was by authoritie of parliament intailed vnto the duke of Yorke and his issue male in remainder, immediately after the death of king Henrie. But the duke not indurynz so long to tarrie, but intending vnder pretext of dissention and debate arising in the realme, to preuent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in king Henrie his life, was with manie nobles of the realme at Wakefield slaine, leauynz thre sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard.

Edward.

George duke
of Clarence.

* had not yet

All thre as they were great states of birth, so were they great and statelie of stomack, greedie and ambitious of authoritie, and impatient of partners. Edward renegynz his fathers death, beprised king Henrie, and attained the crowne. George duke of Clarence was a goodlie noble prince, and at all times fortunat, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the enuie of his enemies * his brother against him. For were it by the queene and lordes of his blond, which highlie maligned the kings kindred (as women commonlie not of malice, but of nature hate them whome their husbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the duke himselfe, intending to be king; at the least wilful treason was there laid to his charge: and finally, were he faultlesse, were he faultlesse, attainted was he by parliament, and iudged to the death, and thereupon hastily drowned in a butt of malmesie. Whose death king Edward (albeit he commanded it) when he wist it was done, pitifully bewailed, and sorowfullie repented.

The description of Richard the third.

Richard the third sonne, of whome we now intreat, was in wit and courage equall with either of them, in bodie and pproportione farre vnder them both, litle of stature, ill featured of limmes, crooke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlike, in other men otherwise; he was malicious, watthfull, enuious, and from afore his birth neuer stoward. It is for truth reported, that the duchesse his mother had so much adoe in his traueill, that she could not be deliuered of him vncut; and that he came into the world with the feet forwarde, as men be borne outward, and (as the same runneth also) not vnto thed, whether men of hatred report about the truth, or else that nature changed his course in his beginning, which in the course of his life manie things unnaturalie committed, so that the full consequence of these qualities, with the defects of fauour and amiable proportion, gaue proofe to this rule of physiognomie:

None euill capteine was he in the warre, as to which his disposition was more meetly than for peace. Sundrie victories had he, sometimes ouerthowes; but neuer on default as for his owne person, either of hardinesse or politike order. Fre was he called of dispense, and somewhat about his power liberall: with large gifts he gat him vnstedfast friendship, for which he was faine to pill and spoile in other places, and got him stedfast hatred. He was close and secret, a depe dissembler, lowlie of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardlie compantable where he inwardlie hated, not letting to kisse whome he thought to kill: despitious and cruell, not for euill will alway, but offer for ambition, and either for the lucre or increase of his estate.

Friend and so was much what indifferent, where his aduantage grew, he spared no mans death whose life withstode his purpose. He slue with his owne hands king Henrie the first, being prisoner in the Tower, as men constantlie said, and that without commendement or knowledge of the king, which would vndoubtedlie (if he had intended that thing) haue appointed that butcherlie office to some other, than his owne bozne brother. Some wise men also twene, that his dytt couertlie coueied, lacked not in helping forth his brother of Clarence to his death: which he resisted openlie, howbeit somewhat (as men deemed) more faintlie than he that were hartlie minded to his wealth.

The death of king Henrie
the first.

And they that thus deme, thinke that he long time in kings Edwards life forthought to be king; in case that the king his brother (whose life he looked that euill diet should shorten) should happen to deceasse (as in deed he did) while his chylzen were yong. And they deme, that for this intent he was glad of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whose life must needs haue hindered him so intending, whether the same duke of Clarence had kept him true to his nephew the yong king, or enterprised to be king himselfe. But of all this point is there no certentie, and who so diuyneth vpon coniectures, maie as well shot to farre as to short.

Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the selfe night, in which king Edward died, one Willebroke, long yer moorning, came in great hast to the house of one Wottier dwelling in Redecroffe-strete without Creplegate: and when he was with hastie rapping quickelie letten in, he shewed vnto Wottier, that king Edward was departed. By my truth man quoth Wottier, then will my maister the duke of Gloucester be king. What cause he had so to thinke, hard it is to saie; whether he being toward him, any thing knew that he such thing purposed, or otherwise had anye incheling thereof: for he was not likelie to speake it of nought.

But now to retorne to the course of this historie. Where it that the duke of Gloucester had of old forminde this conclusion, or was now at erst thereunto moued, and put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the yong princes, his nephues (as oportunitie & likelihood of speed putteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certeine it is that he contrived their destruction, with the usurpation of the regall dignitie vpon himselfe. And forsomuch as he well wist and holpe to mainteine a long continued grudge and heart-burning betwene the queens kindred and the kings blond, either partie enueng others authoritie, he now thought that their diuision should be (as it was in deed) a furtherlie beginning to the pursuit of his intent.

May he was resolved, that the same was a sure ground ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might first (under the pretext of reuenging of old displeasure) abate the anger and ignorance of the one partie to the destruction of the tother; and then win to his purpose as manie as he could, and those that could not be wone, might be lost per they looked therefore. For of one thing was he certeine, that if his intent were perceiued, he should some haue made peace betwene both the parties with his owne bloud. King Edward in his life, albeit that this dissention betwene his friends somewhat irked him: yet in his god health he somewhat the lesse regarded it: because he thought whatsoeuer businesse should fall betwene them, himselfe should alwaie be able to rule both the parties.

But in his last sickenesse, when he perceiued his naturall strength so fore infiebled, that he despaired all recoverie, then he, considering the youth of his children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted than that that hapned; yet well foreseeing that manie harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lacke discretion of themselves, & good counsell of their friends, of which either partie should counsell for their owne commoditie, & rather by pleasant aduise to win themselves fauor, than by profitable aduertisement to doo the children good, he called some of them before him that were at variance, and in especiall the lord marquisse Dorset the quenees sonne by his first husband.

These lords
chamberlaine counsellors
of the quene
to him.

So did he also William the lord Hastings a noble man, then lord chamberlaine, against whom the quene speciallie grudged, for the great fauour the king bare him: and also for that he thought him so creditte familiar with the king in wanton companie. He kinned also bare him fore, as well for that the king had made him capitaine of Calis, which office the lord Rivers, brother to the quene, claimed of the kings former promise, as for diuerse other great graces which he receiued, that they looked for. When these lords, with diuerse other of both the parties, were come in presence, the king sitting vp himselfe, and vnderfet with pillowes, as it is reported, on this wise said vnto them.

The oration of the king on his death-bed.

My lords, my dere kinsmen and alies, in what plight I lie you see, and I feele. By which the lesse while I looke to liue with you, the more depelie am I moued to care in what case I leaue you, for such as I leaue you, such be my children like to find you. Which if they should (as God forbid) find you at variance, might hap to fall themselves at warre, per their discretion would serue to set you at peace. Ye see their youth, of which I reckon the onelie suertie to rest in your concord. For it sufficeth not that all you loue them, if ech of you hate other: if they were men, your faithfulnessse happilie would suffice. But childhood must be mainteined by mens authoritie, and slipper youth vnderpropped with elder counsell, which neither they can haue but ye giue it, nor ye giue it if ye graue not.

For where ech labourereth to breake that the other maketh, and for hatred of ech of others person impugnereth ech others counsell, there must it needs be long yer anie good conclusion go forward. And also while either partie labourereth to be chafe, flatterie shall haue more place than plaine and faithfull aduise: of which much needs insue the euill bringing vp of the prince, whose mind in tender youth infer, shall redilie fall to mischæfe and riot, and draw downe with his noble relme to ruine. But if grace turne him to wisdom: which if God send, then they that by euill meanes befoze pleased him best, shall after fall furthest out of fauour: so that euer at length euill drifts shall draw to nought, and good plaine waies prosper.

Great variance hath there long bene betwene you, not alwaie for great causes. Sometimes a thing right well intended, our misconstruction turneth vnto woyle: or a small displeasure done vs, either our owne affection or euill twongs aggreueth. But this wot I well, ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as ye haue of loue. That we be all men, that we be christian men, this shall I leaue for preachers to tell you; and yet I wot nere whether anie preachers words ought more to moue you, than his that is by & by going to the place that they all preach of.

But this shall I desire you to remember, that the one part of you is of my bloud, the other of mine alies; and ech of you with other either of kinned or affinitie, which spiritual kinned of affinitie, if the sacraments of Christs church beate that weight with vs that would God they did, should no lesse moue vs to charitie, than the respect of fleshlie consanguinitie. Our Lord forbid, that you loue together the woyle, for the selfe cause that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth, and no where find we so deadlie debate, as among them, which by nature and law most ought to agree together. Such a pestilent serpent is ambition and desire of baine gloire and soveriegnitie, which among states where she once entereth, creepeth forth so farre, till with diuision and variance she turneth all to mischæfe: first longing to be next vnto the best, after ward equall with the best, & at last chafe and aboue the best.

The nature of ambition.

Of which immoderat appetite of worship, and thereby of debate and dissention, what losse, what sorow, what trouble hath within these few yeares growne in this realme, I praise God as well forget, as we well remember. Which things if I could as well haue foresene, as I haue with my more paine than pleasure proued, by Gods blessed ladie (that was euer his orh) I would neuer haue wone the courtlesie of mens knees, with the losse of so manie heads. But sithens things passed can not be gaine called, much ought we the more beware, by what occasion we haue taken so great hurt afoze, that we estlowes fall not in that occasion againe.

Now be those græfs passed, and all is (God be thanked) quiet, and likelie right well to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder your cosins my children, if God send them life and you loue. Of which two things, the lesse losse were they, by whom though God did his pleasure, yet should the realme alwaie find kings, and peradventure as good kings.

But if you among your selues in a childes reigne fall at debate, manie a good man shall perishe, and happilie he too, and ye too, yet this land find peace againe. Wherefore in these last words that euer I looke to speake with you, I exhort you and require you all, for the loue that you haue euer bozne to me; for the loue that I haue euer bozne vnto you; for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all; from this tyme forwarde (all griefs forgotten) ech of you loue other. Which I herelie trust you will, if ye anie thing earthlie regard, either God or your king, affinitie or kinned, this realme, your owne countrie, or your owne suertie. And therewithall the king no longer induring to sit by, laid him downe on his right side, his face towards them: and none was there present that could refraine from weeping.

He counterfeited and pretended reconciliation.

But the lords recomforting him with as good words as they could, and answering for the time as they thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence, as by their words appeared, ech forgave other, and ioined their hands together, when (as it after appeared by their deeds) their hearts were farre asunder. As soon as the king was departed, the noble prince his sonne dyed toward London, which at the time of his deceasse kept his household at Ludlow in Wales, which countrie being farre off from the law and recourse to iustice, was begun to be farre out of good rule, and warden wild robbers and reauers, waliking at libertie vncorrected. And for this occasion the prince was in the life of his father sent thither, to the end that the authoritie of his presence should reframe euill disposed persons from the boldnesse of their former outrages.

Lord Rivers.

To the gouernance and ordering of this yong prince at his sending thither, was there appointed sir Anthonie Wodville lord Rivers, and brother vnto the queene, a right honourable man, as ballant of hand as politike in counsell. Adioined were there vnto him other of the same partie; and in effect euerie one as he was next of kin vnto the queene, so was he planted next about the prince. That dyd by the queene not vniuerselie denied, whereby his blood might of youth be rooted into the princes fauour, the duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruction; and byon that ground set the foundation of all his unhappie building. For whome soeuer he perceiued either at variance with them, or bearing himselfe their fauour, he brake vnto them some by mouth, & some by writing.

The duke of Gloucesters
solicitations.

Day, he sent secret messengers saing, that it neuer was reason, nor in anie wise to be suffered, that the yong king their maister and kinsman, should be in the hands and custodie of his mothers kinned, sequestred in maner from their companie and attendance, of which euerie one ought him as faithfull seruice as they, and manie of them farre more honourable part of kin than his mothers side. Whose blood (quoth he) sauing the kings pleasure, was full vniuerselie to be matched with his: which now to be as who say removed from the king, and the lesse noble to be left about him, is (quoth he) neither honourable to his maiestie nor to vs, and also to his grace no suertie, to haue the mightiest of his frends from him; and vnto vs no little icopartie, to suffer our well pynned euill willers to grow in ouer-great authoritie with the prince in youth; namely, which is light of beleafe and some persuaded.

Ye remember I trow king Edward himselfe, albeit he was a man of age & discretion, yet was he in manie things ruled by the bend, more than should either with his honoz, or our profit, or with the commoditie of any man else, except onlie the immoderate advancement of themselves. Which, whether they feared thirsted after their owne weale, or our too, it were hard (I wene) to gesse. And if some folks friendship had not holden better place with the king, than anie respect of kinned, they might peradventure easilie haue betrayed and brought to confusion some of vs per this. Why not as easilie as they haue done some other already, as nore of his roiall blood as we? But our Lord hath wrought his will, and (thanks be to his grace) that perill is past. Whobeyt as great is growning, if we suffer this yong king in our enemies hand, which without his witting might abuse the name of his commandement, to arte of our vnderling, which thing God defend and god prouision forbid.

Of which god prouision none of vs hath anie thing the lesse need, for the late made attonement, in which the kings pleasure had more place than the parties willes. For none of vs (I beleue) is so vniuerselie, ouersome to trust a new frend made of an old fo; or to thinke that an hourlie kindnes, suddenie contracted in one houre, continued yet scant a fortnight, should be deeper settled in their stomachs, than a long accustomed malice manie yeares rooted. With these words and writings, and such other, the duke of Gloucester some set on fire them that were of themselves easie to kindle, & in speciallie twaine, Edward duke of Buckingham, and William lord Hastings then chamberleine, both men of honour & of great power; the one by long succession from his ancestrie, the other by his office and the kings fauour. These two, not bearing ech to other so much loue, as hatred both vnto the queenes part: in this point accorded together with the duke of Gloucester, that they would vniuerselie remoue from the kings companie all his mothers frends, vnder the name of their enemies.

Upon this concluded the duke of Gloucester, vnderstanding that the lords, which at that time were about the king, intended to bring him vp to his coronation accompanied with such power of their frends, that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gathering and great assemble of people and in maner of open warre, whereof the end (he wist) was doubtfull, and in which the king being on their side, his part should haue the face and name of a rebellion: he secretlie therfore by diuers means caused the queene to be persuaded and brought in the mind, that it neither were need, and also should be leopordous, the king to come by strong.

For whereas now euerie lord loued other, and none other thing studied vpon, but about the coronation and honoz of the king: if the lords of his kindred should assemble in the kings name much people, they should giue the lords, betwixt whome and them had bene sometime debate, to feare and suspect, least they should gather this people, not for the kings safeguard, whome no man impugned, but for their destruction, hauing more regard to their old variance, than their new attonement. For which cause they should assemble on the other partie much people againe for their defense, whose power the wist well far stretched: and thus should all the realme fall on a roze. And of all the hurt that thereof should insue, which was likelie not not to be little, and the most harme there like to fall where the least would, all the world would put hir and hir hindered in the wight, and saie that they had vnwisellie and vntrulie also broken the amitie & peace, that the king hir husband so prudentlie made, betwene his kin and hirs in his death bed, and which the other partie faithfullie obserued.

The queene, being in this wise perswaded, such word sent vnto hir sonne, and vnto hir brother being about the king, and ouer that the duke of Gloucester himselfe, and other lords the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the king so reuerentlie, and to the queenes friends here so louinglie, that they nothing earthlie mistrusting, brought the king vp in great haile, not in good speed, with a sober companie. Now was the king in his waie to London gone from Northampton, when these dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham came thither, where remained behind the lord Riuer the kings vnkle, intending on the morrow to follow the king, and to be with him at Stonie Stratford [certeine] miles thence earlie per he departed. So was there made that night much friendlie chere betwene these dukes & the lord Riuer a great while. But incontinent, after that they were openlie with great courtesie departed, and the lord Riuer lodged, the dukes secretlie with a few of their most priue friends set them downe in counsell, wherein they spent a great part of the night.

The princes
the duke of Buckingham
& Gloucester.

And at their rising in the dawning of the daie, they sent about priuie to their seruants in their Inns & lodgings about, giuing them commandement to make themselves thortlie readie, for their lords were to horse backward. Upon which messages, manie of their folke were attendant, when manie of the lord Riuer's seruants were vnreadie. Now had these dukes taken also into their custodie the keyes of the Inn, that none should passe forth without their licence. And ouer this, in the high waie toward Stonie Stratford, where the king lay, they had besetted certeine of their folke, that should send backe againe, and compell to returne, anie man that were gotten out of Northampton, toward Stonie Stratford, till they should giue other licence. For asmuch as the dukes themselves intended for the shew of their diligence, to be the first that should that daie attend vpon the kings highnesse out of that towne, Thus bare they folke in hand.

But when the lord Riuer vnderstand the gates closed, and the waies on euerie side beset, neither his seruants nor himselfe suffered to gone out, perceiving well so great a thing without his knowledge not begun for naught, comparing this manner present with this last nights chere, in so few houres so great a change, maruellouslie misliked. Howbeit, sith he could not get awaie, and keepe himselfe close, he would not, least he should seeme to hide himselfe for some secret feare of his owne fault, whereof he saw no such cause in himselfe; he determined vpon the suertie of his owne conscience, to go boldlie to them, and inquire what this matter might meane. Whom asone as they saw, they began to quarrell with him and saie, that he intended to set distance betwene the king and them, and to bring them to confusion, but it should not lie in his power.

The lord
Buckingham
in hand.

And when he began (as he was a verie well spoken man) in goodlie wise to excuse himselfe, they tarried not the end of his answer, but thortlie took him, and put him in ward, and that done, forthwith went to horse backe, and took the waie to Stonie Stratford, where they found the king with his companie, readie to leape on horsebacke, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, because it was too freight for both companies. And asone as they came in his presence, they light adowne with all their companie about them. To whome the duke of Buckingham said, So asofore gentlemen, & pomen keepe your rooms. And thus in a goodlie arae, they came to the king, and on their knees in verie humble wise saluted his grace, which receiued them in verie iolous and amiable manner, nothing earthlie knowing nor mistrusting as yet.

But euen by and by in his presence they piked a quarrell to the lord Richard Greie, the kings other brother by his mother, saleng, that he with the lord marquesse his brother, & the lord Riuer's his vnkle, had compassed to rule the king and the realme, and to set variance among the states, and to subdue and destroe the noble blood of the Realme. Toward the accomplishing wherof they said that the lord marquesse had entered into the Tower of London, & thence taken out the kings treasure, and sent men to the sea. All which things these dukes wist well were done for good purposes and necessarie, by the whole counsell at London, sauing that somewhat they must saie.

The lord
Greie is quarrelled against.

Vnto which words the king answered, What my brother marquesse hath done I cannot saie, but in good faith I dare well answer for mine vnkle Riuer and my brother here, that they be innocent of anie such matter. Pea my liege (quoth the duke of Buckingham) they haue kept their dealing in these matters farre fro the knowledge of your good grace. And forthwith they arrested the lord Richard and sir Thomas Daughan knight, in the kings presence; and brought the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where they took againe further counsell. And there they sent awaie from the king, whom it pleased them, and set new seruants about him, such as liked better them than him. At which dealing he wept, and was nothing content; but it boded not.

And at dinner, the duke of Gloucester sent a dish from his owne table vnto the lord Riuer, praising him to be of good chere: all should be well inough. And he thanked the duke, and praised the messenger to beare it to his nephue the lord Richard, with the same message for his comfort, who he thought had moze need of comfort, as one to whome such aduersitie was strange. But himselfe had bene all his daies in vze therewith, & therefore could beare it the better. But for all this comfortable courtesie of the duke of Gloucester, he sent the lord Riuer, and the lord Richard, with sir Thomas Daughan into the north countrie, into diuerse places to prison, and afterward all to Pomfret, where they were in conclusion beheaded.

The death of the lord Ri-uer & other.

In this wise the duke of Gloucester took vpon himselfe the order and gouernance of the yong king, whome with much honor and humble reuerence he conueied upward towards the citie. But anon, the tidings of this matter came hastilie to the queene a little before the midnight following, and that in the forest wise, that the king hir son was taken, hir brother, hir sonne, & hir other friends arrested, and sent no man with thither, to be done with God wot what. With which tidings the queene in great sight & heauinesse, bewailing hir chilles reigne, hir friends mischance, and hir owne infortune, damming the time that euer she dissuaded the gathering of power about the king, gat hir selfe in all the hast possible with hir yonger sonne and hir daughters out of the palace of Westminster, in which she then laie, into the sanctuarie, lodging hir selfe and hir companie there in the abbats place.

The queene
taken; saue
the queene.

Now came there one in likewise not long after midnight from the lord chamberleine, to doctor Rotheram the archbishop of Dorke, then chancellor of England, to his place not farre from Westminster, And for that he shewed his seruants that he had tidings of so great importance, that his maister gaue him in charge, not to forbeare his rest, they letted not to wake him, nor he to admit this messenger in, to his bed side. Whom he heard that these dukes were gone backe with the kings grace from Stonie Stratford vnto Northampton. Notwithstanding sir (quoth he) my lord sendeth your lordship word, that there is no feare: for he assureth you that all shall be well. I assure him (quoth the archbishop) be it as well as it will, it will neuer be so well as we haue saide it.

And there vpon, by and by after the messenger departed, he caused in all the hall all his seruants to be called by, and so with his owne household about him, and euerie man weaponed, he took the great seals with him, and came yet before daie vnto the queene. About whom he found much beauniesse, rumble, haile and businesse, cariage and conueiance of hir stuffe into sanctuarie, chests, coffers, packs, fardels, trusted all on mens backs, no man vnoccupied, some lading, some going, some discharging, some coming for more, some breaking downe the walles to bring in the next waie, and some yet drew to them that holpe to carrie a wyong waie: such made their lucre of others losse, prailing a bottie above beaunie, to whome the poets verse may be well applied, to wit:

eleg. 3.*

The desolate state of the queene.

Ferrea non Penetrem sed predam secula laudant.
The queene hir selfe sate alone alow on the rushes all desolate and dismayd, whome the archbishop comforted in best manner he could, shewing hir that he trusted the matter was nothing so feare as she took it for, and that he was put in good hope and out of feare by the message sent him from the lord chamberleine. Ah wo worth him (quoth she) for he is one of them that laboureth to destroye me and my blood. Whadame (quoth he) be ye of god chere, for I assure you, if they crowne any other king than your sonne, whome they now haue with them, we shall on the morowe crowne his brother, whome you haue here with you. And here is the great seale, which in likewise as that noble prince your husband deliuered it vnto me; so here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vse and behoofe of your sonne: and therewith he betooke hir the great seale, and departed home againe, yet in the dawning of the daie.

By which time, he might in his chamber window see all the Thames full of boates of the duke of Glocesters seruants, watching that no man should go to sanctuarie, nor none could passe vnsearched. Then was there great commotion and murmur, as well in other places about, as speciallie in the citie, the people diuerlie diuining vpon this dealing. And some lords, knights, and gentlemen, either for fauour of the queene, or for feare of themselves, assembled in sundrie companies, and went stockmele in harnesse: and many also, for that they reckoned this demeanour attempted, not so speciallie against the other lords, as against the king himselfe in the disturbance of his coronation. But then by and by the lords assembled together at [a certeine place.]

Toward which meeting, the archbishop of Yorke fearing that it would be ascribed (as it was indeed) to his ouermuch lightnesse, that he so suddenlie had yielded by the great seale to the queene, to whome the custody thereof nothing pertained, without especiall commandement of the king, secretlie sent for the seale againe, and brought it with him after the customeable manner. And at this meeting the lord Hastings (whose truth toward the king no man doubted, nor needed to doubt) perswaded the lords to beleue, that the duke of Glocester was sure and fastlie faithfull to his prince, and that the lord Rivers, and lord Richard with the other knights, were for matters attempted by them against the duke of Glocester and Buckingham, put vnder arrest for their surterie, not for the kings scopardie: and that they were also in safegard,

*Heuere the seale

ed thereof shortly after.*

and there no longer should remaine, than till the matter were, not by the dukes onelic, but also by all the other lords of the kings counsell indifferently examined, & by others discretions ordered, and either iudged or appealed.

But one thing he aduised them to beware, that they iudged not the matter too farre forth, yet they knew the truth; nor turning their priuate granges into the common hurt, irritating and prouoking men vnto anger, and disturbing the kings coronation, towards which the dukes were coming by, that they might peradventure bring the matter so farre out of ioint, that it should neuer be brought in frame againe. Which strife if it should hap (as it were likely) to come to a field, though both parties were in all other things equal: yet should the authoritie be on that side where the king is himselfe. With these perswasions of the lord Hastings, whereof part himselfe beleued, of part he wist the contrarie, these commotions were somewhat appeased. But speciallie by that, that the dukes of Glocester and Buckingham were so nere and came so shortly on with the king, in more other manner, with none other voice or semblance than to his coronation, causing the same to be blown about, that these lords and knights which were taken, had contriued the destruction of the dukes of Glocester and Buckingham, and of other the noble blood of the realme, to the end that themselves would alone demean and gouerne the king at their pleasure.

And for the colourable profe thereof, such of the dukes seruants as rode with the carts of their stuffe that were taken (among which stuffe, no maruell though some were harnesse, which at the breaking vp of that household must needs either be brought awaie or cast awaie) they helued vnto the people all the waies as they went; so here be the barrels of harnesse that these traitors had pilouie conueied in their carriage to destroye the noble lords withall. This deuise albeit that it made the matter to wise men more bulshellis, well perceining that the intendours of such a purpose would rather haue had their harnesse on their backs, than to haue bound them vp in barrels, yet much part of the common people were therewith verie well satisfied, and said it were almesse to hang them.

When the king approched nere to the citie, Edmund Shato goldsmith, then maior, with William White, and John Matthew shirriffes, and all the other aldermen in scarlet, with fure hundred boile of the citizens, in violet, receiued him reuerentlie at Harnesse; and riding from thence accompanied him into the citie, which he entered the fourth daie of Maie, the first and last yeare of his reigne. But the duke of Glocester bare him in open sight so reuerentlie to the prince, with all semblance of lowlinesse, that from the great obloquie in which he was so late before, he was suddenlie fallen in so great trust, that at the counsell next assembled he was made the onelic man, chosen and thought most meet to be protector of the king and his realme, so that (were it definite or were it folle) the lambe was betaken to the wolfe to kepe.

At which counsell also, the archbishop of Yorke chancellor of England, which had deliuered by the great seale to the queene, was thereof greatlie repproued, and the seale taken from him, and deliuered to doctor Knell bishop of Lincoln, a wise man and a god, and of much experience, and one of the best learned men vndoubtedlie that England had in his time. Diuerse lords and knights were appointed vnto diuerse romes. The lord chamberleine and some other kept still their offices that they had before. Now all were it so that the protector so sore thirsted for the finishing of that he had begun, that thought euerie daie a yeare till it were achieved; yet durst he no further her attempt, as long as he had but halfe his price in his hand.

And why? Well did he wot, that if he deposed the one brother, all the realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in sanctuarie, or should happlie be shortly conueied to his fathers libertie. Wherefore incontinent at the next meeting of the lords at the counsell, he proposed to them, that it was a heinous deed of the quene, & proceeding of great malice toward the kings counsellors, that she should keepe in sanctuarie the kings brother from him, whose special pleasure & comfort were to haue his brother with him. And that by hir done to none other intent, but to bring all the lords in obloquie and murmur of the people.

As though they were not to be trusted with the kings brother, that by the assent of the nobles of the land, were appointed as the kings nearest friends, to the tuition of his owne totall person. The prosperitie thereof standeth (quoth he) not all in keeping from enemies, or ill will, but partlie also in recreation, and moderate pleasure: which he cannot (in this tender youth) take in the companie of ancient persons, but in the familiar conuersation of those that be neither farre vnder, nor farre aboue his age: and neuertheless of estate conuenient to accompanie his noble maiestie. Wherefore, with whom rather, than with his owne brother?

And if anie man thinke this consideration light (which I thinke none thinks that loues the king) let him consider, that sometime without small things, greater cannot stand. And verelie, it reboundeth greatlie to the dishonour both of the kings highnesse, and of all vs that beie about his grace, to haue it run in euerie mans mouth, not in this realme onlie, but also in other lands (as euill words walke far) that the kings brother should be faine to keepe sanctuarie. For euerie man will weene, that no man will so do for naught. And such euill opinion once fastned in mens harts, hard it is to wrest out, and may grow to more grace than anie man can here diuine.

Wherefore me thinketh it were not worst to send vnto the quene, for the redresse of this matter, some honorable trustie man, such as both tendereth the kings weale and the honour of his counsell, and is also in fauour and credence with hir. For all which considerations, none seemeth more meetlie, than our reuerend father here present, my lord cardinall, who may in this matter do most good of anie man, if it please him to take the paine, which I doubt not of his goodness he will not refuse for the kings sake and ours, and welch of the young duke himselfe, the kings most honorable brother, and (after my souereigne lord himselfe) my most deere nephew, considered that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumour and obloquie now going, and the harts auoided that thereof might issue, and much rest and quiet grow to all the realme.

And if she be percase so obffinate, and so precise, lie set vpon hir owne will, that neither his wife and faithful aduertisement can not moue hir, nor anie mans reason content hir; then shall we by mine advice, by the kings authoritie fetch him out of that prison, and bring him to his noble presence, in whose continual companie he shall be so well cherished and so honorable intreated, that all the world shall to our honour and hir reproch perceiue, that it was onelie malice, frowardnesse, or follie, that caused hir to keepe him there. This is my purpose and mind in this matter for this time, except anie of your lordships anie thing perceiue to the contrarie; for neuer shall I (by Gods grace) so wed my selfe to mine owne will, but that I shall be readie to change it vpon your better aduices.

When the protector had said, all the counsell affirmed, that the motion was good and reasonable; and to the king and the duke his brother, honorable; and a thing that should cease great murmur in the realme, if the mother might be by good means induced to deliuer him. Which thing the archbishop of Yorke, whom they all agreed also to be thereto most conuenient, took vpon him to moue hir, and therein to do his uttermost deuoir. Howbeit, if she could be in no wise intreated with hir good will to deliuer him, then thought he, and such other as were of the spiritualtie present, that it were not in anie wise to be attempted to take him out against hir will.

For it should be a thing that would turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuilege of that holie place should now be broken, which had so manie yeares be kept, which both kings and popes so good had granted, so manie had confirmed, and which holie ground was more than five hundred yeares ago (by saint Peter in his owne person in spirit accompanied with great multitudes of angels by night) so speciallie halowed, & dedicated to God (for the prouise wherof, they haue yet in the abbey saint Peters cope to shew) that from that time hitherto, was there neuer so vnderuout a king that durst that sacred place violate, or so holie a bishop that durst it presume to consecrate.

And therefore (quoth the archbishop of Yorke) God forbid that anie man should for anie thing carthlie, enterprise to breake the immunitie & libertie of the sacred sanctuarie, that hath bene the safegard of so manie a good mans life. And I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace, we shall not need it. But for anie manner need, I would not we should do it. I trust that she shall be with reason contented, and all things in good manner obtained. And if it happen that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it so farre forth do my best, that ye shall all well perceiue, that no lacke of my deuoure, but the mothers dread and womanish feare shall be the let.

Womanish feare, naie womanish frowardnesse (quoth the duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it vpon my soule, she well knoweth the needeth no such thing to feare, either for hir son or for hir selfe. For as for hir, here is no man that will be at war with women. Would God some of the men of hir kin were women too, & then should all be some in rest. Howbeit there is none of hir kin the lesse loued, for that they be hir kin, but for their owne euill deserving. And namely, if we loued neither hir nor hir kin, yet were there no cause to thinke that wee should hate the kings noble brother, to whose grace we our selues be of kin. Whose honoz, if she as much desired as our dishonoz, and as much regard took to his wealtie as to hir owne will, she would be as loth to suffer him to be absent from the king, as anie of vs be. For if she haue anie wit (as would God she had as good will as she hath) she wold wit she reckoneth hir selfe no wiser than she thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull mind she nothing doubteth, but verelie beloneth and knoweth, that they would be as loth of his harme as hir selfe, and yet would haue him from hir if she bide there: and we all (I thinke) contented, that both be with hir, if she come thence, and bide in such place where they may with their honoz be. Now then, if she refuse in the deliuerance of him, to follow the counsell of them, whose wisdom she knoweth, whose truth she well trusteth: it is easie to perceiue, that frowardnesse letteth hir, and not feare. But go to, suppose that she feare (as who maie let hir to feare hir owne shadow) the more she feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we feare to leaue him in hir hands.

For if she cast such fond doubts, that she feare his hurt: then will she feare that he shall be set thence.

For

Reasons why it was not thought meet to fetch the quens son out of sanctuarie.

The duke of Buckingham's words against the quene.

He had considered thought that anie man should be so bold to take the quene for the wronging of his son.

For the will some thinke, that if men were let (which God forbid) upon so great a mischief, the sanctuarie would little let them: which good men might (as me thinketh) without sinne somewhat lesse regard than they do. Now then, if the doubt, least he might be fetched from hir, is it not likeli enough that the shall send him some where out of the realme? Clerke I loke for none other. And I doubt not, but the now as fore mindeth it, as we the let thereof. And if the might happen to bring that to passe (as it were no great maiestrie, the letting hir alone) all the world would saie, that we were a wise sort of counsellors about a king, that let his brother be cast awaie vnder our noses.

And therefore, I insure you faithfullie for my mind, I will rather (manger hir mind) fetch him awaie, than leaue him there, till hir forwardnesse and fond feare conueie him awaie. And yet will I breake no sanctuarie therfore. For verely, sith the priuileges of that place, and other like, haue bene of long continuance, I am not he that would be about to breake them. And in god faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that should be about to make them. Yet will I not say naie, but that it is a deed of pitie, that such men as the sea, or their euill debtors haue brought in pouertie, should haue some place of libertie, to keepe their bodies out of danger of their cruell creditors.

And also, if the crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question, while either part taketh other as traitors, I will well there be some places of refuge for both. But as for theues, of which these places be full, and which neuer fall from the craft, after they once fall thereto, it is pitie the sanctuarie should serue them. And much more, mankillers, whome God bad to take from the altar and kill them, if their murder were wilfull. And where it is otherwile, there need we not the sanctuaries that God appointed in the old law. For if either necessitie, his owne defense, or misfortune draweth him to that deed, a pardon serueth, which either the law granteth of course, or the king of pitie maie. Then loke me now how few sanctuarie men there be, whome anie fauourable necessitie compelled to go thither. And then see on the other side, what a sort there be commonlie therein of them, whome wilfull birthright hath brought to naught.

sanctuaries.

What a rabble of theues, muttherers, and malicious heinous traitors, and that in two places speciallie; the one at the elbow of the citie, the other in the verie bowels. I dare well know it, weie the good that they do, with the hurt that cometh of them, and ye shall find it much better to lacke both, than haue both. And this I saie, although they were not abused as they now be, & so long haue be, that I feare me euer they will be, while men be afraid to let their hands to the mendment, as though God & S. Peter were the patrones of vngratious living. Now birthrights riot & run in debt, vpon boldnesse of these places, yea, and rich men run thither with poore mens goods, there they build, there they spend, & bid there creditors go whistle them. Mens wiues run thither with their husbands plate, & saie they dare not abide with their husbands for beating. Theues bring thither their stolen goods, and there liue thereon.

There deuise they new robberies, nightlie they scale out, they rob, and reauce, and kill, and come in againe, as though those places gaue them not onelie a safegard for the harme they haue done, but a licence also to do more. Howbeit, much of this mischief (if wise men would set their hands to it) might be amended, with great thanks to God, and no breach of the priuilege. The residue, sith so long ago, I wrote nere what pope, and what prince more pitious than pollicke, hath granted it, & other men since, of a cer-teine religious feare, haue not broken it, let vs take a paine therewith, and let it a Gods name stand in force, as faste forth as reason will, which is not fullie so farre forth, as may serue to let vs of the fetching forth of this noble man to his hono: and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can be a sanctuarie man.

A sanctuarie serueth alwaie to defend the bodie of that man that standeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onlie, but also of lawfull hurt: for against vnlawfull harmes, neuer pope nor king intended to priuilege anie one place, for that priuilege hath euerie place. Knoweth anie man, anie place wherein it is lawfull one man to do another wrong? That no man vnlawfullie take hurt, that libertie, the king, the law, and verie nature forbiddeth in euerie place, and maketh (to that regard) for euerie man euerie place a sanctuarie. But where a man is by lawfull means in perill, there needeth he the tuition of some speciall priuilege, which is the onelie ground and cause of all sanctuaries.

From which necessitie, this noble prince is farre, whose loue to his king, nature and kindred proueth; whose innocencie to all the world, his tender youth proueth; and so sanctuarie, as for him, neither none he needeth, nor also none can haue. When come not to sanctuarie, as they come to baptism, to require it by their godfathers; he must aske it himselfe that must haue it, and reason; sith no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him saine, need to require it. What will then haue ponder babe, which and if he had discretion to require it, if need were, I dare say would now be right angrie with them that keepe him there? And I would thinke without anie scruple of conscience, without anie breach of priuilege, to be somewhat more homelie with them that be there sanctuarie men in deed.

For if one go to sanctuarie with another mans goods, which should not the king, leauing his bodie at libertie, satisfie the partie of his goods, euen within the sanctuarie? For neither king nor pope can giue anie place such a priuilege, that it shall discharge a man of his debts, being able to paie. (And with that, diuerse of the clergie that were present (whether they said it for his pleasure, or as they thought) agreed plainelie, that by the law of God, and of the church, the goods of a sanctuarie man should be deliuered in payment of his debts, and stolen goods to the owner, and onlie libertie reserued him to get his liuing with the labor of his hands.)

Clerke (quoth the duke) I thinke you say verie truth. And what if a mans wife will take sanctuarie, because she lust to run fro hir husband, I would woe if she could alledge none other cause, he maie lawfullie without anie displeasure to saint Peter, take hir out of saint Peters church by the arinc. And if no bodie maie be taken out of sanctuarie, that saith he will bide there; then if a child will take sanctuarie, because he feareth to go to scholl, his maister must let him alone. And as simple as that sample is, yet is there lesse reason in our case than in that; for therein, though it be a childish feare, yet is there at the least wise some feare, and herein is there none at all. And verelie, I haue often heard of sanctuarie men, but I neuer heard earst of sanctuarie children.

And therefore, as for the conclusion of my mind, who so maie haue deserued to need it, if they thinke it for their suertie, let them keepe it. But he can be no sanctuarie man, that neither hath wilddome to desire it, nor malice to deserue it; whose life or libertie can by no lawfull proceesse stand in teopardie. And he that taketh one out of sanctuarie to do him good, I saie plainlie, that he breakeeth no sanctuarie. When the duke had done, the tempo:all men of oie, and a good part part of the spirituall also, thinking no hurt earthlie meant toward the yong babe, condescended in effect, that if he were not deliuered, he should be fettered. Howbeit they thought it all best, in the auoiding of all manner of rumor, that the lord cardinall should first assaie to get him with his god will.

Whereupon all the counsell came vnto the Starre chamber at Westminster; and the lord cardinall, leaving the protector with the counsell in the Starre chamber, departed into the sanctuarie to the quene, with diuers other lords with him: were it for the respect of his honor, or that the should by presence of so manie perceiue, that this errand was not one mans mind: or were it, for that the protector intended not in this matter to trust anie one man alone; or else, that if the finalle were determined to keepe him, some of that companie had haplie secret instruction, incontinent (mangle his mind) to take him, and to leaue him no respite to conueie him, which he was likelie to mind after this matter broken to him, if his time would in anie wise serue him.

When the quene and these lords were come together in presence, the lord cardinall shewed vnto him, that it was thought vnto the protector, and vnto the whole counsell, that his keeping of the kings brother in that place, was the thing which highlie sounded, not onelie to the great rumor of the people and their obloquie; but also to the importable græfe and displeasure of the kings roiall maiestie, to whose grace it were as singular a comfort, to haue his naturall brother in companie, as it was their both dishonour, and all theirs and his also, to suffer him in sanctuarie, as though the one brother stood in danger and perill of the other [ and therefore more conuenient it were they should be together, than parted asunder; that the world may well thinke and saie both of their kindred and also of them, when they shall see and heare how they keepe continuall companie, and liue in mutual amitie (as becometh brethren) which bringeth commodities with it, for number, infinite; and for vie, comfortable and necessarie; as it is truelie said:

Quæ ligat vniuersos felix concordia fratres,

O quales fructus utilitatis habet! ]

The cardinall shewed him likewise, that the counsell therefore had sent him vnto him, to require him the deliuerie of him, that he might be brought vnto the kings presence at his libertie, out of that place, which they reckoned as a prison; and there should he be demeaned according to his estate: and he in this doing, should both do great good to the realme, pleasure to the counsell, and profit to his selfe, succour to his friends that were in distresse, and ouer that (which he wist well the speciallie tendered) not onelie great comfort and honor to the king, but also to the yong duke himselfe, whose both great wealth it were to be together, as well for manie greater causes, as also for their both disport & recreation. Which thing the lord esteemed no slight, though it seeme light, well pondering that their youth without recreation and plaie cannot indure; nor anie stranger, for the conuenience of both their ages and estates, so meetlie in that point for anie of them, as either of them for other.

By lord (quoth the quene) I saie not naie, but that it were verie conuenient, that this gentleman, whose ye require, were in companie of the king his brother: and in good faith, me thinketh it were as great commoditie to them both, as for yet awhile, to bene in the custodie of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but speciallie the yonger, which besides his infancie, that also needeth god looking to) hath awhile bene so sore diseased, vexed with sickness, and is so metelie rather a little amended, than well recovered, that I dare put no person earthlie in trust with his keeping, but my selfe onelie, considering that there is (as physicians saie) and as we also find, double the perill in the reciduation, than was in the first sickness, with which disease nature being sore laboured, sore wearied and weakened, wareth the lesse able to beare out and susteine a new surfet. And albeit there might be founden other that would haplie do their best vnto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, than I that so long haue kept him: or is more tenderlie like to cherish him, than his owne mother that bare him.

No man denieth, god madame (quoth the cardinall) but that your grace were of all folke most necessarie about your chylzen: and so would all the counsell not onelie be content, but glad that ye were (if it might stand with your pleasure) to be in such place as might stand with their honour. But if you do appoint your selfe to tarry here, then thinke they it more conuenient that the duke of Bozke were with the king honourable at his libertie, to the comfort of them both: than here as a sanctuarie man, to their both dishonour and obloquie, sith there is not alwaie so great necessitie to haue the childe to be with the mother: but that occasion may sometime be such, that it should be more expedient to keepe him elsewhere. Which in this well appeareth, that at such time as your dearest sonne then prince, and now king, should for his honor, and good order of the countrie, keepe household in Wales, farre out of your companie: your grace was well content therewith your selfe.

Not verie well content (quoth the quene) and yet the case is not like, for the tone was then in health, and the tother is now sicke. In which case, I maruell greatly, that my lord protector is so desirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the childe in his sickness miscarried by nature, yet might he run into slander and suspicion of fraud. And where they call it a thing so sore against my chldes honor, and theirs also, that he bide in this place: it is all their honours there to suffer him bide, where no man doubteth he shall be best kept; and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intend not to come forth and leopord my selfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in libertie with me, than I were there in leopordie with them.

Whie madame (quoth another lord) knowe you anie thing whie they should be in leopordie: saie verelie ther, as they now be. But it is (I trow) no great marvell though I feare, least those that haue not letted to put them in distresse without colour, will let as little to procure their destruction without cause. The cardinall made a countenance to the other lord, that he should harpe no more vpon that string; and then said he to the quene, that he nothing doubted, but that those lords of his honorable kin, which as yet remained vnder arrest, should vpon the matter examined, do well inough: and as toward his noble person, neither was nor could be anie manner leopordie.

Whereby should I trust that (quoth the quene) in that I am gilltlesse: As though they were gilltie, in that I am with their enemies better loned than they? When they hate them for my sake, in that I am so nere of kin to the king: And how far they be off, if that would helpe, as God send grace it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpose not as yet to depart hence. And as for this gentleman my sonne, I mind that he shall be where I am, till I see further: for I assure you, for that I see some men so greedie, without anie substantiall cause to haue him, this maketh me much the more searder to deliuer him.

Cruelle madame, quoth he, and the searder that you you be to deliuer him, the fearder bin other men to suffer you to keepe him, least your causelesse feare might cause you further to conueie him; and manie be there that thinke he can haue no priuilege in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor malice to deserue it. And therefore, they reckon no priuilege broken, though they fetch him out; which if y<sup>e</sup> shall refuse to deliuer him, I verelie thinke they will. So much deead hath my lord his uncle, for the tender loue he beareth him, least your grace should hap to send him awaie.

The quene's reple upon the lord cardinall.

A fir (quoth the quene) hath the protector: so tender zeale, that he feareth nothing but least he should escape him: I thinke he that I would send him hence, which neither is in the plight to send out. And in what place could I reckon him sure, if he be not sure in this sanctuarie, whereof was there neuer tyrant yet so diuelishly that durst presume to breake? And I trust God is as strong now to withstand his aduersaries, as euer he was. But my sonne can deserue no sanctuarie, and therefore he can not haue it. Forasmuch he hath found a goodlie glose, by which that place that may defend a theefe, may not saue an innocent. But he is in no iopardie, nor hath no need thereof, would God he had not.

Troweth the protector? I praise God he may proue a protector: troweth he that I perceiue not whereunto his painted processe draweth? It is not honourable that the duke bide here: it were comfortable for them both, that he were with his brother, because the king lacketh a playfellow. Be you sure: I praise God send them both better playfellows than him, that maketh so high a matter vpon such a trifling pretext: as though there could none be founden to plaie with the king, but if his brother that hath no lust to plaie for sicknesse, come out of sanctuarie out of his safeguard to plaie with him. As though princes (as yong as they be) could not plaie but with their peres, or children could not plaie but with their kindred, with whom for the more part they agree much worse than with strangers.

But the child cannot requite the priuilege. Who told him so? He shall heare him aske it, and he will. Howbeit, this is a gaie matter. Suppose he could not aske it, suppose he would not aske it, suppose he would aske to go out. If I saie he shall not; if I aske the priuilege but for my selfe, I say he that against my will taketh him out, breake the sanctuarie. Serueth this libertie for my person onlie, or for my goods too? He may not hence take my horse fro me: and may you take my child fro me? He is also my ward: for as my learned counsell sheweth me, sith he hath nothing by descent holden by knights seruice, the law maketh his mother his gardian. When may no man I suppose take my ward fro me out of sanctuarie, without the breach of the sanctuarie.

And if my priuilege could not serue him, nor he aske it for himselfe, yet sith the law commiteth to me the custodie of him, I may requite it for him, except the law giue a child a gardian onlie for his goods and lands, discharging him of the cure and safe keeping of his bodie, for which onlie both lands and goods serue. And if examples be sufficient to obteine priuilege for my child, I need not farre to seke. For in this place in which we now be (and which is now in question whether my child may take benefit of it) mine other sonne now king was bozne, and kept in his cradle, and preserved to a more prosperous fortune, which I praise God long to continue. And as all you know, this is not the first time that I haue taken sanctuarie.

For when my lord my husband was banished, and thrust out of his kingdome, I fled hither, being great with child, and here I bare the prince. And when my lord my husband returned safe againe, and had the victorie, then went I hence to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the prince unto his father, when he first toke him in his armes. And I praise God that my sonnes palace may be as great safeguard vnto him now reigning, as this place was sometime to the kings enemie. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, sith, &c. Therefore here intend I to keepe him, sith mans law serueth the gardian to keepe the infant.

The law of nature will the mother to keepe his child, Gods law priuilegeth the sanctuarie, and the sanctuarie my sonne, sith I feare to put him in the protectors hands that hath his brother already, and were (if both failed) inheritour to the crowne. The cause of my feare hath no man to do to examine. And yet feare I no further than the law feareth, which (as learned men tell me) forbiddeth euery man the custodie of them, by whose death he maie inherit lesse land than a kingdome. I can no more, but whosoever he be that breaketh this holie sanctuarie, I praise God shoulde send him need of sanctuarie, when he maie not come to it. For taken out of sanctuarie would I not my mostall enemie were.

The lord cardinall, perceiuing that the quene feared euer the longer the farther off, and also that she began to kinde and chafe, and spake more biting words against the protector, and such as he neither beleued, and was also loth to heare, he said to hir for a small conclusion, that he would no longer dispute the matter: but if she were content to deliuer the duke to him, and to the other lords present, he durst laie his owne bodie & soule both in pledge, not onlie for his suertie, but also for his estate. And if she would giue them a resolute answer to the contrarie, he would forthwith depart therewithall, and shift the so would with this businesse afterwards: for he neuer intended more to moue hir in that matter, in which she thought that he & all other also (saue hir selfe) lacked either wit or truth: wit, if they were so dull that they could nothing perceiue what the protector intended: truth, if they should procure hir sonne to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they should perceiue toward the child aie euill intended.

The quene with these words had a good while in a great studie. And forsomuch as hir learned the cardinall more readie to depart than some of the remnant, and the protector himselfe readie at hand; so that the verelie thought she could not keepe him, but that he should incontinentlie be taken thence: and to conueie him else-where, neither had she time to serue hir, nor place determined, nor persons appointed, all things vnreadie, this message came on hir so suddenly, nothing lesse looking for, than to haue him set out of sanctuarie, which she thought to be now beset in such places about, that he could not be conueied out vntaken, and partlie as she thought it might fortune hir feare to be false, so well the witt it was whether needlesse or bootlesse: wherefore if she should needs go from him, she deemed it best to deliuer him.

And ouer that, of the cardinals faith the nothing doubted, nor of some other lords neither, whom she there saw. Which as she feared least they might be deceiued: so was she well assured they would not be corrupted. When thought she it should yet make them the more warlike to loke to him, and the more circumspectlie to see to his suertie, if she with hir owne hands betooke him to them of trust. And at the last she toke the yong duke by the hand, and said vnto the lords: My lords (quoth she) and all my lords, I neither am so vnwise to mistrust your wits, nor so suspicious to mistrust your truths: of which thing I purpose purpose to make you such a prose, as if either of both in you, might turne both you and me to great sorrow, the realme to much harme, and you to great reproch.

For lo, here is (quoth he) this gentleman, whom I doubt not but I could here kepe safe, if I would, what euer anie man say: I doubt not also, but there be some abroad so deadlie enemies unto my blood, that if they will where anie of it laie in their owne bodie, they would let it out. We have also experience that desire of a kingdome knoweth no kintred. The brother hath bene the brothers bane: and maie the nephews be sure of their vnicle? Ech of these children is the others defense while they be asunder, and ech of their liues lieth in the others bodie. Kepe one safe and both be sure, and nothing for them both more perillous, than to be both in one place. For what wise merchant aduentureth all his goods in one ship?

All this notwithstanding, here I deliuer him and his brother in him, to kepe, into your hands, of whom I shall aske them both afoze God & the world. Faithfully he be that wot I well, & I know well you be wise. Power and strength to kepe him (if you list) lacke ye not of your selfe, nor can lacke helpe in this cause. And if ye can not else where, then maie you leaue him here. But onelie one thing I beseech you, for the trust which his father put in you euer, & for the trust that I put in you now, that as farre as ye thinke that I feare to much, be you well ware that you feare not as farre to little. And therewithall the said brother to the child; Fare well mine owne swete sonne, God send you good keeping: let me kisse you yet once yer you go, for God knoweth when we shall kisse together againe. And therewith the kised him and blessed him, turned hir backe and wept and went hir waie, leaving the child weeping as fast. [Howbeit the dukes soie afterwards that the had so parted from hir son when it was past hir power to procure remedie, & no hope of helpe left against afterclaps which is the common case of all that kind, as the proverbe saith:

Femineus verè dolor est post facta dolere.]

When the lord cardinall, and these other lords with him, had receiued this yong duke, they brought him into the Star chamber, where the protector toke him in his armes and kised him with these words: How welcome my lord euen with all my verie heart. And he said in that of likelihood as he thought. There vpon forthwith they brought him vnto the king his brother into the bishops palace at Paules, and from thence thorough the cite honourable into the Tower, out of the which after that daie they neuer came abroad.

When the protector had both the children in his hands, he opened himselfe more boldlie, both to certeine other men, and also cheslie to the duke of Buckingham. Although I know that manie thought that this duke was priuie to all the protectors counsell, euen from the beginning; and some of the protectors friends said, that the duke was the first mouer of the protector to this matter, sending a priuie messenger vnto him, straight after king Edwards death. But others againe, which knew better the subtil wit of the protector, denie that he euer opened his enterpryse to the duke, vntill he had brought to passe the things before rehearsed. But when he had imprisoned the queenes kindred, & gotten both hir sonnes into his owne hands, then he opened the rest of his purpose with lesse feare to them whome he thought meet for the matter, and speciallie to the duke, who being twome to his purpose, he thought his strength more than halfe increased. The matter was broken vnto the duke by subtil folks, and such as were the craftiest-masters in the handling of such wicked deuises: who declared vnto him that the yong king was offended with him for his kindreds sake, and if he were euer able he would reuenge them, who would picke him forward therevnto if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment) or else if they were put to death, without doubt the yong k. would be careful for their deaths, whose imprisonment was greuous vnto him.

Also that with repenting the duke should nothing auaille, for there was no waie left to redeme his offense by benefits, but he should sooner destroye himselfe than saue the king, who with his brother and his kindred he saw in such places imprisoned, as the protector might with a becke destroye them all: and that it were no doubt but he would do it indeed, if there were anie new enterpryse attempted. And that it was likelie, that as the protector had provided priuie gard for himselfe, so had he spials for the duke, and traines to catch him, if he should be against him; and that peradventure from them, whome he left suspected. For the state of things and the dispositions of men were then such, that a man could not well tell whome he might trust, or whome he might feare.

These things and such like, being braten into the dukes mind, brought him to that point, that where he had repented the way that he had entered; yet would he go forth in the same; and sith he had once begun, he would stoutlie go thorough. And therefore to this wicked enterpryse, which he beleued could not be voided, he bent himselfe, and went through; and determined, that sith the common mischance could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie. Then it was agreed, that the protector should haue the dukes aid to make him king, and that the protectors onelie lawfull sonne should marrie the dukes daughter, and that the protector should grant him the quiet possession of the earldome of Hereford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obtaine it in king Edwards time.

Besides these requestes of the duke, the protector of his owne mind promised him a great quantitie of the kings treasure, and of his household stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwene themselves, they went about to prepare for the coronation of the yong king; as they would haue it seeme. And that they might turne both the eyes and minds of men from perceiuing of their diuers other where, the lords being sent for from all parts of the realme, came thicke to that solemnitie. But the protector and the duke, after that they had sent the lord cardinall, the archbishop of Doke then lord chancellor, the bishop of Ely, the lord Stanleie, and the lord Hastings then lord chamberlaine, with manie other noble men (*) to common & deuise about the coronation in one place, as fast were they in an other place, contriuing the contrarie, and to make the protector king.

To which counsell albeit there were adhibited berrie few, and they were secret: yet began there here and there abouts, some maner of muttering among the people, as though all should not long be well, though they neither wist what they feared, nor wherefore: were it, that before such great things, mens hearts of a secret instinct of nature misgiue them; as the sea without wind swelleth of himselfe sometime before a tempest: or were it that some one man, happlie somewhat perceiuing, filled manie men with suspicion, though he shewed few men what he knew. Howbeit somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to muse on the matter, though the counsell were close. For by little and little all folke withdrew from the Tower, and drew vnto Crosbies in Bishops gates street, where the protector kept his household. The protector had the resort, the king in maner desolate.

While some for their businesse made sute to them that had the doing, some were by their friends secretlie he warned, that it might happilie turne them to no good, to be too much attendant about the king without the protectors appointment, which remoued also diuerse of the princes old seruants from him, and set new about him. Thus manie things comming together, partlie by chance, partlie of purpose, caused at length not common people onelie, that wound with the wind, but wise men also, and some lords eke to marke the matter and muse thereon; so farre forth that the lord Stanleie that was after earle of Derby, wiselie mistrusted it, and said vnto the lord Hastings, that he much disliked these two seuerall counsels. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the one place, little wot we wherof they talke in the tother place.

Catesbie and his conditions described.

App lord (quoth the lord Hastings) on my life neuer doubt you: for while one man is there, which is neuer theise, neuer can there be thing once moued, that should sound amisse toward me, but it should be in mine eares per it were well out of their mouths. This ment he by Catesbie, which was of his neere secret counsell, and whome he verie familiarlie used, and in his most weightie matters put no man in so speciall trust, reckoning himselfe to no man so lief, sich he well wist there was no man so much to him beholden as was this Catesbie, which was a man well learned in the lawes of this land, and by the speciall fauour of the lord chamberlaine, in god authoritie, and much rule bare in all the countie of Leices-ter, where the lord chamberlains power chafelie laie.

But fuerlie great pitie was it, that he had not had either moze truth, or lesse wit. For his dissimulation onelie kept all that mischeefe by. In whome if the lord Hastings had not put so speciall trust, the lord Stanleie & he had departed with diuerse other lords, and broken all the danse, for manie ill signes that he saw, which he now construes all to the best. So fuerlie thought he, that there could be none harme toward him in that counsell intended, where Catesbie was. And of truth the protector and the duke of Buckingham made verie good semblance vnto the lord Hastings, and kept him much in companie. And undoubtedly the protector loued him well, and loth was to haue lost him, sauing for feare least his life should haue quailed their purpose.

For which cause he moued Catesbie to proue with some words cast out a farre off, whether he could thinke it possible to win the lord Hastings vnto their part. But Catesbie, whether he assaied him, or assaied him not, reported vnto them, that he found him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible words, that he durst no further breake. And of truth, the lord chamberlaine of verie trust thewed vnto Catesbie the distrust that others began to haue in the matter. And therefore he, fearing least their motion might with the lord Hastings minish his credence, wherevnto onelie all the matter leaned, procured the protector hastilie to rid him. And much the rather, for that he trusted by his death to obtaine much of the rule that the lord Hastings bare in his countie: the onelie desire wherof was the allectiue that induced him to be partner, and one speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

In assemble of lords in the Tower.

Whereupon some after, that is to wit, on the first daie [being the thirteenth of June] manie lords assembled in the Tower, and there sat in counsell, discussing the honourable solemnitie of the kings coronation, of which the time appointed then so nere approached, that the pageants and subtilties were in making daie & night at Westminster, and much vittels killed therfore, that afterward was cast awaie. These lords so sitting together communing of this matter, the protector came in amongst them, first about nine of the clocke, saluting them courteouslie, and extolling himselfe that he had bene from them so long, saing merilie that he had bene a sleeper that daie.

After a little talking with them, he said vnto the bishop of Ely: App lord you haue verie good strawberries at your garden in Wolborne, I require you let vs haue a messe of them: Gladlie my lord (quoth he) would God I had some better thing as ready to your pleasure as that! And therewithall in all the hast he sent his seruant for a messe of strawberries. The protector set the lords fast in communing, & thereupon praiseng them to spare him for a little while, departed thence. And some after one houre, betwene ten & eleuen he returned into the chamber amongst them all, changed with a wonderful soure angrie countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and frowning, and gnawing on his lips: and so sat him downe in his place.

The debate of the lords in the assembly of the lords.

All the lords were much dismayed and sore marvelled at this maner of sudden change, and what thing should him aile. Then, when he had sitten still a while, thus he began: What were they worthy to haue that compassse and imagine the destruction of me, being so nere of blood vnto the king, and protector of his rotall person and his realme? At this question, all the lords sat sore astonied, musing much by whome this question should be meant, of which euerie man wist himselfe cleere. Then the lord chamberlaine (as he that for the loue betwene them thought he might be boldest with him) answered and said, that they were worthy to be punished as heinous traitors, whatsoever they were. And all the other affirmed the same. That is (quoth he) ponder for euerie my brothers wife, and other with hir (meaning the queene.)

At these words manie of the other lords were greatlie abashed, that fauoured hir. But the lord Hastings was in his mind better content, that it was moued by hir, than by anie other whome he loued better: albeit his heart somewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as he was of the taking of hir kindred, and of their putting to death, which were by his assent before deuised to be beheaded at Pomfret this selfe same daie, in which he was not ware that it was by other deuised, that he himselfe should be beheaded the same daie at London. Then said the protector: We shall all see in what wise that forceresse, and that other witch of hir counsell Shores wife, with their affinitie, haue by their forcerie and witchcraft wasted my bodie. And therewith he plucked by his dublet sleue to his elbow vpon his left arme, where he shewed a wondrously withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other.

Whereupon euerie mans mind sore misgave them, well perceluing that this matter was but a quarell. For they well wist that the queene was too wise to go about anie such follie. And also if she would, yet would she of all folke least, make Shores wife of hir counsell, whome of all women the most hated, as that concubine whome the king hir husband had most loued. And also, no man was there present, but well knew that his arme was euer such since his birth. Past theleste, the lord chamberlaine (which from the death of king Edward kept Shores wife, on whome he somewhat doted in the kings life, sauing (as it is said) he that while forbore hir of reuerence toward the king, or else of a certeine kind of fidelitie to his friend) answered and said: Certainelie my lord, if they haue so heinouslie done, they be worthy heinous punishment.

What (quoth the protector) thou seruest me I wene with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they haue so done, and that I will make god on thy bodie traitor: and there with as in a great anger, he clapped his fist vpon the word a great rap. At which token one cried, Treason!

Reason, without the chamber. Therewith a doze clapped, and in come there rushing men in harnesse, as manie as the chamber might hold. And anon the protector said to the lord Hastings: I arrest thee traitor: What me my lord? (quoth he.) Pea the traitor quoth the protector. And an other let lie at the lord Stanleie, which shynke at the stroke, & fell vnder the table, or else his head had bene cleft to the teeth: for as thortlie as he shynke, yet ran the blood about his carres.

Then were they all quickelie bestowed in diuerse chambers, except the lord chamberleine, whome the protector had spred and shynke him apace, for by saint Paule (quoth he) I will not to dinner till I see thy head off. It booted him not to aske whie, but heauilie toke a priest at adventure, & made a short shynk: for a longer would not be suffered, the protector made so much hast to dinner, which he might not go to, untill this were done, for saving of his oth. So was he brought forth to the greene beside the chappell within the Towre, and his head laid downe vpon a long log of timber, and there stricken off, and afterward his bodie with the head interred at Windsor beside the bodie of king Edward, both whose soules our Lord pardon. [Thus began he to establish his kingdom in blood, growing thereby in hatred of the nobles, and also abridging both the line of his life, and the time of his regiment: for God will not haue bloodthirstie tyrants daies prolonged, but will cut them off in their ruffe; according to Dauids words:

Impio, succati, audoque cecidi Filios rumpet viridi in iumenta.]

A marvellous case is it to heare either the warnings of that he should haue voided, or the tokens of that he could not void. For the selfe night next before his death, the lord Stanleie sent a trustie messenger vnto him at midnight in all the hast, requiring him to rise and ride awaie with him, for he was disposed bitterlie no longer to bide, he had so fearfull a dreame; in which him thought that a boare with his tuskes so rased them both by the heads, that the blood ran about both their shoulders. And forsomuch as the protector gaue the boare for his cognifance, this dreame made so fearfull an impression in his heart, that he was throughlie determined no longer to tarie, but had his horse ready, if the lord Hastings would go with him, to ride yet so farre the same night, that they should be out of danger per daie.

Oa god Lord (quoth the lord Hastings to this messenger) I caneth my lord thy maister so much to such trifles, and hath such faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantaseth, or do rise in the nights rest by reason of his daies thought: Tell him it is plaine withcertaintie to beleue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh he not that we might be as likelie to make them true by our going, if we were caught & brought backe, as friends faile sliers; for then had the boare a cause likelie to rase vs with his tuskes, as folke that fled for some falschod. Therefore, either is there perill, or none there is in deed: or if anie be, it is rather in going than biding. And in case we should needs fall in perill one waie or other, yet had I rather that men should see that it were by our owne fault, or faint heart. And therefore go to thy maister (man) and commend me to him, & prae him be merie & haue no feare: for I assure him I am as sure of the man that he woteth of, as I am of mine owne hand. God send grace sir (quoth the messenger) and went his waie.

Certeine is it also, that in riding towards the Towre, the same morning in which he was beheaded, his horse rufte or thise stumbled with him, almost to the falling. Which thing albeit euy man wote well daily happeneth to them, to whom no such mischance is toward; yet hath it bene of an old rite and custom obserued, as a token oftentimes notable forgoing some great misfortune. Now this that folloiweth was no warning, but an envious scoone. The same morning yet he was up, came a knight vnto him, as it were of courtesie, to accompanie him to the counsell; but of truth sent by the protector to haue him thitherwards, with whome he was of secret confederacie in that purpose; a meane man at that time, and now of great authoritie.

This knight (I say) when it happened the lord chamberleine by the waie to staie his horse, & comon a while with a priest whom he met in the Towre street, brake his tale, and said merilie to him: What my lord, I pray you come on, whereto talke you so long with that priest: you haue no need of a priest yet: and therewith he laughed vpon him, as though he would say, We shall haue some. But so little wist the tother what he ment, and so little mistrusted, that he was neuer merier, nor neuer so full of god hope in his life, which selfe thing is oft sene a signe of change. But I shall rather let anie thing passe me, than the vaine suertie of mans mind so nere his death [flattering himselfe with deceitfull conceits of inward motions of life to be prolonged, euen in present cases of deable danger, and heauie misfortunes offering great mistrust; as he did that is noted for speaking like a foole:

Non est (crede mihi) sapientis dicere, Finam: Nascentes morimur, finisq; ab origine pendet.]

*Mani lib. 4.

Vpon the verte Towre wharfe, so neare the place where his head was off some after, there met he with one Hastings a pursuant of his owne name. And at their meeting in that place, he was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before to meet in like manner together in the same place. At which other time the lord chamberleine had bene accused vnto king Edward by the lord Rivers the quenes brother, in such wise, as he was for the while (but it lasted not long) farre fallen into the kings indignation, & stood in great feare of himselfe. And forsomuch as he now met this pursuant in the same place, that ieopardie so well passed, it gaue him great pleasure to talke with him thereof, with whom he had before talked thereof in the same place, while he was therein.

And therefore he said: I ha Hastings, art thou remembered when I met thee here once with an heauie heart? Pea my lord (quoth he) that remember I well, and thanked be God, they gat no god, nor you no harme thereby. Thou wouldest say so (quoth he) if thou knewest as much as I know, which few know else as yet, and mo shall thortlie. That meant he by the lords of the quenes kinred that were taken before, and should that daie be beheaded at Wonsret: which he well wist, but nothing wote that the arch hung ouer his owne head. In faith man (quoth he) I was neuer so loie, nor neuer stood in so great dread in my life, as I did when thou and I met here. And lo how the world is turned, now stand mine enemies in the danger (as thou maist hap to heare more hereafter) and I neuer in my life so merrie, nor neuer in so great suertie.

O god God, the blindness of our mortall nature, when he most feares, he was in god suertie; when he reckoned himselfe surest, he lost his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man, a good knight and a gentle, of great authoritie of the tie with his prince, of lining somewhat dissolute, plaine and open to his enemy, & secret to his friend, easie to beguile, as he that of god heart and courage forstudied no perils, a louing man, and passing well beloved: vertie faithfull, and trustie inough, trusting too much. Now Acto the same of this lords death swiftlie through the citie, and so forth further about like a wind in euerie mans care. But the protector, immediatlie after dinner, intending to let some colour vpon the matter, sent in all the hall for manie substantiall men out of the citie into the Towre.

Now at their comming, himselfe with the duke of Buckingham, stood harnessed in old ill faring by-ganders, such as no man should weene, that they would vouchsafe to haue put vpon their backs, except that some sudden necessitie had constrained them. And then the protector shewed them, that the lord chamberleine, and other of his conspiracie, had contriued to haue suddenly destroyed him, and the duke, there the same day in the councill. And what they intended further, was as yet not well knowne. Of which their treason he neuer had knowledge before ten of the clocke the same forenone, which sudden scare drave them to put on for their defense such harnesse as came next to hand. And so had God holpen them, that the mischief turned vpon them that would haue done it. And this he required them to report.

The protector's proclamation.

Euerie man answered him faire, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which of truth no man believed. Yet for the further appeasing of the peoples minds, he sent immediatlie after dinner in all the hall one herald of armes, with a proclamation to be made through the citie in the kings name, concerning, that the lord Hastings, with diuerse other of his traitorous purpose, had before conspired the same day to haue slaine the lord protector, and the duke of Buckingham sitting in the councill; and after to haue taken vpon them to rule the king & the realme at their pleasure, and thereby to pill and spoile whome they list vnccontrolled. And much matter there was in that proclamation, demised to the slander of the lord chamberleine, as that he was an ill counsellor to the kings father, instilling him to manie things highlie redounding to the minishing of his honour, and to the vniuersall hurt of the realme.

The life and deeds of the lord chamberleine laid open

The meanes whereby; namely, his euill companie, sinister procuring, and vngracious example, as well in manie other things, as in the vicious living and inordinate abusion of his bodie, both with manie other, and also speciallie with Shores wife, which was one also of his most secret counsell in this most heinous treason, with whom he laie nightlie, and namely the night last past next before his death. So that it was the lesse maruell, if vngracious living brought him to an unhappie ending, which he was now put vnto by the most dreed commandement of the kings highnesse, and of his honorable and faithfull counsell, both for his demerits, being so openlie taken in his falslie conceived treason, and also least the delayng of his execution might haue encouraged other mischievous persons, partners of his conspiracie, to gather and assemble themselves together, in making some great commotion for his deliuerance: whose hope being now by his well deserved death politike, lie repressed, all the realme should (by Gods grace) rest in god quiet and peace.

Now was this proclamation made within two houres after that he was beheaded, and it was so curiously indited, & so faire written in parchment, in so well a set hand, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, that euerie child might well perceiue that it was prepared before. For all the time, betwene his death and the proclaiming, could scant haue sufficed but to the bare writing alone, all had it bene but in paper, and scribbled forth in hast at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was scholemaster of Dowles, of chance stearing by, and comparing the shortnesse of the time with the length of the matter, said vnto them that stood about him; Here is a gaie goodlie cast soule cast awaie for haile. And a merchant answered him, that it was written by prophetic.

Now then by and by, as it were for anger, not for couetise, the protector sent into the house of Shores wife (for hir husband dwelled not with hir) and spoiled hir of all that ever she had, about the value of two or three thousand markes, and sent hir bodie to prison. And when he had a while laid vnto hir (for the manner sake) that she went about to bewitch him, and that she was of counsell with the lord chamberleine to destroy him: in conclusion, when that no colour could fallen vpon these matters, then he laid beinoudie to hir charge, that thing that hir selfe could not denie, and that all the world wist was true, and that namely lesse euerie man laughed at, to heare it then so suddenly so highlie taken, that she was naught of hir bodie.

And for this cause (as a goodlie continent prince, cleane and faultlesse of himselfe, sent out of heauen into this vicious world for the amendment of mens manners) he caused the bishop of London to put hir to open penance, going before the crosse in procession vpon a lundate with a taper in hir hand. In which she went in countenance and pace demure so womanlie; that albeit she were out of all arie, saue hir kirtle onelie, yet went she so faire and lowelie, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comelie rud in hir cheeks (of which she before had most melle) that hir great shame was hir much praise among those that were more amorous of hir bodie, than curious of hir soule. And manie good folks also that hated hir living, & glad were to see sin corrected: yet pitied they more hir penance, than reioised therein, when they considered that the protector procured it, more of a corrupt intent, than any vertuous affection.

This woman was borne in London, worthyful friended, honestlie brought up, and verie well married, saying somewhat too soone, hir husband an honest citizen, young and goodlie, & of good substance. But for so much as they were coupled yet she were well ripe, she not verie feruentlie loued him, for who she neuer longed, which was happilie the thing that the more easily made hir incline vnto the kings appetite, when he required hir. Whowbeit the respect of his roialtie, the hope of gaie apparell, ease, and other wanton wealth, was able soone to pearse a soft tender heart, [so that she became fertile and pliant to the kings appetite and will; being so blinded with the bright gloze of the present courtlie haunterie which she inioied, that she utterly forgot how excellent a treasure good name and fame is, and of what incomparable sweetnesse, euen by the iudgement of him, whose match for wisdom the world neuer bred up, saying:

Sunt optanda magis pura bona nomina fame, Nobilis vnguenti quam pretiosus odor.

But when the king had abused hir, anon hir husband (as he was an honest man, and one that could his good, not presuming to touch a kings concubine) left hir vp to him altogether. When the king died, the lord chamberleine took hir, which in the kings daies, albeit he was so enamoured vpon hir, yet he forbore hir; either for reuerence, or for a certaine friendlie faithfullnesse. Proper she was and faire; nothing in hir bodie that you would haue changed, but if ye would haue wished hir somewhat higher. Thus saie they that knew hir in hir youth. Albeit some that now see hir (for yet she liueth) deem hir neuer to haue bene well vsaged: whose iudgement seemeth me somewhat like, as though men should gesse the beautie of one long before departed, by hir scalpe taken out of the charuell house.

For now is the old, leane, withered, and doted up, nothing left but riuelled skin, and hard bone. And yet being being euen such, who so well aduise his visage, might gesse and deuise, which parts how filled would make it a faire face. Yet delighted not men so much in his beautie, as in his pleasant behauiour. For a proper wit had he, and could both read well and write, merrie in companie, readie and quicke of answer, neither mute, nor full of bable, sometime taunting without displeasure, and not without disport. The king would saie that he had three concubins, which in three diuerse properties diuerslie excelled. One the merriest, another the wildest, the third the holiest harlot in his realme, as one whome no man could get out of the church lightlie to any place, but it were to his bed.

The other two were somewhat greater persons, geas, and nathelasse of their humilitie content to be named, and to forebare the praise of those propties: but the merriest was this Shoyes wiffe, in whom the king therfore took speciall pleasure. For manie he had, but hir he loued; whose fauour to say the truth (for sir it were to belie the diuill) she neuer abused to any mans hurt, but to manie a mans comfort and releefe. Where the king took displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his mind: where men were out of fauour, she would bring them in his grace. For manie that had highlie offended the obtained pardon. Of great forfeitures she gat men remission.

Finalle, in manie weightie sutes she stood manie a man in great feard, either for none or verie small rewards, and those rather gale than rich; either that she was content with the deed it selfe well done; or for that she delighted to be sued vnto, and to shew that she was able to do with the king; or for that wanton women and wealthe be not alwaies couentous. I doubt not some shall thinke this woman too slight a thing to be written of, and set among the re-membances of great matters: which they shall spe-ciallie thinke, that happilie shall esteeme hir onelie by that they now see hir.

But me seemeth the chance so much the more worthy to be remembred, in how much she is now in the more beggerlie condition, vnfrinded and woone out of acquaintance, after good substance, after as great fauour with the prince, after as great lute and se-king to with all those, that those daies had businesse to spend, as manie other men were in their times, which be now famous onelie by the infamie of their ill daies. Hir doings were not much lesse, albeit they be much lesse remembred, because they were not so uill. For men vse if they haue an euill turne, to write it in marble: and who so doth vs a good turne, we write it in dust, which is not wooll proued by hir: for at this daie she begged of manie at this daie liuing, that at this daie had begged if she had not bene.

Now was it so deuised by the protector and his councell, that the selfe daie, in which the lord cham-berleine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the selfe same houre, was there (not without his assent) beheaded at Pomfret, the foreremembered lords & knights that were taken from the king at Foxhampton and Stonie Stratford. Which thing was done in the presence, and by the order of sir Richard Katcliffe knight, whose seruice the protector speciallie bled in that councell, and in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had bene long secret with him, hauing experience of the world, and a shrewd wit, short & rude in speech, rough and boisterous of behauiour, bold in mischief, as far from pitie as from all feare of God.

This knight bringing them out of the prison to the scaffold, and shewing to the people about that they were traitors (not suffering them to declare & speake their innocencie, least their words might haue inclined men to pitie them, and to hate the protector and his part) caused them hastilie, without iudgement, processe, or maner of order to be beheaded, and without other earthlie gilt, but onelie that they were god men, too true to the king, and too nigh to the quene.

Now when the lord chamberleine & these other lords and knights were thus beheaded, and rid out of the waie: then thought the protector, that when men mused what the matter meant, while the lords of the realme were about him out of their owne strengths, while no man wist what to thinke, nor whom to trust, yet euer they should haue space to dispute and digest the matter and make parties; it were best hastilie to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the crowne, yet men could haue time to deuise anie waie to resist.

But now was all the studie by what meanes this matter, being of it selfe so heinous, might be first broken to the people, in such wise that it might be well taken. To this councell they took diuerse, such as they thought meetlie to be trusted, likelie to be induced to that part, and able to stand them in stead either by power or policie. Among whome they made of councell Edmund Shaws knight then maior of London, which vpon trust of his owne advancement, whereof he was of a prond heart highlie desirous, should frame the citie to their appetite. Of spirituall men they took such as had wit, and were in autho-ritie among the people for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience. Among these had they John Shaw cleerke brother to the maior, and sister Denker, prouinciall of the Augustine friers both doctors of diuinitie, both great preachers, both of more learning than vertue, of more fame than learning. For they were before greatlie esteemed among the people: but after that neuer.

Of these two the one had a sermon in praise of the protector before the coronation, the other after, both so full of tedious flatterie, that no mans eares could abide them. Denker in his sermon so lost his voice, that he was faine to leaue off, and come downe in the midst. Doctor Shaw by his sermon lost his honestie, & some after his life, for vertie shame of the world, into which he durst neuer after come abroad. But the sister forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit some doubt, and manie thinke, that Denker was not of counsell in the matter before the coronation, but after the common maner fell to flatterie after: namelie with his sermon was not incontinentlie vpon it, but at saint Martes hospitall at the Easter after.

But certeine it is, that doctor Shaw was of counsell in the beginning, so farre forth that they determined that he should first breake the matter in a sermon at Pauls crosse, in which he should (by the au-thoritie of his preaching) incline the people to the protectors ghostlie purpose. But now was all the labor and studie in the deuise of some conuenient pretext, for which the people should be content to depose the prince, and accept the protector for king. In which di-uerse things they deuised. But the chiefe thing & the weightiest of all that inuention rested in this, that they should alledge bastardie, either in king Edward himselfe, or in his children, or both. So that he should seme disabled to inherit the crowne, by the duke of Yorke, and the prince by him.

To late bastardie in king Edward, sounded open-lie to the rebuke of the protectors owne mother, which was mother to them both; for in that point could be no other color, but to pretend that his owne mother was an adulteresse, which notwithstanding, to further this purpose he letted not. But neuerthelesse he though men spared in that point to speake all the truth, for feare of his displeasure. But the other point concerning the bastardie that they deuised to furnize in king Edwards children, that would he should be openlie declared and inforced to the vttermoſt. The colour and pretext whereof cannot be well perceiued, but if we firſt repeat you ſome things long before done about king Edwards marriage.

Dame Elizabeth Greie.

After that king Edward the fourth had deposed king Henrie the ſirſt, and was in peaceable poſſeſſion of the realme, determining himſelfe to marie (as it was met both for him ſelfe & the realme) he ſent ouer in ambaffage the erle of Warwicke, with other noble men in his companie to Spaine, to treat & conclude a marriage betwene h. Edward & the kings daughter of Spaine. In which thing the erle of Warwicke found the parties ſo toward & willing, that he ſpedily (according to his inſtructions without any difficultie) brought the matter to very good cōcluſion. Now happened it, that in the meane ſeaſon there came to make a ſute by petition to the king dame Elizabeth Greie, which was after his quene, at that time a widow, borne of noble blood, by hir mother, duches of Bedford, per ſhe married the lord Woodville, hir father.

Wherby it, this dame Elizabeth hir ſelfe, being in ſeruiſe with quene Margaret, wiſe unto king Henrie the ſirſt, was married unto one [John] Greie an eſquier, whome king Henrie made knight vpon the field that he had on [Barnet heath by ſaint Albons] againſt king Edward. But little while inioined he that knightſhip: for he was at the ſame field ſlaine. After which done, and the erle of Warwicke, being in his ambaffage about the afore remembred marriage, this poore ladie made humble ſute vnto the king, that ſhe might be reſtored vnto ſuch ſmall lands as hir late huſband had giuen hir in iointure. Whome when the king beheld, and heard hir ſpeake, as ſhe was both faire and of a goodlie ſauor, moderate of ſtature, well made, and verie wiſe: he not onelie pittied hir, but alſo wored in amoured of hir. And taking hir afterward ſecretlie aſide, began to enter in talking more familiarlie. Whose appetite when ſhe perceiued, ſhe vertuouſlie denied him.

But that did ſhe ſo wiſelie, and with ſo good manner, and words ſo well ſet, that ſhe rather kindled his deſire than quenched it. And ſinallie, after manie a moſting, much wooing, and many great promiſes, ſhe well eſpieng the kings affection toward hir ſo greatly increased, that the turk ſomewhat the more boldlie ſaie hir mind, as to him whoſe hart ſhe perceiued more ſeruentlie ſet, than to fall off for a word. And in concluſion, ſhe ſhelued him plaine, that as ſhe wiſd hir ſelfe too ſimple to be his wiſe, ſo thought ſhe hir ſelfe too good to be his concubine. The king much maruelling at hir conſtancie (as he that had not been wont elſewhere to be ſo ſtricklie ſaid naie) ſo much eſteemed hir continencie and chaſtitie, that he ſet hir vertue in the ſteed of poſſeſſion and riches: and thus taking counſell of his deſire, determined in all poſſible haſt to marie hir.

Now after he was thus appointed, and had betwene them twaine inſured hir: then aſked he counſell of his other friends, and that in ſuch manner, as they might then perceiue it beted not greatlie to ſay naie. Notwithſtanding the duches of Yorke his mother was ſo fore moued therewith, that ſhe diſſuaded the marriage as much as ſhe poſſible might; alledging that it was his honour, profit, and ſuerie alſo, to marie in a noble progenie out of his realme, wherupon depended great ſtrength to his eſtate, by the aſſinitie and great poſſibilitie of increaſe of his poſſeſſion. And that he could not well otherwiſe doe, ſeing that the erle of Warwicke had ſo farre moued alreadie: which were not likelie to take it well, if all his dotage were in ſuch wiſe fruſtrate, and his appointment deluded. And ſhe ſaid alſo, that it was not princelie to marie his owne ſubiect, no great occaſion leading thereunto, no poſſeſſions, or other commodities depending thereupon; but onlie as it were a rich man that would marie his maid, onelie for a little wanton dotage vpon hir perſon.

In which marriage manie mo commend the maidens fortune, than the maiſters wiſedome. And yet therein (ſhe ſaid) was more honeſtie than honour in this marriage. For ſomuch as there is betwene no merchant and his owne maid ſo great difference, as betwene the king and this widow. In whoſe perſon, albeit there was nothing to be miſliked; yet was there (ſhe ſaid) nothing ſo excellent, but that it might be found in diuerſe other that were more metlie (quoth ſhe) for your eſtate, and maidens alſo; whereas the onelie widowhead of Elizabeth Greie, though ſhe were in all other things conuenient for you, ſhould yet ſuffice (as me ſeemeth) to reſtaine you from hir marriage, ſith it is an unſittin thing, and a verie blemiſh and high diſparagement to the ſacred maieltie of a prince, that ought as nigh to approach prieltſhod in cleannelle as he doth in dignitie, to be deſiled with bigamie in his firſt marriage.

The king, when his mother had ſaid, made hir answer, part in earneſt, part in plaie merlic, as he that wiſt himſelfe out of hir rule. And albeit he would gladlie that ſhe ſhould take it well, yet was at a point in his owne mind, to keepe ſhe it well or otherwiſe. Wherby it ſomewhat to ſatiſſie hir, he ſaid, that albeit marriage (being a ſpirituall thing) ought rather to be made for the reſpect of God, where his grace inclineth the parties to loue together, as he truſted it was in his, than for the regard of anie tempoꝛall aduantage: yet neuertheleſſe, him ſeemed that this marriage, euen woꝛldlie conſidered, was not vnpoſſible. For he reckoned the amitie of no earthlie nation ſo neceſſarie for him, as the frendſhip of his owne, which he thought likelie to beare him ſo much the more hartie ſauour, in that he diſcained not to marie with one of his owne land.

And yet if outward aliance were thought ſo requiſite, he would find the means to enter therein, much better by other of his kin, where all the parties could be contented, than to marie himſelfe whome he ſhould happlie neuer loue; and for the poſſibilitie of more poſſeſſions, leaſe the fruit and pleaſure of this that he had alreadie. For ſmall pleaſure taketh a man of all that euer he hath beſide, if he be wored againſt his appetite. And I doubt not (quoth he) but there be (as ye ſay) other, that be in euerie point comparable with hir. And therefore I let not them that like them to wed them. So more is it reaſon, that it miſlike anie man, that I marie where it liketh me. And I am ſure that my couſine of Warwicke neither loueth me ſo little, to grudge at that I loue; nor is ſo vnreaſonable, to loke that I ſhould in choiſe of a wiſe, rather be ruled by his eie, than by mine owne: as though I were a ward that were bound to marie by the appointment of a gardian.

I would not be a king with that condition, to forſeare mine owne libertie in choiſe of mine owne marriage. As for poſſibilitie of more inheritance by new aſſinitie in ſtrange lands, is oft the occaſion of more trouble than profit. And we haue alreadie title by that means vnto ſo much, as ſufficieth to get and keepe well in one mans daies. That ſhe is a widow, and hath alreadie children; by Gods bleſſed ladie, I am a bachelor, and haue ſome too, and ſo ech of vs hath a proſe that neither of vs is like to be barren. And therefore (madame) I praie you be content, I truſt in God ſhe ſhall bring forth a yong prince that ſhall pleaſe you. And as for the bigamie, let the biſhop handle hardlie laie it in my waite when I come to take orders. For I understod it is forbidden a priest, but I neuer wist it yet, that it was forbidden a prince. [This spake he as alluding to the libertie of princes, whose liue standeth oftentimes for law, and their opinion for reason, according to the saying of the poet;

tunc omnia iure tenebatur,

Compterus rex esse.]

The duchess with these words nothing appeased, and seeing the king so set thereon, that she could not pull him backe, so highlie she disdaind it, that under pretext of hir dutie to Godward, she deuisd to disturbe this marriage, and rather to helpe that he should marrie one dame Elizabeth Lucie, whom the king had also not long before gotten with child. Wherefore the kings mother openlie obiected against his marriage, as it were in discharge of hir conscience, that the king was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucie and hir husband before God. By reason of which words, such ob-10 facle was made in the matter, that either the bishops durst not, or the king would not proceed to the solemnization of this wedding, till these same were clearlie purged, and the truth well and openlie testified. Whereupon dame Elizabeth Lucie was then sent for.

And albeit that she was by the kings mother and manie other put in good comfort, to affirme that she was ensured unto the king: yet when she was solemnlie sworn to saie the truth, she confessed that they were neuer ensured. Whobest she said his grace spake so louing words vnto hir, that she berelie hoped he would haue married hir. And that if it had not bene for such kind words, she would neuer haue thewed such kindnesse to him, to let him so kindly get hir with child. This examination solemnlie taken, when it was cleerlie perceiued, that there was none impediment: the king with great feast and honorable solemnitie married dame Elizabeth Lucie, and hir crowned queene that was his enemies wife, and manie times had prated full hartlie for his losse, in which God loued hir better than to grant hir hir bounce.

But when the earle of Marlowe understod of this marriage, he toke it so highlie that his ambassage was beludged, that for verie anger and disdain he (at his returning) assembled a great puissance against the king, and came so fast vpon him per he could be able to resist, that he was faine to void the realme, and fle into Holland for succor, where he remained for the space of two yeares, leaving his new wife at Westminster in sanctuary, where she was deliuered of Edward the prince, of whome we before haue spoken. In which meane time the earle of Marlowe toke out of prison, and set vp againe king Henrie the first, who was before by king Edward deposed, and that much that by the power of the erle of Marlowe, which was a wise man, and a courageous warriour, and of such strength, that for his lands, his alliance, and fauor with all people, that he made kings and put downe kings almost at his pleasure, and not impossible to haue attained it himselfe, if he had not reckoned it a greater thing to make a king than to be a king.

But nothing lasteth alwaie: for in conclusion, king Edward returned, and with much lesse number than he had at Barnet on the Easterdaie field, slue the earle of Marlowe, with manie other great estates of that partie, & so stably attained the crowne againe, that he peaceably enioied it vntill his deing daie: and in sundry light left it, that it could not be lost but by the discord of his verie friends, or falshood of his seined friends. I haue rehearsed this businesse about this marriage somewhat the more at length, because it might thereby the better appeare, vpon how slippes a ground the protector builded his colour, by which he pretended king Edwards children to be bastards. But that inuention, simple as it was, it li-10 ked them to whome it sufficed to haue somewhat to saie, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger profe than themselves list to make.

Now then (as I began to shew you) it was by the protector and his counsell concluded, that this doctor Shau should in a sermon at Pauls crosse sig-10 nifie to the people, that neither king Edward him- selfe, nor the duke of Clarence, were lawfullie begotten, nor were not the verie children of the duke of Porke, but gotten vnlawfullie by other persons, in adulterie, of the duchess their mother. And that also dame Elizabeth Lucie was verelie the wife of king Edward, and so the prince and all his children bastards, that were begotten vpon the queene. Accord-20 ing to this deuise doctor Shau the sundaie after, at Pauls crosse in a great audience (as alwaie assembled great number to his preaching) he toke for his theme; Spuria vitilamina non agent radices altas, that is to saie; Bastard slippes shall neuer take deepe root.

Thereupon when he had shewed the great grace that God giueth, and secretlie infused in right generation after the lawes of matrimonie, then declared he, that commonlie those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parents were (for the more part) unhappie, which were gotten in 30 base, and speciallie in adulterie. Of which, though some, by the ignorance of the world and the truth hid from knowledge, inherited for the season other mens lands, yet God alwaie so prouideth, that it continueth not in their blood long: but the truth comming to light, the rightfull inheritors be restored, and the bastard slippes pulled vper it can be rooted deape. And so he did laie for the profe and confirmation of this sentence certaine insamples taken out of the old testament, and other ancient histories.

Then began he to descend into the praise of the lord 40 Richard late duke of Porke, calling him father to the lord protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the crowne, to whome it was (after the death of king Henrie the first) intalled by authoritie of parliament. Then shewed he that his verie right heire of his bodie lawfullie begotten was onelie the lord protector. For he declared then, that king Edward was neuer lawfullie married vnto the queene, but was before God husband vnto dame Elizabeth Lucie, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither king Edward himselfe, nor the duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the household, were reckoned verie suerlie for the children of the noble duke, as those that by their fauours more resembled other knowne men than him. From whose vertuous conditions he said also that the late king Edward was far off.

But the lord protector he said, the verie noble prince, the speciall paterne of knightlie prowesse, as well in all princelie behauior, as in the lineaments and fauour of his visage, represented the verie face of the noble duke his father. This is, quoth he, the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his visage, the sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likenesse of that noble duke.

Now was it before deuised, that in the speaking of these words, the protector should haue comen in among the people to the sermon ward, to the end that those words meeting with his presence, might haue 60 ben taken among the hearers, as though the Holie ghost had put them in the preachers mouth, & should haue moued the people euen there to cry; King Richard, king Richard: that it might haue bene after said, that he was speciallie chosen by God, and in maner by miracle. But this denie qualified, either by the protectors negligence, or the preachers ouermuch diligence.

Richard commended by the preacher.

For while the protector found by the waie tarding least he should preuent those words, and the doctor fearing that he should come yet his sermon could come to those words, halsted his matter the retro, he was come to them and past them, and entred into other matters yet the protector came. Whome when he beheld comming, he suddenlie left the matter with which he was in hand, and without ante deduction thereunto, out of all order and out of all frame, began to repeat those words againe: This is the verie noble prince, the speciall patrone of knightlie prowesse, which as well in all princelie behauior, as in the lineaments & fauor of his visage, representeth the verie face of the noble duke of Burke his father: this is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his visage, the sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likenesse of the noble duke, whose remembrance can neuer die while he liueth.

Note & course of Gods iudgement.

While these words were in speaking, the protector accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, went through the people into the place where the doctors commonlie staid in the vpper storie, where he staid to hearken the sermon. But the people were so farre from crying; Richard, that they stood as they had bene turned into stones, for wonder of this shamefull sermon. After which once cryed, the preacher gat him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept him out of sight like an owle. And when he once asked one that had bene his old friend that the people talked of him, all were it that his owne conscience well shewed him that they talked no good; yet when the tother answered him, that there was in euery mans mouth spoken of him much shame, it so strake him to the heart, that within few daies after he withered and consumed awaie [for verie thought and inward paine, procured by irrecouerable cares, whose nature is noted by obseruation of their effects: 40

Attendant vigilis corpus miserabile curat.

Then on the tuesday following this sermon, there came to the Guildhall in London the duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diuerse lords and knights mo than hapilie knew the message that they brought. And there in the east end of the hall, where the maior kepeth the Duffings, the maior and all the aldermen being assembled about him, all the commons of the citie gathered before them. After silence commanded vpon great paine in the protectors name: the duke stood vp, and (as he was neither vnclearned, and of nature maruelouslie well spoken) he said vnto the people with a cleare and loud voice in this maner of wise.

The duke of Buckinghams oration to the assemblie of the maior, aldermen, and commoners.

Friends, for the zeale and heartie fauour that we beare you, we be comen to breake vnto you of a matter right great and weightie, and no lesse weightie than pleasing to God, and profitable to all the realme: nor to no part of the realme more profitable, than to you the citizens of this noble citie. For whie, that thing that we wote well ye haue long time lacked, and sore longed for, that ye would haue giuen great good for, that ye would haue gone farre to fetch, that thing we be come hither to bring you without your labour, paine, cost, aduenture or ieopardie. What thing is that? Certes the suertie of your owne bodies, the quiet of your wiues and your daughters, the safegard of your goods: of all which things in times past ye stood euermore in doubt. For who was there of you all, that would reckon himselfe lord of his own goods among so manie greus & traps as was set therfore, among so much pulling and polling, among so manie taxes and tallages, of which there was neuer end, & oftentimes no need? Or if anie were, it rather grew of riot, and unreasonable wast, than anie necessarie or honourable charge.

So that there was daile pilled fro god men and honest, great substance of goods, to be lashed out among bntyffits, so far forth, that siffraies sufficed not, nor anie vsmall names of knowne taxes: but vnder an easie name of beneuolence and good will, the commissioners so much of euerie man toke as no man could with his good will haue giuen. As though that name of beneuolence had signified, that euerie man should paie, not what himselfe of his owne good will list to grant, but what the king of his good will list to take. Which neuer asked little, but euerie thing was hawled aboue the measure, & increments turned into fines, fines into ransoms, small trespasses into misprison, misprison into treason. Whereof (I thinke) no man looketh that we should remember you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, that was for a word spoken in half cruellie beheaded, by the misconstruing of the laws of this realme, for the princes pleasure.

With no lesse honour to Harkam these chiefe iustice, that left [the benefit & dignitie] of his office, rather than he would assent to the dishonestie of those, that either for feare or flatterie gaue that iudgement. What Cooke, your owne worshipfull neighbour, alderman and maior of this noble citie, who is of you so either negligent that he knoweth not, or so forgetfull that he remembreth not, or so hard hearted that he pittieeth not that worshipfull mans losse: What speake we of losse: His better spoile and vnderferued destruction, onelie for that it hapned those to fauour him whome the prince fauoured not. We need not (I suppose) to rehearse of these anie mo by name, sith there be (I doubt not) manie here present, that either in themselves or in their nigh friends haue knowne, as well their goods as their persons greatlie endangered, either by feigned quarrels, or small matters aggravated with heinous names. And also there was no crime so great, of which there could lache a pretext.

For sith the king, preuenting the time of this inheritance, attained the crowne by battell: it sufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treason, to haue bene of killed or alliance, next familiaritie, or legier acquaintance with anie of those that were at a time time the kings enemies, which was at one time and other more than halfe the reime. Thus were neither your goods in suertie, and yet they brought your bodies in ieopardie, beside the common aduenture of open warre, which albeit that it is euer the will and occasion of much mischæfe, yet is it neuer so mischæuous, as where any people fall at distance among themselves; nor in none earthlie nation so deadlie and so pestilent, as when it hapneth among vs, and among vs neuer so long continued dissention, nor so manie batels in that season, nor so cruell and so deadlie fought, as was in that kings daies that dead is, God forgive it his soule.

In whose time, and by whose occasion, what about the getting of the garland, keeping it, lesing and winning againe, it hath cost moze English blood, than hath twice the winning of France. In which inward war among our selues, hath bene so great effusion of the ancient noble blood of this realme, that scarcele the halfe remaineth, to the great infæbling of this noble land, beside manie a good to done ranfacked and spoiled by them, that haue bene going to the field or comming from thence. And peace long after not much surer than war. So that no time was therein, which rich men for their monie, and great men for their lands, or some other for some feare, or some displeasure were not out of perill. For whom trusted he that mistrusted his owne brother: Whome spared he that killed his owne brother: Or who could perferlie loue him, if his owne brother could not?

What maner of folke he most fauoured we shall for his honour spare to speake of. Howbeit this mote you well all, that who so was best, bare alwaie least rule; & moze sute was in his daies to Shores wife, a vile and an abhominable strumpet, than to all the lords in England: except vnto those that made hir their proctor. Which simple woman was well named & honest, till the king for his wanton lust and sinfull affection bereft hir from hir husband, a right honest substantiall yong man among you. And in that point, which in good faith I am sorie to speake of, sauing that it is in baine to keepe in counsell that thing that all men know, the kings greedie appetite was insatiable, and euerie where ouer all the realme intollerable.

For no woman was there anie where, yong or old, rich or poore, whome he set his eie vpon, in whome he anie thing liked, either person or fauour, speech, pale, or countenance, but without anie feare of God, or respect of his honour, murmur or grudge of the world, he would importunelie pursue his appetite, and haue hir, to the great destruction of manie a good woman, and great dolor to their husbands, and their other friends, which being honest people of them selues, so much regard the cleannesse of their house, the chastitie of their wiues, and their children, that they were leauer to lese all that they had beside, than to haue such a villanie done them. And all were it that with this and other importable dealing, the realme was in euerie part annoied: yet speciallie ye here the citizens of this noble citie, as well for that amongest you is most plentie of all such things as minister matter to such iniuries as for that you were nexrest at hand, sith that nere here abouts was commonlie his most abiding.

And yet be ye the people, to whome he had as singular cause well and kindlie to intreat, as anie part of his realme; not onelie for that the prince (by this noble citie, as his speciall chamber, & the speciall well renowned citie of this realme) much honourable fame receiueth among all other nations: but also for that ye (not without your great cost, & sundrie perils & ieopardies in all his warres) bare euen your speciall fauor to his part. Which your kind minds bozne to the house of Yorke, sith he hath nothing worthilie acquitted, there is of that house that now by Gods grace better shall: which thing to shew you is the whole summe and effect of this our present errand. It shall not (I wot well) need that I rehearse you againe, that ye haue already heard of him that can better tell it, and of whome I am sure ye will better beleue it. And reason is that it so be.

I am not so proud, to looke therefore that ye should reckon my words of as great authority as the preachers of the word of God, namelie a man so cunning and so wise, that no man better woteth what he should saie, and thereto so good and bertuous, that he would not saie the thing which he wist he should not saie, in the pulpit namelie, into the which no honest man cometh to lie. Which honorable preacher, ye well remember, substantiallie declared vnto you at Paules crosse, on sundaie last passed, the right & title that the most excellent prince Richard duke of Gloucester, now protector of this realme, hath vnto the crowne and kingdome of the same. For as the worshipfull man groundlie made open vnto you, the children of king Edward the fourth were neuer lawfullie begotten, forsomuch as the king (leauing his verie wife dame Elizabeth Lucie) was neuer lawfullie married vnto the quene their mother, whose blood, sauing that he set his voluptuous pleasure before his honor, was full vnmetlie to be matched with his; and the mingling of whose bloods together, hath bene the effusion of a great part of the noble blood of this realme.

Whetherby it may well seme the marriage not well made, of which there is so much mischæfe growne. For lacke of which lawfull coupling, & also of other things which the said worshipfull doctor rather signified than fullie explaned, & which things shall not be spoken for me, as the thing wherein euerie man forbereth to say that he knoweth eth in auoiding displeasure of my noble lord protector, bearing (as nature requirerh) a filiall reuerence to the duchesse his mother. For these causes (I say) before remembred, that is to wit, for lacke of other issue lawfullie of the late noble prince Richard duke of Yorke, to whose roiall blood the crowne of England and of France is by the high authoritie of parlement intailed, the right and title of the same is by the iust course of inheritance (according to the comon lawes of the land) deuolued & comen vnto the most excellent prince the lord protector, as to the verie lawfullie begotten sonne of the foreremembred noble duke of Yorke.

He directeth his speech to the communalte of the citie.

Which thing well considered, and the great knightlie prowesse pondered, with manifold vertues, which in his noble person singularlie abound; the nobles and commons also of this realme, and speciallie of the north part, not willing anie bastard blood to haue the rule of the land, nor the abusions before in the same used anie longer to continue, haue condescended and fullie determined, to make humble petition to the most puissant prince the lord protector, that it maie like his grace (at our humble request) to take vpon him the guiding and gouernance of this realme, to the wealth and increase of the same, according to his verie right and iust title. Which thing I wrote it well, he will be loth to take vpon him, as he whose wisdom well perceiueth the labor and studie both of mind and bodie, that come therewith, to whomsoever so will occupie the roome, as I dare say he will, if he take it. Which roome I warne you well is no childes office. And that the great wise man well perceiued, when he said: Veregno cuius rex puer est: Who is that realme that hath a child to their king.

The dignitie
and office of king full of care & studie.

Wherefore so much the more cause haue we to thanke God, that this noble personage, which is for rightlie intituled therunto, is of so sad age, & thereto so great wisdom iointed with so great experience, which albeit he will be loth (as I haue said) to take it vpon him, yet shall he to our petition in that behalfe more gracioullie incline, if ye the worshipfull citizens of this the chiefe citie of this realme, ioine with vs the nobles in our said request. Which for your owne weale (we doubt not) but ye will: and nathelesse I heartilie pray you so to do, whereby you shall do great profit to all this realme beside, in choosing them so good a king, and vnto your selues speciall commoditie, to whom his maiestie shall euer after beare so much the more tender fauor, in how much he shall perceiue you the more prone and beneuolentlie minded toward his election. Wherin dere friends what mind you haue, we require you plainlie to shew vs.

When the duke had said, and looked that the people, whom he hoped that the maior had framed before, should after this proposition made, haue cried: King Richard, king Richard: all was hush and mute, and not one word answered thereto. Wherewith the duke was maruellouslie abashed, and taking the maior nearer to him, with other that were about him priue to that matter, said vnto them softly. What meaneth this, that the people be so still? Sir (quoth the maior) percase they perceiue you not well. What shall we mend (quoth he) if that will helpe. And by & by somewhat louder he reherfed to them the same matter againe in other order, and other words, so well and ornatie, and nathelesse so endentlie and plaine, with voice, gesture, and countenance so comelie, and so conuenient, that euerie man much marvelled that heard him, and thought that they neuer had in their liues heard so euill a tale so well told (inso much that he seemed as cunning an orator, as he, of whose poet spake to his high praise & commendation, saying:

Qualibet eloquio causa fit apta suo.)

But were it for wonder or feare, or that each looked that other should speake first: not one word was there answered of all the people that stood before, but all was as still as the midnight, not so much as rowning amongst them, by which they might seme to commune that was best to do. When the maior saw this, he with other partners of that counsell drew about the duke, and said that the people had not bene accustomed there to be spoken vnto, but by the recorder, which is the mouth of the citie, and hapilie to him they will answer. With that the recorder, called Fitz William, a sad man, & an honest, which was so new come into that office, that he neuer had spoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to begin, notwithstanding therunto commanded by the maior, made reherfall to the commons of that the duke had twise reherfed to them himselfe.

But the recorder so tempered his tale, that he shewed euerie thing as the dukes words, and no part his owne. But all this noting no change made in the people, which alwaie after one stood as they had bene men amazed. Wherevpon the duke rowned vnto the maior, and said: This is a marvellous obstinate silence: and therewith he turned vnto the people againe with these words: Dere friends, we come to moue you to that thing, which peradventure we not so greatlie needed, but that the lords of this realme, and the commons of other parties might haue sufficed, saying that we such loue beare you, and so much set by you, that we would not gladlie do without you, that thing in which to be partners is your weale and honor, which (as it seemeth) either you see not, or weie not. Wherefore we requite you giue vs answer one way or other, whether you be minded, as all the nobles of the realme be, to haue this noble prince, now protector, to be your king or not.

At these words the people began to whisper amongst themselves secretly, that the voice was neither loud nor distinct, but as it were the sound of a swarime of bees, till at the last in the nether end of the hall, an ambushment of the dukes seruants and gaffardes, and other belonging to the protector, with some pretences of tidings and lads that thrust into the hall amongst the prease, began suddenlie at mens backs to crie out, as loud as their throates would giue: King Richard, king Richard: and threw vp their caps in token of ioy. And they that stood before, cast backe their heads marrelling therof, but nothing they said. Now when the duke and the maior saw this maner, they wisse it turned it to their purpose, and said it was a goodlie crie, & a ioyfull, to heare euerie man with one voice, no man saying naie.

Wherefore friends (quoth the duke) sith we perceiue it is all your whole minds to haue this noble man for your king (whereof we shall make his grace so effectuell report, that we doubt not but it shall redound vnto your great weale and commoditie) we require require ye, that ye to morrow go with vs, and we with you vnto his noble grace, to make our humble request vnto him in maner before remembred. And therewith the lordes came downe, and the companie dissolved and departed, the more part all sad: some with glad semblance that were not verie mettrie, and some of those that came thither with the duke not able to dissemble their sorow, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolor of their hearts burst out of their eyes.

The metior

protector.

Then on the morrow after, the maior with all the aldermen, and chiefe commoners of the citie, in their best maner appareled, assembling themselves togither, resorted vnto Salnards castell, where the protector laye. To which place repaired also (according to their appointment) the duke of Buckingham, and diuers noble men with him, beside manie knights and other gentlemen. And thereupon the duke sent word vnto the lord protector, of the being there of a great and honourable companie, to moue a great matter vnto his grace. Whereupon the protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if he first knewe some part of their errand, as though he doubted and partlie mistrusted the cunning of such a number vnto him so suddenlie, without anie warning or knowledge, whether they came for good or harme.

When the duke, when he had shewed this to the maior and other, that they might thereby see how little the protector looked for this matter, they sent vnto him by the messenger such louing message againe, and therewith so humble besought him, to vouchsafe that they might resort to his presence to propose their intent, of which they would vnto none other person anie part disclose; that at the last he came forth of his chamber, and yet not downe vnto them, but stood above in a gallerie ouer them, where they might see him, and speake to him, as though he would not yet come to nere them till he wist what they ment. And therupon the duke of Buckingham first made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and licence them to propose vnto his grace the intent of their comming, without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst not be bold to moue him of that matter.

In which albeit they ment as much honor to his grace, as wealth to all the realme beside, yet were they not sure how his grace would take it, whome they would in no wise offend. When the protector (as he was verie gentle of himselfe, and also longed sore to wit what they ment) gaue him leaue to propose what him liked, verelie trusting (for the good mind that he bare them all) none of them anie thing would intend vnto himward, wherewith he ought to be graued. When the duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then waied he bold to shew him their intent and purpose, with all the causes mouing them therunto (as ye before haue heard) and finally to beseech his grace, that it would like him, of his accustomed goodnesse and zeale vnto the realme, now with his eye of pitie to behold the long continued distresse and decaye of the same, and to set his gracious hands to redresse and amendment thereof.

All which he might well do, by taking vpon him the crowne and gouernance of this realme, according to his right and title lawfullie descended vnto him, and to the laud of God, profit of the land, & vnto his noble grace so much the more honour, and lesse paine, in that, that neuer prince reigned vpon anie people, that were so glad to liue vnder his obeisance, as the people of this realme vnder his. When the protector had heard the proposition, he looked verie strangelie thereat, and answered: that all were it that he part-lie knewe the things by them alledged to be true; yet such entire loue he bare vnto king Edward and his children, that so much more regarded his honour in other realmes about, than the crowne of anie one of which he was neuer desirous, that he could not find in his hart in this point to incline to their desire. For in all other nations, where the truth were not well knowne, it should peraduenture be thought, that it were his owne ambitious mind and deuise, to depose the prince, and take himselfe the crowne.

With which infamie he would not haue his honour stained for anie crowne, in which he had euer perceiued much more labour and paine, than pleasure to him that so would vse it, as he that would not, were not worthy to haue it. Notwithstanding, he not onlie pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and hartie fauour they bare him, praising them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the prince, vnder whom he was, and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counsell (as farre as should like the king to vse him) he would do his uttermost deuoir to set the realme in good state, which was already in this little while of his protectorship (the praise giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before occasion of the contrarie, and of new intended to be, were now partlie by god policie, & partlie more by Gods speciall prouidence, than mans prouision, repressed.

Upon this answer giuen, the duke by the protectors licence, a little roliued aswell with other noble men about him, as with the maior and recorder of London. And after that (vpon like pardon desired & obtained) he shewed aloud vnto the protector, that for a finall conclusion, that the realme was appointed to Edwards line should not anie longer reigne vpon them, both for that they had so farre gone, that it was now no suertie to retreat, as for that they thought it for the weale brinnerfall to take that waie, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore, if it would like his grace to take the crowne vpon him, they would humble beseech him thereunto. If he would giue them a resolute answer to the contrarie, which they would be loth to heare, then must they needs seeke and should not faile to find some other noble man that would. These words much moued the protector, which else (as euerie man may weel) would neuer of likelihood haue inclined therevnto.

But when he sawe there was none other waie, but that either he must take it, or else he and his both go from it, he said vnto the lordes and commons: With we perceiue well that all the realme is so set, wherof we be verie soie, that they will not suffer in any wise king Edwards line to gouerne them, whom no man earthlye can gouerne against their willes; & we well also perceiue, that no man is there, to whome the crowne can by iust title apperteine, as to our selues, as verie right heire lawfullie begotten of the bodie of our most deere father Richard late duke of Yorke, to which title is now ioined your election, the nobles and commons of this realme, which we of all titles possible take for the most effectual: we be content and a græ sauourable to incline to your petition and request, and (according to the same) here we take vpon vs the roiall estate, preheminance and kingdome of the two noble realmes, England and France: the one from this daie forthward by vs and our helres to rule, gouerne, and defend; the other by Gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe and subdue, and establish for ener in due obedience vnto this realme of England, the aduancement wherof we neuer aske of God longer to liue than we intend to procure.

With this there was a great shout, crying: King Richard, king Richard. And then the lordes went vp to the

This that is here betwene this marke & this marke (*) was not written by maiſter More in this hiſtorie written by him in Engliſh, but is tranſlated out of this hiſtorie which he wrote in Latine.

The next daie the protector with a great traine went to Weſtmiſter hall, & there when he had placed himſelfe in the court of the kings bench, declared to the audience, that he would take vpon him the crowne in that place there, where the king himſelfe ſitteth and miniſteth the law, becauſe he conſidered that it was the chiefeſt dutie of a king to miniſter the lawes. Then with a pleaſant oration as he could, he went about to win vnto him the nobles, the merchants, the artificers, and in conſequence all kind of men, but eſpeciallie the lawiers of this realme. And finally, to the intent that no man ſhould hate him for feare, and that his deceitfull clemencie might get him the good will of the people, when he had declared the diſcommodities of diſcord, & the comodities of concord & vnitie, he made an open proclamation, that he did put out of his mind all enimities, and that he there did openlie pardon all offences committed againſt him.

And to the intent that he might ſhew a proſe thereof, he commanded that one Fog, whom he had long deadlie hated, ſhould be brought then before him, who being brought out of the ſanctuarie (for thither had he fled for feare of him) in the ſight of the people, he took him by the hand. Which thing the common people reſoiſed at, and praized, but wiſe men took it for a banetic. In his returne homeward, whom ſo euer he met, he ſaluted. For a mind that knoweth it ſelfe guiltie,

When he had begun his reigne in the moneth of June, after this mockiſh election, then was he crowned king in the verie ſame moneth. And that ſolemmitie was furniſhed, for the moſt part, with the ſelfe ſame prouiſion that was appointed for the coronation of his nephew. solicite mentes speque metlique pauent.]

The fourth daie of Iulie he came to the Tower by water with his wife, and the fift daie he created Thomas lord Howard duke of Norfolk, and sir Thomas Howard his sonne he created earle of Surrie, and William lord Berkeleye was then created erle of Nottingham, and Francis lord Louell was then made vicount Louell, and the king his chamberleine, and the lord Stanleie was deliuered out of ward, for feare of his sonne the lord Strange, which was then in Lancashire, gathering men (as men said) and the said lord was made steward of the king his household: likewise the archbishop of Yorke was deliuered, but Poriton bishop of Elye was committed to the duke of Buckingham to keepe in ward, which sent him to his manour of Breckinocke in Wales, from whence he escaped to king Richard his confusion.

The same night the king made seuentene knights of the Bath, whose names insue: Sir Edmund the duke of Suffolke's sonne, sir George Greie, the earle of Kent's sonne, sir William, the lord Zouches sonne, sir Henrie Aburgauennie, sir Christopher Willoughbie, sir William Berkeleye, sir Henrie Babington, sir Thomas Arundell, sir Thomas Bologne, sir Cernels of Clifton, sir William Saie, sir Edmund Bedingfield, sir William Cnderbie, sir Thomas Lokenoz, sir Thomas of Urmun, sir John Boloue, sir William Berkeleye. The next daie, being the fift daie of Iulie, the king rode through the cite of London toward Westminister with great pompe, being accompanied with these dukes, earles, lords, and knights, whose names follow. Edward prince of Wales, the king's onelie sonne. Dukes: the duke of Norfolk, the duke of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke. Earles: the earle of Northumberland, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Kent, the earle of Surrie, the earle of Wiltshire, the earle of Huntington, the earle of Nottingham, the earle of Warwick, the earle of Lincoln. Knights: sir James Sirell, sir William Kneuet, sir Thomas Aborow, sir William Stanleie, sir William Aparre, sir George Browne, sir Robert Middleton, sir John Denningham, sir Nicholas Latimer, sir Thomas Montgomerie, sir Thomas Delamer, sir Gilbert Debnam, sir Terrie Kobsart, sir William Brandon, sir John Sauch, sir Henrie Wentford, sir Edward Stanleie, sir Henrie Sentmount, sir William Deng, sir Thomas Bowser, sir Henrie Winkesfeld, sir Thomas Worleie, sir John Sentlow, sir Charles of Pilkington, sir James Harrington, sir John Ayleie, sir Thomas Berkeleye, sir Richard Becham, sir William Hopton, sir Thomas Persie, sir Robert Dammocke, sir John Cheinie, sir Richard Ludlow, sir John Clorington, sir William Sands, sir Richard Dupleie, sir William Sentlow, sir Thomaswaights, sir Edmund of Dupleie, sir Rafe Ashyton, sir Richard Charlington, sir Thomas Greie, sir Philip Berkeleye, sir Robert Harrington, sir Thomas Greffleie, sir Richard Harecourt, sir William Poris, sir Thomas Selenger, sir Richard Hodelsen, sir John Contas, sir William Stoner, sir Philip Courtneie, sir William Gascogne, sir Richard Amadison, sir Roger Fines, sir George Clare, sir

On the morow, being the first daie of Iulie, the king with quene Anne his wife, came doliue out of the White hall into the great hall at Westminister, and went directie into the kings Bench. And from thence, the king and the quene going upon rase cloth barefoote, went vnto saint Edwards shrine, and all his nobilitie going with him, euerie lord in his degre. And first went the trumpets, and then the heralds of armes in their rich coats, & next followed the crosse with a solemne procession, the priests having fine surplises and graie amisses upon them. The abbats and bishops mitred and in rich copes, & euerie of them caried their crosciers in their hands. The bishop of Rochester bare the crosse before the cardinall. Then followed the earle of Huntington bearing a paire of gilt spures, signifying knightshood. Then followed the earle of Bedford bearing saint Edwards staffe for a relike.

After them came the earle of Northumberland bare-headed, with the pointlesse sword naked in his hand, which signified mercie. The lord Stanleie bare the mace of the constablenesship. The earle of Kent bare the second sword on the right hand of the king naked, with a point, which signified iustice vnto the temporaltie. The lord Louell bare the third sword on the left hand with a point, which signified iustice to the cleargie. The duke of Suffolke followed with the scepter in his hand, which signified peace. The earle of Lincoln bare the ball and crosse, which signified a monarchie. The erle of Surrie bare the fourth sword before the king in a rich scabbard, and that is called the sword of estate. Then went thre together, in the middell went Carter king & t armes in his rich cote: and on his left hand went the maior of London, bearing a mace: and on his right hand went the gentleman vsher of the priue chamber. Then followed the duke of Norfolk, bearing the kings crowne betwene his hands.

Then followed king Richard in his robes of purple velvet, and ouer his head a canopie, borne by foure barons of the cinque ports. And on euerie side of the king there went one bishop, that is to saie, the bishop of Bath, and the bishop of Durham. Then followed the duke of Buckingham bearing the kings traine, with a white staffe in his hand, signifying the office of the high steward of England. Then there followed a great number of earles and barons before the quene. And then came the earle of Huntington, who bare the quenes scepter, and the vicount Lisle bearing the rod with the doue. And the earle of Wiltshire bare the quenes crowne. Then followed quene Anne daughter to Richard earle of Warwick in robes like to the king, betwene two bishops, and a canopie ouer hir head borne by the barons of the ports. On hir head a rich coronet set with stones and pearle.

After hir followed the countesse of Richmond heire to the duke of Summerfet, which bare by the quenes traine. After followed the duchesse of Suffolke and Norfolk, with countesses, baronesses, ladies, and manie faire gentlewomen. In this order they passed through the palace, and entered the abbey at the west end; and so came to their seats of estate. And after diuerse songs solemnelie song, they both ascended to the high altar, and were shifed from their robes, and had diuerse places open from the middle middle upward, in which places they were annointed. Then both the king and the queene changed them into cloth of gold, and ascended to their seats, where the cardinal of Cantuarburie, & other bishops them crowned according to the custome of the realme, giving him the scepter in the left hand, & the ball with the croffe in the right hand; and the queene had the scepter in hir right hand, and the rod with the dove in hir left hand.

On euerie side of the king stood a duke, and before him stood the earle of Surrie with the sword in his hands. And on euerie side of the queene standing a bishop, & a lady kneeling. The cardinal song masse, and after par, the king and the queene descended, and before the high altar they were both houseled, with one host diuided betwene them. After masse finished, they both offered at saint Edward his shrine, and there the king left the crowne of saint Edward, and put on his owne crowne. And so in order as they came, they departed to Westminster hall; and so to their chambers for a season: during which time the duke of Norfolk came into the hall, his horse trapped to the ground in cloth of gold, as high marshall, and hoised the hall. About foure of the clocke, the king and queene entered the hall, and the king sat in the middle, and the queene on the left hand of the table, and on euerie side of hir stood a countesse, holding a cloth of pleasance, when the list to drinke.

And on the right hand of the king sat the bishop of Cantuarburie. The ladies sat all on one side, in the middle of the hall. And at the table against them sat the chancellor, and all the lords. At the table next the cupbord, sat the maior of London; and at the table behind the lords, sat the barons of the port: and at the other tables sat noble and worshipfull personages. When all persons were set, the duke of Norfolk the earle marshall, the earle of Surrie, constable for that daie, the lord Stanlie lord steward, sir William Hopton treasurer, & sir Thomas Persie controller, came in and serued the king solemnly, with one dish of gold, and an other of silver, and the queene all in gilt vessel, and the bishop all in silver.

king Richard.

At the second course came into the hall sir Robert Dinmoke the kings champion, making proclamation, that whosoever would saie, that king Richard was not lawfull king, he would fight with him at the bitterance, and thereto downe his gantlet, and then all the hall cried, King Richard. And so he did in three parts of the hall, and then one brought him a cup of wine couered, and when he had drunke, he cast out the drinke, and departed with the cup. After that, the heralds cried a largesse thysse in the hall, and so went vp to their stage. At the end of dinner, the maior of London serued the king & queene with swete wine, and had of each of them a cup of gold, with a couer of gold. And by that time that all was done, it was darke night. And so the king returned to his chamber, and euerie man to his lodging.

A gale presented of justice and equitie.

When this feast was thus finished, the king sent home all the lords into their countries that would depart, except the lord Stanlie, whom he retained, till he heard what his sonne the lord Strange went about. And to such as went home, he gaue streight charge and commandement, to see their countries well ordered, and that no wrong nor extortion should be done to his subiects. And thus he taught other to execute iustice and equitie, the contrarie whereof he daily exercised. He also with great rewards giuen to the Northemen, which he sent for to his coronation, sent them home to their countrie with great thanks: whereof diuerse of them (as they be all of nature verie greedy of authoritie, & speciallie when they thinke to haue any comfort or fauour) toke on them to highlie, and wrought such miseries, that the king was faine to ride thither in his first yeare, and to put some in execution, and staie the countrie, or else no small mischiefe had ensued.

Now tell there mischiefs thicke. And as the thing euill gotten is neuer well kept, though all the time of his reigne neuer ceased there cruell death and slaughter, till his owne destruction ended it. But as he finished his time with the best death and the most righteous, that is to wit, his owne; so began he with the most pitious and wicked, I meane the lamentable murder of his innocent nephews, the young king and his tender brother: whose death and small fortune hath nathelesse comen to farre in question, that some remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his daies destroyed or no. Not for that onlie that Perkin Warbecke by manie folks malice, and mo folks folie, so long space abusing the world, was as well with princes as the poorer people reputed and taken for the younger of these two; but for that also that all things were in late daies so couertly demeaned, one thing pretended, and another meant.

Insomuch that there was nothing so plaine and openlie proued, but that yet for the common custome of close and couert dealing, men had it euer inwardlie suspect; as manie well counterfained it well make the true mistrusted. Holobert, concerning the opinion, with the occasions mouing either partie, we shall haue place more at large to intreat, if hereafter happen to write the time of the late noble prince of famous memorie king Henrie the seauenth, or percase that historie of Perkin in anie compendious processe by it selfe. But in the meane time, for this present matter, I shall rehearse you the dolorous end of those babes, not after euerie waie that I haue heard, but after that waie that I haue so heard by such men and by such meanes, as me thinketh it were hard but it should be true.

King Richard after his coronation, taking his waie to Gloucester to visite (in his new honour) the towne of which he bare the name of his old, deuiled (as he rode) to fulfill the thing which he before had intended. And forsomuch as his mind gaue him, that his nephews liuing, men would not reckon that he could haue right to the realme: he thought therefore without delaie to rid them, as though the killing of his kinsmen could amend his cause, and make him a kindlie king. Whereupon he sent one John Grene, (whom he speciallie trusted) vnto sir Robert Wakerberie, constable of the Towre, with a letter and credence also, that the same sir Robert should in anie wise put the two children to death.

This John Grene did his errand vnto Wakerberie, kneeling before our ladie in the Towre. Who plainlie answered, that he would neuer put them to death to die therefore. With which answer John Grene returning, recounted the same to king Richard at Warwicke yet in his waie. Wherewith he toke such displeasure & thought, that the same night he said vnto a secret page of his: Ah! whom shall a man trust? Those that I haue brought by my selfe, those that I had wrent would most luerlie serue me, euen those faile me, and at my commandement will do nothing for me. Sir (quoth his page) there lieth one on your pallet without, that I dare well saie, to do your grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that he would refuse. Meaning this by sir James Tirrell, which was a man of right goodlie personage, and for natures gifts was thie to haue serued a much better prince, if he had well serued God, and by grace obtained as much truth and good will as he had strength and wit.

The man had an high heart, & fore longed byward, not rising yet so fast as he had hoped, being hindered & kept under by the meanes of sir Richard Wakerberie.

and sir William Catesbie, which longing for, no more parteners of the princes favour, and namely, not for him, whose pride they twise would beare no more, kept him by secret drifts out of all secret trust, which thing this page well had marked and knowne. Wherefore this occasion offered, of verie spectall friendship he took his time to put him forward, and by such wise do him good, that all the enemies he had (except the deuill) could neuer haue done him so much hurt. For upon this pages words king Richard arose (for this communication had he sitting at the draught, a convenient carpet for such a counsell) and came out into the pallet chamber, on which he found in bed sir James and sir Thomas Tirrells, of person like, and brethren of blood, but nothing of kin in conditions.

Then said the king merilie to them; What sirs, be ye in bed so late? And calling by sir James, brake to him secretlie his mind in this mischeuous matter. In which he found him nothing strange. Wherefore on the morow he sent him to Brakenberie with a letter, by which he was commanded to deliuer sir James all the keys of the Tower for one night, to the end he might there accomplish the kings pleasure, in such things as he had giuen him commandement. After which letter deliuered, & the keys receiued, sir James appointed the night next ensuing to destroy them, dressing before and preparing the means. The prince (as sone as the protector left that name, and took himselfe as king) had it the woe vnto him that he should not reigne, but his vnkle should haue the crowne. At which word the prince fore abashed, began to sigh, and said: Alas, I would my vnkle would let me haue my life yet, though I lose my kingdom.

Then he that told him the tale, vsed him with good words, and put him in the best comfort he could. But forthwith was the prince and his brother both shut vp, & all other remoued from them, onelic one (called Blacke Will, or William Slaughter) excepted, set to serue them and see them sure. After which time the prince neuer tied his points, nor ought rought of himselfe; but with that pong babe his brother, linged with thought and heavinesse, vntill this traitorous death deliuered them of that wretchednesse. For sir James Tirrell desired, that they should be murdered in their beds. To the execution whereof, he appointed Miles Forrest, one of the foure that kept them, a fellow fleshy in murder before time. To him he ioined one John Dighton his owne horsekeeper, a big, broad, square, and strong kinaue.

Then all the other being remoued from them, this Miles Forrest, and John Dighton, about midnight (the felix children lying in their beds) came into the chamber, & suddenly lapping them vp among the clothes, so to be wrappd them and intangled them, hopping downe by force the fether-bed and pillows hard vnto their mouths, that within a while, smothered and strid, their breath failing, they gaue vp to God their innocent soules into the ioies of heauen, leaving to the tormentors their bodies dead in the bed. Which after that the wretches perceived, first by the struggling with the paines of death, and after long lying still, to be thoroughlie dead, they laid their bodies naked out vpon the bed, and fetched sir James to see them; which vpon the sight of them caused those murderers to burie them at the staire foot, meetlie downe in the ground, vnder a great heape of stones.

Then rode sir James in great hast to king Richard, and shewed him all the manner of the murder; who gaue him great thanks, and (as some saie) there made him knight. But he allowed not (as I haue heard) the burying in so vile a corner, saieing, that he would haue them buried in a better place, because they were a kings souldiers. As the honorable coucourage of a king. Whereupon they saie, that a priest of sir Robert Brakenberies took vp the bodies againe, and secretlie interred them in such place, as by the occasion of his death, which onelic knew it, could neuer since come to light. Verie truth is it, and well knowne, that at such time as sir James Tirrell was in the Tower, for treason committed against the most famous prince king Henrie the seauenth, both Dighton and he were examined, and confessed the murder in manner aboue written: but whether the bodies were remoued, they could nothing tell.

And thus (as I haue learned of them that much knew, and little cause had to lie) were these two noble princes, these innocent tender children, borne of most roiall blood, brought vp in great wealth, likelic long to liue, reigne, and rule in the realme, by traitorous tyrannie taken, deppriued of their estate, shortly shut vp in prison, and priuillie slaine and murdered, their bodies cast God wot where, by the cruell ambition of their vnaturall vnkle & his despitous tormentors. Which things on euerie part well pondered, God neuer gaue this world a more notable example, neither in what vnseruic standeth this worldlie weale; or what mischefe worketh the proud enterprise of an high heart; or finally, what wretched end insueth such despitous crueltie.

For first, to begin with the ministers, Miles Forrest, at St. Martins peccemeale rotted a while. Dighton in deed yet walketh on aliuie in god possibilitie to be hanged yer he die. But sir James Tirrell died at the Tower hill beheaded for treason. King Richard himselfe, as ye shall hereafter heare, slaine in the field, backed and helmed of his enemies hands, harried on horse-backe dead, his haire in despite sone and tugged like a curie dog; and the mischefe that he took, with in lesse than thre yeares of the mischefe that he did; and yet all (in the meane time) spent in much paine & trouble outward, much feare, angulsh and sorrow within. For I haue heard by credible report of such as were secret with his chamberleine, that after this abhominable deed done, he neuer had a quiet mind. Than the which there can be no greater torment. For a guiltie conscience inwardlie accusing and bearing witness against an offender, is such a plague and punishment, as hell it selfe (with all the fiends therein) can not afford one of greater horror & affliction; the poet implieng no lesse in this tristichon:

Pena autem vehementis, ac multo sauior illis, Quis & Ceditus grauis inuenit & Radamanthus, Nocte dique sumusque in pectore testem.

Perf. sat. 3.

He neuer thought himselfe sure. Where he went abroad, his eyes whirled about, his bodie priuillie fenced, his hand euer vpon his dagger, his countenance and manner like one alwaies readie to strike againe, he took ill rest a nights, late long waking and musing, sore wearied with care and watch, rather stumbered than slept, troubled with fearefull dreames, suddenly sometime start vp, leapt out of his bed, and ran about the chamber; so was his restlesse heart continually tossed and tumbled with the tedious impression and stonie remembrance of his abhominable deed. Now had he outward no long time in rest. For hereupon, sone after began the conspiracie, or rather god confederation, betwene the duke of Buckingham and many other gentlemen against him. The occasion whereupon the king and the duke fell out, is of diuerse folke in diuerse wise pretended.

This duke (as I haue for certeine bene informed) as sone as the duke of Gloucester, vpon the death of king Edward, came to Paske, & there had solemn funeral service for king Edward, sent thither in the most secret wise he could, one Perfall his trustie servant, who came to John Ward a chamberer of like secret trust with the duke of Gloucester, desiring that in the most close and covert manner, he might be admitted to the presence and speech of his master. And the duke of Gloucester advertised of his desire, caused him in the dead of the night (after all other folke asleeped) to be brought unto him in his secret chamber, where Derfall (after his masters recommendations) shewed him that he had secret sent him to shew him, that in this new world he would take such part as he would, & wait upon him with a thousand good fellows, if need were.

The messenger sent backe with thanks, & some secret instruction of the protectors mind, yet met him againe with further message from the duke his master within few daies after at Spotingham: whither the protector from Pope with manie gentlemen of the north countrie, to the number of six hundred horse, was come on his waie to London-ward, & after secret meeting and communication had, Edmondes departed. Whereupon at Southampton, the duke met with the protector himselfe with three hundred horse, and from thence still continued with him partner of all his deuises; till that after his coronation, they departed (as it seemed) verie great friends at Glocester. From whence as soon as the duke came home, he so lightlie turned from him, and so highlie conspired against him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And suerlie, the occasion of their variance is of diuerse men diuerselie reported.

Causes of the duke of Buckingham and king Richard falling out.

Some haue I heard say, that the duke a little before his coronation, among other things, required of the protector the duke of Herefords lands, to the which he pretended himselfe iust inheritor. And so much as the title, which he claimed by inheritance, was somewhat interlaced with the title to the crowne by the line of king Henrie before depeined, the protector conceiued such indignation, that he reieted the dukes request with manie spitefull and minatorie words. Which so wounded his heart with hatred and mistrust, that he neuer after could indure to looke aright on king Richard, but euer feared his owne life; so far forth, that when the protector rode through London toward his coronation, he feined himselfe sicke, because he would not ride with him. And the other also taking it in euill part, sent him word to rise, and come to the, or he would make him be carried. Whereupon he rode on with euill will, and that notwithstanding on the morow, rose from the feast, feining himselfe sicke, and king Richard said it was done in hatred and despise of him.

The duke of Buckingham and king Richard mistrust each other.

And they said, that euer after continuallie, each of them liued in such hatred and distrust of other, that the duke verelie looked to haue bene murdered at Glocester: from which nathelesse, he in faire manner departed. But suerlie some right secret at that daie denie this: and manie right wise men thinke it vnlikelie (the deepe dissembling nature of both those men considered, and what need in that graine world the protector had of the duke, and in what perill the duke stood, if he fell once in suspicion of the tyrant) that either the protector would giue the duke occasion of displeasure, or the duke the protector occasion of mistrust. And verelie, men thinke, that if king Richard had anye such opinion conceiued, he would neuer haue suffered him to escape his hands. Verie truth it is, the duke was an high minded man, and euill could beare the glorie of another, so that I haue heard of some that say they saw it, that the duke, at such time as the crowne was first set upon the protectors head, his eye could not abide the sight thereof, but turned his head another way.

But men say, that he was of truth not well at ease, and that both to king Richard well knowne, and not euill taken; no; anie demand of the dukes uncourteouslie reieted; but he both with great gifts, and high behests, in most louing and trustie manner departed at Glocester. But soon after his coming home to Wrecknocke, hauing there in his custodie by the commandement of king Richard doctor Sponton bishop of Elie, who (as ye before heard) was taken in the counsell at the Tower, waied with him familiar, whose wisdom abused his pride to his owne delinerance, and the dukes destruction. The bishop was a man of great naturall wit, verie well learned, and honozable in behauior, lacking no wise waies to win fauour. He had bene fast upon the part of king Henrie, while that part was in localty; and nathelesse left it not, no; forsake it in too, but fled the realme with the queene & the prince, while king Edward had the king in prison, neuer came home, but to the field.

Doctor Sponton bishop of Elie, a wise paganus in place.

After which loss, and that part utterlie subdued, the other (for his fast faith and wisdom) not onlie was content to receiue him, but also wooed him to come, and had him from thenceforth both in secret trust, and verie speciall fauour, which he nothing deceiued. For he being (as ye haue heard) after king Edwards death, first taken by the tyrant for his truth to the king, found the meane to set this duke in his top, joined gentlemen together in the aid of king Henrie, deuising first the marriage betwene him & king Edwards daughter: by which his faith he declared the god seruice to both his masters at once, with infinit benefit to the realme by the continuation of those two blouds in one, whose severall titles had long disquieted the land, he fled the realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world; till the noble prince king Henrie the seventh gat him home againe, made him archbishop of Canterburie, and chancellor of England, whereunto the pope ioined the honour of cardinal. Thus liuing manie daies in as much honoz as one man might well wish, ended them so godlie, that his death with Gods mercie well changed his life.

The high nature of king Edward.

This man therefore (as I was about to tell you) by the long & often alternate profe, as well of prosperitie as aduersite fortune, had gotten by great experience (the verie mother and mistress of wisdom) a deepe insight in politike worldlie drifts. Whereby perceiuing now this duke glad to commune with him, sed him with faire words, and manie pleasant praises. And perceiuing by the process of their communications, the dukes pride now and then belking out a little breath of enuie toward the glorie of the king, and thereby feeling him easie to fall out if the matter were well handle: he craftilie sought the waies to picke him forthward, taking alwaies the occasion of his coming, and so keeping himselfe so close within his bounds, that he rather seemed to follow him, than to lead him. For when the duke first began to praise and boast the king, and shew how much profit the realme should take by his reigne: my lord Sponton answered thus.

Bishop Sponton some subtil understanding of the duke.

Suerlie, my lord, follie were it for me to lie, for if I would sweare the contrarie, your lordship would not (I weene) beleue; but that if the world would haue gone as I would haue wished, king Henries sonne had had the crowne, and not king Edward. But after that God had ordered him to leaue it, and king Edward to reigne, I was neuer so mad that I would with a dead man strue against the quicke. So was I to king Edward a faithfull chapleine, & glad would haue bene that his child had succeeded him. Howbeit, if the secret iudgment of God haue otherwise provided, I purpose not to spurne against a picke, no; labour to set by that God pulleth downe. And as for the late protector and now king, And euen there he left, saing that he had alreadye medled to much much with the world, and would from that daie medle with his booke and his beads, and no further.

Then longed the duke soze to heare what he would haue said, bicause he ended with the king, and there so suddenly stopped, and exhorted him so familiarlie betwene them twaine to be bold to saie whatsoeuer he thought; whereof he faithfullie promised there should neuer come hurt, and peradventure moze good than he would wene; and that himselte intended to vse his faithfull secret aduise & counsell, which (he said) was the onelie cause for which he procured the king to haue him in his custodie, where he might recheon himselte at home, and else had he bene put in the hands of them with whom he should not haue found the like fauour. The bishop right humbly thanked him, and said: In god faith my lord, I lone not to talke much of princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault: for so much as it shall not be taken as the partie ment it, but as it pleaseth the prince to construe it.

And euer I thinke on Aescops tale, that when the lion had proclaimed that (on paine of death) there should no horned beast abide in that wood: one that had in his forched a bunch of fleshy fled awate a great pace. The for that saw him run so fast, asked him whether he made all that hast: And he answered, In faith I neither wote, nor reche, so I were once hence, bicause of this proclamation made of horned beasts. What soles (quoth the for) thou maist abide well enough; the lion ment not by thee, for it is no horne that is in thine head. So marie (quoth he) that wote I well enough. But what and he call it an horne, where am I then? The duke laughed merilie at the tale, and said: My lord, I warrant you, neither the lion nor the boze shall pike anie matter at anie thing here spoken: for it shall neuer come nere their eare.

In god faith sir (said the bishop) if it did, the thing that I was about to say, taken as well as (afoze God) I ment it, could deserue but thanke: and yet taken as I wene it would, might happen to turne me to 40 to little good, and you to lesse. Then longed the duke yet much moze to wit what it was. Whereupon the bishop said: In god faith (my lord) as for the late protector, sith he is now king in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title; but for the weale of this realme, whereof his grace hath now the gouernance, and whereof I am my selfe one poze member, I was about to wisly, that to those good habillities whereof he hath already right manie, little needing 50 my praise, it might yet haue pleased God, for the better store, to haue giuen him some of such other excellent vertues, meet for the rule of a realme, as our Lord hath planted in the person of your grace: and there left againe.

The duke somewhat maruelling at his sudden pauses, as though they were but parentheses, with a high countenance said: My lord, I euidentlie perceiue, and no lesse note your often breathing, and sudden stopping in your communication; so that to my intelligence, your words neither come to anie direct or perfect sentence in conclusion, whereby either I might perceiue and haue knowledge, what your inward intent is now toward the king, or what affection you beare toward me. For the comparison of good qualities ascribed to vs both (for the which I my selfe acknowledge and recognise to haue none, nor loke for no praise of anie creature for the same) maketh me not a little to muse, thinking that you haue some other priuie imagination, by loue or by grudge, ingrauen and imprinted in your heart, which for feare you dare not, or for childish shamefastnesse you be ashamed to disclose and reueale; and speciallie to me, bring your friends, which on my honor do assure you, to be as secret in this case, as the deafe and dumbe person is to the finger, or the trex to the hunter.

The bishop being somewhat bolder, considering the dukes promise, but most of all animated and encouraged bicause he knew the duke desirous to be exalted and magnified; and also he perceived the inward hatred and priuie rancor which he bare toward king Richard: was now boldened to open his stomach euen to the verie bottome, intending thereby 10 to compass his owne destruction, and utterlie confound king Richard, and to depriue him of his dignitie royal; or else to set the duke so on fire with the desire of ambition, that he himselte might be safe and escape out of all danger and perill. Which thing he brought forthlie to conclusion, both to the kings destruction, and the dukes confusion; and to his owne safeguard, and finalle to his high promotion.

And so (as I said before) upon trust and confidence of the dukes promise, the bishop said: My singular 20 good lord, since the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces custodie, I may rather call it a libe- rall libertie, more than a streit imprisonment, in auoiding idlenesse, mother and nourisher of all vices, in reading bookes and ancient pamphlets I haue found this sentence written, that no man is bozne free, and in libertie of himselte onelie: for one part of dutie he oweth or should owe to his parents for his procreation, by a verie naturall instinct and filiall courtesie: another part to his friends and kindfolke; 30 for promise of blood and naturall amitie both euerie dutie challenge and demand: but the native countrie, in the which he tasted first the sweet aires of this pleasant and flattering world after his natiuitie, demandeth as a debt by a naturall bond, neither to be forgotten, nor yet to be put in oblivion.

Which saieing causeth me to consider in what case this realme my native countrie now standeth, and in what estate and assurance (before this time) it hath continued; what gouernour we now haue, and what ruler we might haue. For I plainelie perceiue the realme being in this case, must needs decaye, and be brought to vter confusion, and finall extermination. But one hope I haue incorporat in my breast, that is, 40 when I consider, and in my mind do diligentlie remember, and dailie behold your noble personage, your iustice, and indifferencie, your seruent zeale, and ardent loue toward your naturall countrie, and in like manner, the loue of your countrie toward you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and goodlie eloquence, which so much doth abound in the person of your grace, I must needs thinke this realme fortunate, yea twise more than fortunate, which hath such a prince in store, meet and apt to be a gouernour, in whose person (being indued with so manie princelie qualities) consisteth and resteth the verie vndoubted 50 similitude and image of true honour.

But on the other side, when I call to interioze the good qualities of the late protector, and now called king, so violated and subuerted by tyrannie, so changed and altered by vsurped authoritie, so clouded and shadowed by blind and insatiable ambition; yea, and so suddenlie (in manner by a metamorphosis) transformed from politike ciuilitie, to detestable tyrannie: I must needs saie, & iustlie affirme, that he is neither meet to be a king of so noble a realme, nor so famous a realme meet to be gouerned by such a tyrant [whose kingdome (if it were of moze amplenesse than it is) could not long continue; neither would the Lord suffer him in his bloodthirstines to abuse the holie and diuine estate of a prince by the cruell title of tyrannie. For such he will ouerthrow, yea he will bring most horrible slaughter vpon them, as it is prophesied:

Impius ad summum quamuis ascendat honores,

A pice quas cludes tempora seculi vident.

Ecce.

Was

Bishop Morton buildeth vpon the dukes ambition.

The duke of Buckingham highlie commended.

Dispraise of the lord protector or king in elie.

Was not his first enterprise to obtaine the crowne begun and incepted by the murdher of diuerse noble, valiant true, and vertuous personages? Wholte beginning to come to a mischeuous ending! Did he not secondarily proceed (contrarie to all lawes of honestie) shamefullie against his owne naturall mother, being a woman of much honour and moze vertue, declaring hir openlie to be a woman giuen to carnall affection, and dissolute liuing? Which thing if it had borne true, as it was not indeed, euerie good a naturall child would haue rather murthered at it, than haue blasfemed it abroad, and especiallie the being aliue. Declaring furthermore his two bethzen, and his two nephues to be bastards, and to be borne in adulterie: yet was he not with all this content.

After that he had obtained the garland, for the which he so long thirsted, he caused the two poore innocents his nephues, committed to him for especiall trust, to be murthered and shamefullie to be killed. The blood of which feeble and little babes, daile crieth to God from the earth for vengeance. Alas, my hart sobbeth, to remember this bloudie butcher, and cruell monster. What suertie shall be in this realme to anie person, either for life or goods vnder such a cruell pince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne blood, and then lesse the losse of others? And most especiallie (as oftentimes it chanceth) where a couctous or a cruell pince taketh suspicion, the smallest swarming that is possible (if the thing be misconstrued) may be the cause of the destruction of manie guiltlesse persons: and in especiall of noble and wealthie personages, hauing great possessions and riches: such a lord is Lucifer when he is entered into the hart of a proud pince, giuen to couctousnesse and crueltie.

But now my lord to conclude what I meane toward your noble person, I saie and asseme, if you loue God, your linage, or your natue countrie, you must your selfe take vpon you the crowne and imperiall diademe of this noble empire, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same (which so long hath flourished in fame and renowne) as also for the deliuerance of your naturall countremen, from the bondage and thralldome worse than the captiuitie of Egypt of so cruell a tyrant and arrogant oppressor. For thus I dare saie, if anie foren pince or potentate, yea the Turke himselfe would take vpon him the regiment here, and the crowne, the commons would rather aduise and obeye him, than to liue vnder such a bloudsucker and child-killer. But how much moze ioyfull and glad would they be to liue vnder your grace, whome they all knowe to be a ruler meet and conuenient for them, and they to be louing and obedient subiects, meet to liue vnder such a gouernour? Despise not, nor forsake not so manifest an occasion so longlie offered.

And if you your selfe, knowing the paine and trouble that apperteineth to the office of a king, or for any other consideration, will refuse to take vpon you the crowne and scepter of this realme: then I aduise you, by the faith that you owe to God, by your honour, and by your oath made to saint George, patrone of the noble order of the garter (whereof you be a companion) and by the loue and affection that you beare to your natue countrie, and the people of the same; to deuise some waie, how this realme (now being in miserie) may by your high discretion and princelie policie, be brought and reduced to some suertie and conuenient regiment, vnder some good gouernour by you to be appointed: for you are the verie patrone, the onelie helpe, refuge and comfort for the poore amazed and desolate commons of this realme.

For if you could either deuise to set vp againe the linage of Lancaster, or aduance the eldest daughter of king Edward to some high and puissant pince, not onelie the new crowned king shall small time into the glozie of his dignitie, but also all ciuill war should cease, all domesticall discord should cease, and peace, profit and quietnesse should be set forth and increased. When the bishop had thus ended his saying, the duke sighed, and spake not of a great while. Which soe abashed the bishop, and made him change colour. Which thing when the duke perceived, he said: I am not afraid my lord, all promises shall be kept, to morrow we will common more: let vs go to supper. So that night they communed no more, not a little to the disquieting of the bishop, which now was euen as desirous to know the dukes mind and intent, as the duke longed the daie before to know his opinion and meaning.

So the next daie, the duke sent for the bishop, and rehearsed to him in maner (so he was both witty and eloquent) all the communication had betwene them before, and so paused a while, and after a little season, putting off his bonnet, he said: O Lord God creator of all things, how much is this realme of England, and the people of the same, bounden unto thy goodnesse! For where we now be in veriation and trouble with great stormes oppressed, sailing and tossing in a desperate ship, without good maister or gouernour: yet by thy helpe good Lord I trust per long time passe, that we shall prouide for such a ruler, as shall be both to thy pleasure, and also to the securitie and safeguard of this noble realme.

And then he put on his bonnet, saying to the bishop: My lord of Glouc, whose true hart and sincere affection toward me at all times I haue euidentlie perceived and knowen, and now most of all in our last priue communication and secret dealing: I must needs in hart thinke, and with mouth confesse and saie, that you be a sure friend, a trylie counsellor, a vigilant foreser, a verie louer of your countrie, and a naturall countrieman: for which kindnes for my part, I most louinglie render to you my hartie thanks now with words, hereafter trusting to recompense and remunerate you with deys, if life and power shall serue.

And sith, at our last communication, you haue disclosed and opened the verie secrets and priuities of your stomach, touching the duke of Gloucester now usurper of the crowne; and also haue a little touched the aduancement of the two noble families of York and Lancaster: I shall likewise not onelie declare and manifest vnto you all my open acts, attempts, and doings, but also my priue intents, and secret cogitations. To the intent that as you haue vnbuckled the bouget of your priue meanings, and secret purposes to me: so shall all my claudie workings, close deuises, and secret imaginations be (as clare as the sunne) reuealed, opened, and made lightsome to you.

And to begin, I declare, that when king Edward was deceased, to whome I thought my selfe little or nothing beholden (although we two had married two sisters) because he neither promoted, nor preferred me, as I thought I was worthe, and had deserved, neither fauoured nor regarded me, according to my degree and birth (for suertie I had by him little authority, and lesse rule, and in effect nothing at all: which caused me lesse to fauour his children, because I found small humanitie, or none in their parent) I then began to studie, and with ripe deliberation to ponder and consider, how and in what manner this realme should be ruled and gouerned. And first I remembered an old prouerbe touching of memorie, that often tueth the realme where children rule, and women gouerne.

This old abage so sanke and settled in my head, that I thought it a great error, and extreame mischiefe Suspicion in a pince how mischeuous it is.

The bishop aduise the duke to release the realme by some deuise from the present ciuill state.

I am credite betwene the bishop and the duke.

The duke vnbuckled the bouget of his priue meanings, and secret cogitations.

The duke complained of want of preferment in king Edward's reign.

chiefe to the whole realme, either to suffer the yong king to rule, or the queene his mother to be a gouernesse ouer him, considering that his brethren, and his first children (although they were not extract of high and noble linage) took more vpon them, and more exalted themselves, by reason of the queene, than did the kings brethren, or anye duke in his realme: which in conclusion turned to their confusion. Then I being perswaded with my selfe in this point, thought it necessarie both for the publike and profitable wealth of this realme, and also for mine owne commoditie and emolument, to take part with the duke of Gloucester; whom (I assure you) I thought to be as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without iniurie, as mercifull without crueltie; as now I know him perfectlie to be a dissembler without veritie, a tyrant without pitie, yea & worse than the tyrant Phalaris, destitute of all truth and clemencie.

*In this happy prince temperance
was thought.*

And so by my meanes, at the first councell holden at London, when he was most suspected of that thing that after happened (as you my lord know well enough) he was made protector and defender both of the king and of the realme, which authoritie once gotten, & the two children partly by policie brought under his gouernance, he being moued with that gnawing and couetous serpent desire to reigne, neuer recalled priuile to exhort and require, yea and sometimes with minatozie fearmes to perswade me and other lords, as well spirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon him the crowne, till the prince came to the age of foure and twentie yeares, and were able to gouerne the realme, as a ripe and sufficient king.

Which thing when he saw me somewhat sticke at, both for the strangenesse of the example (because no such president had bene seene) and also because we remembered that men once ascended to the highest tye of honour and authoritie, will not gladiely descend againe; he then brought in instruments, autentike doctors, proctors, and notaries of the law, with depositions of diuerse witnesses, testifying king Edwards children to be bastards. Which depositions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to be feined; and testified by persons with rewards vntreulie suborned. When the said depositions were before vs read and diligentlie heard, he stood vp bareheaded, saying: Well my lords, euen as I and you (sage and discret counsellors) would that my nephue should haue no wrong; so I praye you doe me nothing but right. For these witnesses & sayings of famous doctors being true, I am onelie the vndubitate heire to lord Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, aduoged to be the verie heire to the crowne of this realme by authoritie of parlement.

Which things so by learned men to vs for a vertie declared, caused me and other to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted prince and soueraigne lord. For well we knew that the duke of Clarence some, by reason of the atteindor of his father, was disabled to inherite; and also the duke himselfe was named to be a bastard, as I my selfe haue heard spoken, and that vpon great presumptions more times than once: so againe, by my aid and fauour, he of a protector was made a king, and of a subiect made a gouernor. At which time he promised me on his fidelitie (saying his hand in mine at Baintards castell) that the two yong princes should liue, and that he would so provide for them, and so mainteine them in honorable estate, that I and all the realme ought and should be content. But his words wanted weight, which is a foule discredit to a prince, to a pere, yea to a ystuat and meane common man, as testifieth this sentence:

For when he was once crowned king, and in full possession of the whole realme, he cast a way his old conditions as the adder doth his skin, verifieng the old proverbe; Honours change manners, as the parish priest remembreth that he was neuer parish clearche. For when I my selfe sued vnto him for my part of the earle of Herefords lands which his brother king Edward wrongfullie detained and withheld from me; and also required to haue the office of the high constableness of England, as diuerse of my noble ancestors before this time haue had, and in long descent continued: in this my first sute shewing his good mind toward me; he did not onelie first delate me, and afterward denaie me, but gaue me such vnkind words, with such taunts & rebawts, ye in manner cheeke and checkmate, to the vttermost profe of my patience: as though I had neuer furthered him, but hindered him; as though I had put him downe, and not set him vp.

Yet all these ingratitude and vnderferued vnkindneses I bare closelie, & suffered patientlie, and couertlie remembred, outwardlie dissembling that I inwardlie thought: and so with a painted countenance, I passed the last summer in his last companie, not without manie faire promises, but without anye good deeds. But when I was credible informed of the death of the two yong innocents, his owne naturall nephues contrarie to his faith and promise, to the which (God be my iudge) I neuer agreed, nor condescended; O Lord, how my beines panted, how my bodie trembled, and how my heart inwardlie grudged! inso much that I so abhorred the sight, and much more the companie of him, that I could no longer abide in his court, except I should be openlie reuenged: the end whereof was doubtful. And so I feined a cause to depart, and with a merrie countenance and a despightfull heart I toke my leaue public of him (he thinking nothing lesse than that I was displeased) and so returned to Beche Knoche to you.

But in that iournie (as I returned) whether it were by the inspiration of the Holie-ghost, or by melancholious disposition, I had diuerse and sundrie imaginations how to depriue this vnnaturall vnckle, and blondie butcher, from his roiall seat, and princelie dignitie. First I fantasied, that if I list to take vpon me the crowne, and imperiall scepter of the realme, now was the time propice and conuenient. For now was the waie made plaine, and the gate opened, and occasion giuen: which now neglected, should peradventure neuer take such effect and conclusion. For I saw he was vndermined of the lords temporall, abhorred and accursed of the lords spirituall, detested of all gentlemen, and despised of all the communaltie: so that I saw my chance as perfectlie as I saw mine owne image in a glasse, that there was no person (if I had bene greedy to attempt the enterprize) could nor should haue wone the ring, or got the gale before me. And on this point I rested in imagination so cretly with my selfe two daies at Tewkesburie.

From thence so iournieng, I mused and thought that it was not best nor conuenient to take vpon me as a conqueror. For then I knew that all men, and especiallie the nobilitie, would with all their power withstand me, both for rescuing of possessions and tennures, as also for subuerting of the whole estate, lawes and customes of the realme: such a power hath a conqueror, as you know well enough my lord. But at the last, in all this doubtful case there sprang a new branch out of my head, which fierlie I thought should haue brought forth faire flowers; but the sunne was so hot, that they turned to drie weeds. For I suddenlie remembred that the lord Edmund duke of Summerset my grandfather, was with king Henrie the first in the two and thre degrees, from John duke of Lancaster lawfullie begotten : so that I thought sure, my mother being eldest daughter to duke Edmund, that I was next heire to king Henrie the first of the house of Lancaster.

This title pleased well such as I made priuie of my counsell, but much more it encouraged my foolish desire, and eleuated my ambitious intent : insomuch that I clerelie iudged, and in mine owne mind was determinatlie resolu'd, that I was indubitate heire of the house of Lancaster, and thereupon concluded to make my first foundation, and erect my new building. But whether God so ordeined, or by fortune it so chanced, while I was in a maze either to conclude suddenlie on this title, & to set it open amongst the common people, or to keepe it secret a while, for the chance : as I rode betwene Worcester and Bridgenorth, I encountered with the ladie Margaret countesse of Richmond, now wife vnto the lord Stanley, which is the verie daughter and sole heire to lord John duke of Summerset, my grandfathers elder brother, which was as cleane out of my mind, as though I had neuer sene hir : so that she and hir sonne the earle of Richmond be both bulwokes and portuillace betwene me and the gate, to enter into the maiestie roiall and getting of the crowne.

Now when we had communed a little concerning hir sonne, as I shall shew you after, and were departed, she to our ladie of Worcester, and I to Shrewsburie : I then new changed, and in maner amazed, began to dispute with my selfe, little considering that thus my earnest title was turned to a fittell not so good as Christ Amen. Oftentimes I imagined whether were best to take vpon me, by election of the nobilitie and communalitie, which me thought easie to be done, the vsurper king thus being in hatred and abhorred of this whole realme : or to take it by power, which standeth in fortunes chance, and difficile to be attained and brought to passe. Thus tumbling and tossing in the waues of ambiguitie, betwene the stone and the sacrifice, I considered first the office, dutie, and paine of a king, which suerlie thinke I that no mortal man can iustlie and trulie obserue, except he be called, elected, and speciallie appointed by God as Isa. David, and diuerse other haue bene.

But further, I remembered that if I once toke on me the scepter, and the gouernance of the realme; that of two extreame enmities I was dallie sure, but of one trustie friend (which now a daies be gone a pilgrimage) I was neither assured nor crediblie ascertained; such is the world's mutation. For I manifestlie perceived, that the daughters of king Edward, and their allies and friends, which be no small number, being both for his sake much beloued, and also for the great iniurie & manifest tyrannie done to them by the new vsurper, much lamented and pittied, would neuer cease to barke if they cannot bite at the one side of me. Semblable, my cosine the earle of Richmond, his aids and kinnsfolks, which be not of little power, will suerlie attempt like a fierce grethound, either to bite or to pearle me on the other side. So that my life and rule should euer hang by a haire, neuer in quiet, but euer in doubt of death, or deposition.

And if the said two linages of York and Lancaster, which so long haue strided for the imperiall diadem, should isine in one against me, then were I suerlie mated, and the game gotten. Wherefore I haue clerelie determined, and with my selfe concluded, vnto relinquish all such fantastickall imaginations, concerning the obtaining of the crowne. But all such plagues, calamities and troubles, which I feared and suspected might haue chanced on me if I had taken the rule and regiment of this realme, I shall with a redemaine so make them rebound to

to our common enemie that calleth himselfe king, that the best stopper that he hath at tenice shall not well stop without a fault.

For (as I told you before) the countesse of Richmond in my returne from the new named king, meeting me in the high waie, praised me first for his sake, secondly for the love that I bare to my grandfather duke Humfrie, which was heres brother to hir father, to moue the king to be good to hir sonne Henrie earle of Richmond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne againe into England. And if it were his pleasure so to do, he promised that the earle hir sonne should marrie one of king Edwards daughters, at the appointment of the king, without anie thing to be taken or demanded for the said espousals, but onelie the kings fauour: which request I some ouerpasse, and gaue hir faire woordes, and so departed.

But after in my lodging, when I called to memorie with a deliberate studie, and did circumspectly ponder them, I stalle adiudged, that the holie ghost caused hir to moue a thing (the end whereof she could not consider) both for the securitie of the realme, as also for the preferment of hir child, and the destruction and final confussion of the common enemie king Richard. Which thing, she neither then thought (I am sure) as I by hir woordes could make coniecture, nor I my selfe cast not hir desire to be so profitable to the realme, as I now doe perceive. But such a Lord is God, that with a little sparkle he kindleth a great fire, and (to the admiration of the world) of impossibilities he maketh possibilities, of small beginnings mightie increasings, of drops great floods.

And so finally to declare to you the verie conclusion, to the which I am both bent and set, my mind is, and my power and purse shall helpe, that the earle of Richmond, verie heire of the house of Lancaster (in the quarrell of the which linage, both my father and grandfather lost their liues in battell) shall take to wife ladie Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Edward, by the which marriage both the houses of York and Lancaster may be ioined and vnitied in one, to the clere establishment of the title to the crowne of this noble realme. To which conclusion if the mothers of both parts, and especiallie the earle himselfe, and the ladie will agree : I doubt not but the byragging boie, which with his tusketh raseeth euery mans skin shall not onelie be brought to confusion (as he hath deserued) but that this empire shall euer be certeine of an vndubitate heire, & then shall all ciuill and intestine warre cease, which so long hath continued to the paring of manie mens crownes, and this realme shall be reduced againe to quietnesse, renowne and glorie.

This inuention of the duke manie men thought after, that it was more imagined for the inward hatred that he bare to king Richard, than for anie fauour that he bare to the earle of Richmond. But of such doubtful matter it is not best to iudge, for erring too farre from the mind and intent of the author. But whatsoeuer he intended, this deuise once opened to king Richard was the verie occasion, that he was rounded shorter by the whole head, without attainder or iudgement. When the duke had said, the bishop which fauoured euer the house of Lancaster, was wonderous tolfull, and much reioiced to heare this deuise. For now came the wind about euen as he would haue it, with all his imagination tended to this effect, to haue king Richard subdued, and to haue the lines of king Edward, and king Henrie the first againe raised and aduanced.

But lord how he reioiced, to thinke how that by this marriage the linages of York and Lancaster should be contained in one, to the verie steadfastnesse of

of the public wealth of this realme. And least the duke's courage should swage, or his mind should againe alter, as it did often before (as you may easilie perceiue by his owne tale) he thought to set vp all the failes that he had, to the intent that the ship of his pretended purpose might come shortlie to some sure port, and said to the duke: Appoynt, sith by Gods promise and your incomparable wisdom and pollicie, this noble contention is first moued, now is it conuenient, yea and necessarie, to consider what personages, and what friends we shall first make priuie of this high deuiſe and politike conclusion: [which is not rashlie & without aduiselement to be aduentured, for therein is danger, as the wise man saith: semper habet damnorum mentis temerarius ardor.]

By my truth, quoth the duke, we will begin with the ladie Richmond, the earles mother, which knoweth where he is, either in captiuitie, or at large in Britaine. For I heard saie, that the duke of Britaine restored him to libertie, immediatlie after the death of king Edward, by whose means he was restrained: sith you will begin that waie (said the bishop) I haue an old friend with the countesse, a man sober, secret, and well witted, called Reginald Bate; whose prudent pollicie I haue knowne to haue compassed things of great importance, for whom I shall secretly send, if it be your pleasure; and I doubt not but he will gladielie come and that with a good will. So with a little diligence the bishop wrote a letter to Reginald Bate, requiring him to come to Wexhamke with speed, for great and vrgent causes touching his mistresse: and no other thing was declared in the letter. So the messenger rode into Lancashire where Bate was with the countesse, and lord Thomas Stanlie his husband, and deliuered the letter: which when he had read, he toke it as a signe or presage of some good fortune to come.

Then he (with the messenger) came to the castell of Wexhamke, where the duke and the bishop declared what thing was deuised, both for to set the realme in a quiet steadfastnesse, as also for the high preferment of the earle of Richmond, sonne to his ladie and mistresse: willing hir first to compasse how to obtaine the good will of quene Elizabeth, and also of hir eldest daughter bearing the same name: and after secretly to send to hir sonne into Britaine, to declare what high honoz was prepared for him, if he would sweare to marrie the ladie Elizabeth as soon as he was king, and in roiall possession of the realme. Reginald Bate with a glad heart, forgetting nothing giuen to him in charge, in great hast and with good speed returned to the countesse his ladie and mistresse.

When Bate was departed, and this great doubt full befall once set abroach, the bishop thirsting for nothing more than for libertie: when he saw the duke pleasant and well minded toward him; he told the duke, that if he were in his Ile of Cle, he could make manie friends to further their enterprize: and if he were there and had but foure daies warning, he little regarded the malice of king Richard, his countrie was so strong. The duke knew well all this to be true, but yet loth he was that the bishop should depart: for he knew well, that as long as the bishop was with him, he was sure of politike aduise, sage counsell, and circumspect proceeding. And so he gaue the bishop faire words, saying, that he should shortlie depart, and that well accompanied for feare of enemies.

The Bishop being as witty as the duke was folle, did not tarry till the dukes companie were assembled, but secretly disguised, in a night departed (to the dukes great displeasure) and came to his Ie of Cle; where he found monie and friends; and so saile into Flanders, where he did the earle of Richmonds god seruice, and neuer returned againe, till the earle of Richmond (after being king) sent for him, and shortlie promoted him to the see of Canturburie. Thus the bishop wound himselfe from the duke when he had most need of his aid, for if he had taried still, the duke had not made so manie blabs of his counsell, nor put so much confidence in the Welshmen, nor yet so temerariouſlie set forward (without knowledge of his friends) as he did, which things were his sudden ouerthrowe (as they that knew it did report) [and might perhaps haue bene auoided by the bishops wisdom for the dukes sake, as his owne sith Qui sapit, ille potest alios sapisse docere.]

When Reginald Bate had declared his message and priuie instruction to the countesse of Richmond his mistresse, no maruell though she were iofull and glad, both of the good newes, and also for the obtaining of such a high friend in hir sonnes cause as the duke was. Wherefore she willing not to sleepe this matter, but to further it to the bittermost of hir power and abilitie, deuised a means how to bycake this matter to quene Elizabeth then being in sanctuary at Westminster. And thereupon she, hauing in hir familie at that time (for the preservation of hir health) a certaine Welshman called Lewes, learned in physicke, which for his grauitie and experience, was well knowne, and much esteemed amongst great estates of the realme, bake hir mind to him.

For with this Lewes she vſed sometime liberallie and familiarlie to talke, and now hauing oportunitie and occasion to expresse hir hart vnto him in this weightie matter, declared that the time was come that hir sonne should be ioined in marriage with ladie Elizabeth, daughter and heire to king Edward; and that king Richard being taken and reputed of all men for the common enemy of the realme, should out of all honoz & estate be deſected, & of his crowne and kingdome be clerelie spoiled and expelled: and required him to go to quene Elizabeth (with whom in his facultie he was of counsell) not as a messenger, but as one that came friendlie to visit and comforte hir, and (as time & place should require) to make hir priuie of this deuiſe; not as a thing concluded, but as a purpose by him imagined.

This physician did not long linger to accomplish hir desire, but with good diligence repaired to the quene, being still in the sanctuary at Westminster. And when he saw time propice and conuenient for his purpose, he said vnto hir: Madam, although my imagination be verie simple, and my deuiſe more folish; yet for the entier affection that I beare toward you and your children, I am so bold to vtter vnto you a secret and priuie conceit that I haue cast and compassed in my fantastick braine. When I well remembred and no lesse considered the great losse and damage that you haue sustained, by the death of your noble and louing husband; and the great dolour and sorow that you haue suffered and tollerated, by the cruell murder of your innocent children: I can no lesse do both of bounden duetie and christian charitie, than dailie to studie, and hourelie imagine, not onelie how to bring your hart to comfort and gladnesse, but also deuiſe how to reuenge the righteous quarell of you and your children on that bloudie bloudſupper, and cruell tyrant king Richard.

And first consider, what battell, what manslaughter, what mischance hath risen in this realme by the dissention betwene the two noble houses of Yorke & Lancaster. Which two families (as I haue contriued) if they may be ioined in one, I thinke, yea and doubt not, but your line shall be againe restored to the pristinate estate and degree; to your great ioy and comfort, and to the bitter confusion of your moztall fall enemie the vsurper king. You know verie well madame, that of the house of Lancaster, the earle of Richmond is next of blood, who is living, and a lustie young batcheler, and to the house of Yorke your daughters now are heires. If you could agree and inuent the meane how to couple your eldest daughter with the young earle of Richmond in matronie, no doubt but the vsurper of the realme should be shortly deposed, and your heire againe to his right restored.

When the queene had heard this friendlie motion (which was as farre from his thought, as the man that the rude people saie is in the mone) how his spirits reuiued, and how his heart leapt in his bodie for iote and gladnesse. And first giuing laud to almightie God, as the chiefe author of his comfort, se- condarily to maister Lewes, as the denier of the se- ged newes & tidings, the instantlie besought him, that as he had bene the first inuenter of so great an enterprise, so now he would not relinquish nor de- 10 fall to follow the same: requiring him further (be- cause he was appertaining to the countesse of Rich- mond mother to the erle Henrie) that he would with all diligent celeritie resort to him, then lodging in his husbands place, within the citie of London: and to declare on the queenes behalfe to the countesse, that all the friends and fauours of king Edward his hus- 20 band, should assist and take part with the earle of Richmond his sonne, so that he would take a corpo- rall oth after the kingdome obtained, to esponse and take to wife the ladie Elizabeth his daughter, or else ladie Cicilie, if the eldest daughter were not then living.

The queenes readinesse to set forward
this conclusion.

Maister Lewes with all dexteritie so sped his busi- nesse, that he made and concluded a final end and de- termination of this enterprise betwene the two mo- thers. And because he was a physician, and out of all suspicion and misdöeming, he was the common cur- 30 ror and daile messenger betwene them, aiding and setting forth the inuented conspircie against king Richard. So the ladie Margaret countesse of Rich- mond, brought into a good hope of the preferment of his sonne, made Reginald Briaie his most faithfull seruant, chiefe solicitor and priuie procuror, of this conspircie, giuing him in charge secretly to inuigle and attract such persons of nobilitie to ioine with him and take his part, as he knew to be ingenuous, faith- 40 full, diligent, and of activitie. This Reginald Briaie within few daies brought vnto his laire (first of all taking of euerie person a solemne oth to be true and secret) sir Giles Daubeneie, sir John Chesnie knight, Richard Silford, and Thomas Kame esquires, and diuers other. The countesse of Richmond was not so diligent for his part, but queene Elizabeth was as vigilant on the other side, and made friends, and ap- pointed counsellors to set forward and aduance his 50 businesse.

The countesse
of Richmond
bitterly the maister to Sir Silke his chap-laine, swearing him to be secret.

In the meane season, the countesse of Richmond tooke into his seruice Christopher Urswike, an honest 60 and wise priest, and (after an oth of him for to be se- cret taken and sworne) she bittred to him all his mind and counsell, aduising him the more confi- dence and truth, that he all his life had fauoured and taken part with king Henrie the first, and as a spect- all ielwell put to his seruice by sir Lewes his physici- an. So the mother, studious for the prosperitie of his son, appointed this Christopher Urswike to saile into Britaine to the earle of Richmond, and to de- 70 clare and reueale to him all pacts and agrements betwene him & the queene agreed and concluded. But suddenlie she remembryng that the duke of Buc- kingham was one of the first inuenter, and a secret founder of this enterprise, determined to send some personage of more estimation than his chaplaine.

Whereupon the elected for a messenger Hugh Con- 80 weie esquier, & sent him into Britaine with a great sum of monie to his sonne, giuing him in charge, to declare to the earle the great loue and especial fauor that the most part of the nobilitie of the realme bare toward him, the louing hearts & beneuolent minds which the whole commonaltie of their owne free will franklie offered, and liberallie exhibited to him, wil- ling and aduising him not to neglect so good an occa- 90 sion apparantlie offered; but with all speed and dili- gence, to addre and settle his mind & full intention how to returne home againe into England, where he was both wished and looked for: giuing him further monition and counsell, to take land and arrivall in the principallitie of Wales, where he should not doubt to find both aid, comfort and friends.

Richard Silford, least Hugh Conweie might fortune to be taken, or stopped at Plimmouth, where he intended to take his navigation, sent out of Kent 10 Thomas Kame with the same instructions: and both made such diligence, and had such wind and weather, the one by land from Calis, and the other by water from Plimmouth, that within lesse than an houre both arriued in the duke of Britains court, and spake with the earle of Richmond, which (from the death of king Edward) went at pleasure and libertie, and to him counted and manifested the cause and effect of their message and ambassage. When the earle had receiued this message (which was the more 20 pleasant, because it was vnlooked for) he rendered to Jesu his fauour, his most humble & heartie thanks, being in firme credence and beleefe, that such things as hee with busie mind and laborious intent had wished & desired, could neuer haue taken anie effect, without the helpe and preferment of almightie God.

And now being put in comfort of his long longing, he did communicate & speake to the duke of Britaine all his secrets, and priuie messages, which were to him declared; aduertising him that he was entered 40 into a sure and stedfast hope, to obtaine and get the crowne and kingdome of the realme of England, desiring him both of his good will and friendlie helpe toward the atchining of his offered enterprise, pro- mising him when he came to his intended purpose, to render to him againe equal kinnes, and condigne recompense. Although the duke of Britaine before that date, by Thomas Hutton ambassadour from king Richard, had both by monie and prayers bene 50 solicited and moued to put againe into safe custodie the earle of Richmond, he neuertheless promised faithfullie to aid him; and his promise hee trulie per- formed.

Whereupon the earle with all diligence sent into 60 England againe Hugh Conweie, and Thomas Kame, which should declare his comming hostile in- to England: to the intent that all things, which by counsell might be for his purpose provided, should be speedilie and diligentlie done; and that all things doubtfull, should of his friends be prudentlie fore- seene, in auoiding all engines or snares which king Richard had or might set in disurbance of his pur- 70 pose: and he in the meane season would make his abode still in Britaine, till all things necessarie for his iourne were prepared, and brought in a readinesse. In the meane season, the chieftains of the confurati- on in England began togither manie enterprises: some in conuenient fortresses put strong garrisons, some kept armed men priuillie, to the intent that when they should haue knowledge of the earles lan- 80 ding, they would begin to stir vp the war: other did secretlie moue and solicit the people to rise & make an insurrection: other (amongst whom John Goston bishop of Ely then being in Flanders was chiefe) by priuie letters and cloked messengers did stirre 85 and and moue to this new confuration, all such which they certenly knew to haue a rooted hatred, or to beare cankered malice toward king Richard and his proceedings.

Although this great enterprife were neuer so pishillie handled, and so secretlie amongst so circumspect persons treated, compassed and conueied; yet knowledge therof came to the eares of king Richard, who with the sudden chance was not a little moued and astonished. First, because he had no host readie prepared; secondlie, if he should raise an armie so suddenly, he knew not where to meet his enemies, or whither to go, or where to tarrie. Wherefore he determined to dissemble the matter, as though he knew nothing, till he had assembled his host; and in the meane season either by the rumour of the common people, or by the diligence of his espials to search out all the counsels, determinations, intents, and compasses of his close abuerfaries; or else by policie to intercept and take some person of the same confuration, considering that there is no more secret nor hid espiall, than that which lurketh in dissimulation of knowledge and intelligence, or is hidden in name and shadow of counterfeited humanitie and feigned kindnesse. But yet wisdom hath a deuise to auoid & shift off all such deceiuers, as the poet well saith:

And because he knew the duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head and aid of the confuration, hee thought it most necessarie to plucke him from that part, either by faire promises or open warre. Whereupon he addrest his louing letters to the duke, full of gentle words, & most friendlie speech; giuing further in charge to the messenger that caried the letter to promise the duke (in his behalfe) golden hilles, and silver riuers, and with all gentle and pleasant means to perswade and exhort the duke to come to the court. But the duke as wise as the king, mistrusting the faire flattering words, and the gaie promises to him so suddenlie without any cause offered, knowing the craftie calls of king Richards bow, which in diuerse affaires before time he had seene practised, required the king to pardon him, excusing himselfe that he was so diseased in his stomack, that scant he could either take refection or rest.

King Richard not being content with this excuse, would in no wise admit the same; but incontinent directed to the duke other letters, of a more rougher and haunter sort, not without talunting and biting tearmes, and checking words, commanding him (all excuses set apart) to repaire without anie delate to his rotall presence. The duke made to the messenger a determinate answer, that he would not come to his most tall enemy, whom he neither loued, nor favoured: and immediatlie prepared open warre against him, and perswaded all his complices and partakers, that euery man in his quarter, with all diligence should raise by people & make a commotion. And by this means almost in one moment Thomas marques Dorset came out of sanctuarie, where since the beginning of k. Richards daies he had continued, whose life by the onelie helpe of sir Thomas Louell was preserved from all danger & perill in this troublous world, gathered together a great band of men in Dorsetshire.

Sir Edward Courtenie, and Peter his brother bishop of Excester, raised an other armie in Devonshire and Cornewall. In Kent Richard Gilsford and other gentlemen collected a great companie of soldiers, and on milie began warre. But king Richard, who in the meane time had gotten together a great strength and puissance, thinking it not most for his part benefiteall, to disperse and diuide his great armie into small branches, and particularlie to persecute anie one of the confuration by himselfe, determined (all other things being set aside) with his whole puissance to set on the chiefe head, which was the duke of Buckingham. And so removing from London, he took his iournie toward Salisbury, to the intent that in his iournie he might set on the dukes armie, if he might know him in anie place incamped, or in order of battell arraied.

The king was scarce two daies iournie from Salisbury, when the duke of Buckingham accompanied with a great power of wild Welshmen, whom he (being a man of great courage and sharpe speech) in manner against their willes had rather thereto incited and compelled by lordlie and streit commandement, than by liberall wages and gentle demour, which thing was the verie occasion why they left him desolate, & cowardlie forsake him. The duke with all his power marched through the Forrest of Deane, intending to haue passed the riuer Senerne at Clocester, & there to haue ioined his armie with the Courtenies, and other westerne men of his confederacie and affinitie. Which if he had done, no doubt but king Richard had bene in great leopordie, either of priuation of his realme, or losse of his life, or both.

But see the chance. Before he could attaine to Senerne side, by force of continuall raine and moisture, the riuer rose so high that it ouerflowed all the countrie adioining, insomuch that men were drowned in their beds, and houses with the extreame violence were ouerturned, children were caried about the fields swimming in cradels, beasts were drowned on hilles. Which rage of water lasted continuallie ten daies, insomuch that in the countrie adioining they call it to this daie, The great water; or, the duke of Buckinghams great water. By this flood the passages were so closed, that neither the duke could come ouer Senerne to his adherents, nor they to him. During the which time, the Welshmen lingering idly, and without monie, bittels, or wages, suddenlie scattered and departed: and for all the dukes faire promises, threatnings, and inforcements, would in no wise either go further nor abide.

The duke (being thus left almost poss alone) was of necessitie compelled to flie, and in flight was with this sudden fortune maruellouslie dismayed: and being unpurueied what counsell he should take, and what waie he should follow, like a man in despaire, not knowing what to do, of verie trust & confidence conueied himselfe into the house of Hamfreie Banastier his seruant beside Shrewesburie, whom he had tenderlie brought up, and whom he aboue all men loued, fauoured, and trusted; now not doubting but that in his extreame necessitie he should find him faithfull, secret, and trustie, intending there couertlie to lurke, till either he might raise againe a new armie, or else shoulde to saile into Britaine to the earle of Richmond. [But alas (good duke) the meanes (by occasion of Gods prouidence, taking men out of their thicks of supposed safetie) failed him, and he fell infortunatlie into the hands of the coming boze, that tare him in peeces with his tuskes.]

Now when it was knowne to his adherents, which were redie to giue battell, that his host was scattered, and had left him almost alone, and was fled, & could not be found; they were suddenlie amazed & stricken with a sudden feare, that euery man like persons desperate shifted for himselfe & fled. Some went to sanctuarie, and to solitarie places; some fled by sea, whereof the most part within a few daies after arrived safelie in the duchie of Britaine. Among which number were these persons; Peter Courtenie bishop of Excester, and sir Edmund Courtenie his brother, by king Henrie the seventh after created earle of Devonshire; Thomas marquesse Dorset, John lord Welles,

The duke of Buckingham has power of wild welshmen (faicharted) to forsake him.

A foze flowe or high water doing much harme, called the duke of Buckinghams great water.

The dukes adherents & their powers dispersed,

Welles, sir John Bonchier, sir Edward Mowbray, a valiant man in armes, brother to quene Elizabeth, sir Robert Willoughbie, sir Giles Daubeneie, sir Thomas Arundell, sir John Cheinie and his two brethren, sir William Barklie, sir William Brandon, & Thomas his brother, sir Richard Cogecombe: all these for the most part being knights, John Hablowell, and Edward Poinings, a politike capteine.

At this verie season, John Hoxton bishop of Elie, and Christopher Urswike priest, and an other compaignie of noble men sojourned in Flanders; and by letters and messengers procured manie enemies against king Richard, which being a vigilant eye, and a quick remembrance, being newlie come to Salisbury, having perfect notice and knowledge how the duke was fled, and how his complices intended to passe out of the realme; first he sent men of warre to all the next ports and passages, to keepe streitlie the sea coast, so that no person should passe outward, nor take land within the realme without their assent and knowledge; secondarily he made proclamation, that what person could shew and reueale where the duke of Buckingham was, should be highly rewarded; if he were a bondman, he should be enfranchised and set at libertie; if he were of free blood, he should haue a generall pardon, and be rewarded with a thousand pounds.

Furthermore, because he understood by Thomas Dutton, which (as you haue heard) was newlie returned out of Britaine, that Francis duke of Britaine not onelie refused to keepe the earle of Richmond as a prisoner, at his contemplation, and for his sake; but also that he was ready to aid and succour the said earle, with men, monie, and all things necessarie for his transporting into England: he therefore rigged and sent out ships of warre, well furnished and decked with men and artillerie, to scowpe and keepe that part of the sea that lieth ouer against Britaine, to the intent that if the earle of Richmond would adventure to saile toward England, either he should be taken captiue, or be beaten and driuen from the coast of England. And moreover, to the intent that euery coast, waite, passage, and corner, should be diligentlie watched & kept, he set at euery doubtfull and suspected place men of warre, to seeke, search, and inquire, if anie creature could tell tidings of the duke of Buckingham; or of anie of his confederation, adherents, fauours, or partakers.

While this busie search was diligentlie applied and put in execution, Humfreie Banasser (were it moze for feare of life and losse of goods, or allured & prouoked by the auaricious desire of the thousand pounds) he betrayed his guest and maister to John Spytton then shiriffe of Shropshire; which suddenlie with a strong power of men in harnesse apprehended the duke in a little groue adioining to the mansion of Humfreie Banasser, and in great hast and euill speed conueied him apparelled in a pilled blacke cloake to the towne of Shrewesburie, where king Richard then kept his household. Whether this Banasser betrayed the duke moze for feare than couetous, manie men doe doubt: but sure it is, that shortly after he had betrayed the duke his maister; his sonne and he were wared mad, & so died in a bores stie; his eldest daughter of excellent beautie, was suddenlie stricken with a foule leprosie; his second sonne maruellouslie deformed of his lims, and made lame; his yonger sonne in a small puddle was strangled and drowned; and he being of extreme age, arreigned, and found guiltie of a murder, and by his cleargie saued. And as for his thousand pounds, R. Richard gaue him not one farthing, saing that he which would be untrue to so good a maister, would be false to all other: holbeite some saie that he had a small office or a fatune to stop his mouth withshall. The duke being by certieine of the kings counsell diligentlie vpon interrogatories examined, what things he knew prejudiciall vnto the kings person, opened and declared franklie and frelie all the conuration, without dissembling or glossing; trusting, because he had trulie and plainelie reuealed and confessed all things that were of him required, that he should haue licence to speake to the king: which (whether it were to sue for pardon and grace, or whether he being brought to his presence, would haue stiked him with a dagger as men then iudged) he soze desired and required. But when he had confessed the whole fact & conspiracie, vpon All soules daie, without arreignment or iudgement, he was at Salisbury in the open market place, on a new scaffold beheaded and put to death.

This death (as a reward) the duke of Buckingham received at the hands of king Richard, whom he before in his affaires, purposes and enterprises had holpen, sustained, and set forward, about all such forboode. By this all men may easilie perceiue, that he not onelie loseth both his labour, traueill, and industrie (and further staineth and spotteth his line with a perpetuall ignominie and reproch) which in euill and mischiefe aduiseeth and aideeth an euill disposed person, considering for the most part, that he for his frenchie fauour should receiue some great displeasure or importunate chance. Beside that, God of his iustice in conclusion appointed to him a condigne paine and affliction for his merits and deserts. [Available therefore, and for his best aduantage had it bene, to haue followed the wise counsell of him, that wilked him, and such as he, to keepe them from the man that hath power to slaine; so shalt thou doubt (saith he) the feare of death. And if thou come vnto him make no fault, least he take awaie thy life: remember that thou goest in the middell of snares, & that thou walkest vpon the towlers of the citie. Which aduise a learned man, in good place, and necessarie seruice about the prince, neattlie compised in these few verses:

*Pere principibus modice, nimis esse propinquum Si cupis, in vita multa pericula rueri.
Si ruit fortuna facit seruire potenti, Disce ne tristes, atque repente cadis, Sollicite vigiles laquei sunt undique fusi, Turribus in summis et situs, ergo caue.]*

While these things were thus handled and ordered in England, Henrie earle of Richmond prepared an armie of fife thousand manlie Britons, and foyte well furnished ships. When all things were prepared in a readinesse, and the daie of departing and setting forward was appointed, which was the twelue daie of the moneth of October, the whole armie went on shipboard, and halced by their sailes, and with a prosperous wind toke the sea. But toward night the wind changed, and the weather turned, and so huge and terrible a tempest so suddenlie arose, that with the verie power and strength of the storme, the ships were disparted, seuered & separated asunder: some by force were driuen into Posmandie, some were compelled to returne againe into Britaine. The ship wherein the earle of Richmond was, associat onelie with one other barke, was all night tossed and turmoiled.

In the morning after, when the rage of the furious tempest was allwaged, and the tre of blustering wind was some deale appeased; about the houre of none the same daie, the earle approached to the south part of the realme of England, even at the mouth of the haue of Dole, in the countie of Dorset, where he might plainelie perceiue all the sea bankes & shores garnished and furnished with men of warre and soldiers, appointed and deputed there to defend his arrival and landing (as before is mentioned.) Wherefore he gaue streit charge, and soze commandment, that that no person should once presume to take land, and go to shore, untill such time as the whole naue were assembled and come together. And while he taried and lingered, he sent out a shipboate toward the land side, to know whether they, which stood there in such a number, and so well furnished in apparell, defence, were his foes and enemies, or else his friends and comfortors.

They that were sent to inquire, were instantlie desired of the men of warre keeping the coast (which thereof were before instructed & admonished) to defend and take land, affirming that they were appointed by the duke of Buckingham there to await and tarie for the arrivall and landing of the earle of Richmond, and to conduct him safelie into the campe, where the duke not far of laie incamped with a mighty armie, and an host of great strength and power, to the intent that the duke and the earle, joining in pursuances and forces together, might prosecute and chase king Richard being destitute of men, and in manner desperate, and so by that meanes, and their owne labours, to obtaine the end of their enterpryse which they had before begun.

The earle of Richmond suspecting their flattering request to be but a fraud (as it was in deed) after he perceived none of his ships to appeare in sight, he twined up his anchors, halloed up his sailles, & hauing a prosperous and streinable wind, and a fresh gale sent euery by God to deliuer him from that perill and iopardie, arrived safe and in all securitie in the duchie of Normandie, where he to refresh and solace his soldiers and people) took his recreation by the space of thre daies, and cherefully determined with part of his companie to passe all by land againe into Britaine. And in the meane season he sent ambassadores to the French king, called Charles the eight, which noblie succeeded his father king Lewis the eleventh, not long before departed to God, requirring of him a safe conduct and licence to passe thorough his countrie of Normandie into Britaine.

This young king, hauing compassion of the misfortune of the earle of Richmond, not onelie gentlie granted and assigned to him a passport; but also liberallie disbursed to him a great summe of monie for his conduct and expenses necessarie in his long iourne and passage. But the earle trusting in the French kings humanitie, aduentured to send his ships home into Britaine, and to set forward himselfe by land on his iourne, making no great hast till his messengers were returned. Which being with that benefit so comforted, and with hope of prosperous successe so encouraged, marched towards Britaine with all diligence, intending there to consult further with his louers & friends of his affaires and enterprises. When he was returned againe into Britaine, he was certified by credible information, that the duke of Buckingham had lost his head; and that the marquesse Dorset, and a great number of noble men of England, had a little before inquired and searched for him there, and were now returned to Vannes.

When he had heard these newes thus reported, he first sorowed and lamented his first attempt and setting forward of his friends, and in especiall of the nobilitie, not to haue more fortunatelie succeeded. Secondly, he reioiced on the other part, that God had sent him so manie valiant and prudent capteins to be his companions in his martiall enterprises, trusting sweetly and nothing doubting in his owne opinion, but that all his businesse should be wiselie compassed, and brought to a good conclusion. Wherefore he determining with all diligence to set forward his new begun businesse, departed to Rheims, and sent certaine of his priue seruitors to conduct and bring the marquesse and other noble men to his presence. When they knew that he was safelie returned into Britaine, Lord how they reioiced! for before that time they missed him, and knew not in what part of the world to make inquirie or search for him. For they doubted and no lesse feared least he had taken land in England, & fallen into the hands of king Richard, in whose person they knew well was neither mercie nor compassion.

Wherefore in all speedie maner they galoped toward him, and him reuerentlie saluted. Which meeting after great ioy and solace, and no small thanks giuen and rendered on both parts, they aduisedly debated and communed of their great businesse and weightie enterpryse. In the which season the feast of the Nativite of our saviour Christ happened, on which daie all the English lords went with their solemnitie to the chiefe church of the citie, and there each gaue faith and promise to other. The earle himselfe first took a corporall oth on his honor, promising that incontinent after he should be possessed of the crowne and dignitie of the realme of England, he would be conioined in matrimonie with the ladie Elizabeth daughter to king Edward the fourth. Then all the companie swore to him fealtie, and did to him homage (as though he had bene that time the crowned king, and annointed prince) promising faithfullie, and firmelie affirming, that they would not onelie lose their worldlie substance, but also be deprived of their liues and worldlie felicitie, rather than to suffer king Richard that tyrant longer to rule and reigne over them.

Which solemne oths made and taken, the earle of Richmond declared and communicated all these doings to Francis duke of Britaine, desiring & most heartilie requirring him to aid him with a greater armie to conduct him into his countrie, which so longed and looked for his returne, and to the which he was by the more part of the nobilitie and commonaltie called and desired. Which (with Gods aid, and the dukes comfort) he doubted not in short time to obtaine; requirring him further to press to him a convenient summe of monie; affirming that all such summes of monie which he had receiued of his especiall friends, were spent and consumed in preparation of his last iourneie made toward England; which summes of monie, after his enterpryse once atchieved, he in the word of a prince faithfullie promised to repaie and restore againe. The duke promised him aid and helpe. Upon confidence whereof he rigged his ships, and set forth a naue well decked with ordnance, and warlikelie furnished with all things necessary, to the intent to saile toward Scotland, and to lose no time.

In the meane season king Richard apprehended in diuerse parts of the realme certaine gentlemen of the earle of Richmonds faction, & confederation, which either intended to saile into Britaine toward him, or else at his landing to assist and aid him. Amongst whom sir George Botolme, sir Roger Clifford, and foure other were put to execution at London, and sir Thomas Sentleger which had married the duchesse of Excester the kings owne sister, and Thomas Rame, and diuerse other were executed at Excester. Beside these persons, diuerse of his household seruants, whom either he suspected or doubted, were by great crueltie put to shameful death. [By the obseruation of which mens names, the place, and the action here mentioned, with the computation of time, I find fit occasion to interlace a note (noblie receiued from the hands of one that is able to saie much by record) deliuering a summarie (in more ample sort) of their names, whom king Richard did so tyrannicallie persecute and execute: as followeth.]

King Richard (saith he) came this ycare to the chie, tie, but in verie secret maner, whome the maior & his brethren in the best maner they could did receive, and then presented to him in a purse two hundred nobles; which he thankfullie accepted. And during his abode here he went about the citie, & viewed the seat of the same, & at length he came to the castell: and when he understood that it was called Rugefont, suddenly he fell into a dunpe, and (as one assonied) said, Well, I see my daies be not long. He spake this of a prophetic told him, that when he came once to Richmond, he should not long live after: which fell out in the end to be true, not in respect of this castle, but in respect of Henrie earle of Richmond, who the next yeare following met him at Bosworth field where he was slaine. But at his being here, he did find the gentlemen of this countie not to be well affected towards him, and after his departure, did also heare that the marquess of Dorset, the bishop of Cressler, and sundrie other gentlemen were in a confederacie against him for the assisting of the erle of Richmond.

Anno Reg. 2.

King Richard
chargeth the lord Stanley to keepe his wife in some secret place from dealing against him.

Wherefore he sent downe John lord Scrope with a commission to keepe a session; who sat at Worthington, & then & there were indicted of high treason, Thomas marquess Dorset, Peter bishop of Cressler, Thomas Senteleger, and Thomas Fulford knights as principals, and Robert Willoughbie and Thomas Arundell knights, John Araydell deane of Cressler, David Hopton archdeacon of Cressler, Oliver abbat of Buckland, Bartholomew Senteleger, William Giffon, Thomas Greenekefeld, Richard Edgercombe, Robert Burnbie, Walter Courtneie, Thomas Woluwe, Edward Courtneie, Hugh Lutterell, John Crocker, John Hallelwell, and five hundred others were indicted as accessories. All which fled and hid themselves, some into Britaine, and some else where; saving sir Thomas Senteleger, and one sir John Kame; who were brought to Cressler, and there at the Cressler were beheaded.] After this, king Richard called a parliament, in the which he attainted the earle of Richmond and all other persons which were fled out of the realme for feare, or any other cause, as enemies to him, and to their naturall countie; & all their lands, goods, & possessions, were confiscate and seized to the kings use. And yet not content with this price, which no doubt was of no small valour and moment, he laid on the peoples necks a great tax and tallage, and surlie necessitie to that act in maner him compelled. For what with purging and declaring his innocencie concerning the murder of his nephews toward the world, and what with cost to obtaine the love and favour of the communitie (which outwardly glosed, and openly dissembled with him) he gave prodigallie so marte and so great rewards, that now both he lacked, and scarce wist honestlie how to bestow.

In this troublous season, nothing was more marvelled at, than that the lord Stanleie had not bene taken, and reputed as an enemy to the king; considering the working of the ladie Margaret his wife, mother to the earle of Richmond. But for so much as the enterpryse of a woman was of him reputed of no regard or estimation; and that the lord Thomas his husband had purged himselfe sufficientlie to be innocent of all doings and attempts by him perpetrated and committed: it was given him in charge to keepe him in some secret place at home, without having any serviant or companie: so that from thence forth he should never send letter or messenger unto him, nor any of his friends or confederats, by the which the king might be molested or troubled, or any hurt or prejudice might be attempted against his realme and communitie. Which commandement was a while put in execution and accomplished, according to his dreadfull commandement.

Yet the wild woman of vengeance wauering in his head, could not be content with the death of diverse gentlemen suspected of treason; but also he must extend his bloody furie against a poye gentleman called Collingborne, for making a small rime of three of his unfortunate counsellors, which were the lord Louell, sir Richard Ratcliffe his mischievous minion, and sir William Catesbie his secret seducer, which meter of rime was thus framed:

The Cat, the Rat, and Louell our dog, Rule all England vnder an hog.

Meaning by the hog, the dreadfull wild boare, which was the kings cognisance. But because the first line ended in dog, the metrickian could not observing the regiments of meter, end the second verse in boare, but called the boare an hog. This poetical schollemaster, corrected of bryces and longs, caused Collingborne to be abbreviated shorter by the head, and to be divided into foure quarters.

Here is to be noted, that beside the rime which is reported by some to be the onelie cause for which this gentleman suffered, I find in a register booke of indictments concerning felonies and treasons by sundrie persons committed, that the said Collingborne (by the name of William Collingborne) late of Wyndham in the countie of Wilshire esquier, and other his associates were indicted in London: for that they about the tenth daie of Julie, in this second yeare of king Richards reigne, in the parish of saint Botolphes in Dorsfoken ward had solicited and requested one Thomas Pate, offering to him for his paines eight pounds, to go over into Britaine unto Henrie erle of Richmond, Thomas marquess Dorset, John Cheinete esquier, and others, which in the last parlement holden at Westminster had bene attainted of sundrie high treasons by them practised within the kings dominion.

Besides this, to declare unto them that they should do verie well, to returne into England with all such power as they might get before the feast of saint Luke the euangelist next ensuing; so that they might receive all the whole revenues of the realme due at the feast of saint Michael next before the said feast of saint Luke. And that if the said earle of Richmond and his partakers, following the counsell of the said Collingborne, would arrive at the haven of Pole in Dorsetshire, he the said Collingborne and other his associates would cause the people to rise in armes, and to leue warre against king Richard, taking part with the said earle and his friends; so that all things should be at their commandements. Moreover, to move the said earle to send the said John Cheinete unto the French king, to advertise him that his ambassadors sent into England should be dallied with, onelie to drue off the time till the winter season were past, and that then in the beginning of summer king Richard meant to make warre into France, invading that realme with all puissance: and so by this meanes to persuade the French king to aid the earle of Richmond and his partakers, in their quarrell against king Richard.

Further, that the said William Collingborne, being confederate with the said earle and other his adherents, as well within the realme as without, the eighteenth day of Julie, in the said second yeare, within the parish of saint Gregories in Faringdon ward within, had devised certaine bills and writings in rime, to the end that the same being published, might stir the people to a commotion against the king. And those bills and writings in rime so devised and written, the same Collingborne the daie and yeare last mentioned, had fastened and set upon diverse dores of the cathedrall church of saint Paule, for the more speedie furthering of his intended purpose. Thus farre farre the inuidement. But whether he was gilty in part or in all, I haue not to saie.

King Richard being thus disquieted in mind, and doubtfull for the suertie of his owne estate, called to remembrance that confederations, honest bands and pacts of amitie, concluded and had betwixt princes and gouernours, are the efficient cause that realmes and common wealths are strengthened with double power, that is, with aid of friends abroad, and their owne forces at home. Whereupon he deuised how to conclude a league and amitie with his neighbour the king of Scots: who not long before had made diuerse incursions and roades into the realme of England. And although he had not much gotten; yet verelie he lost not much. And now euen as king Richard could haue wished, he of himselfe made safe for peace or truce to be had betwixt him and king Richard; who willinglie giuing eare to that safe, commissioners were appointed to meete about the treatie thereof, as in the historie of Scotland it maie appeare.

At length they agreed vpon a truce for three yeeres, and withall for a further increase of firme friendship and sure amitie (betwixt him and the king of Scots) king Richard entered into a treatie also of alliance for the concluding of a marriage betwixt the duke of Northaile (eldest sonne to the king of Scots) and the ladie Anne de la Beule daughter to John duke of Suffolke and the duchesse Anne, sister to king Richard: which sister he so much fauoured, that studying by all waies and meanes possible how to aduance hir image, he did not onelie thus seeke to preferre hir daughter in marriage; but also after the death of his sonne, he proclaimed John earle of Lincoln hir sonne and his nephue, heire apparant to the crowne of England, disheriting king Edwards daughters, whose brethren (as ye haue heard) he most wickedlie had caused to be murdered and made awaie.

The king of Scots standing in need of friends, although not so greatlie as king Richard, did willinglie consent to that motion of marriage, first broched by king Richard, insomuch that it toke effect, and by commissioners was passed and concluded, in manner as in the historie of Scotland it likewise appeareth. But albeit that by this league and amitie thus conuanted and concluded, it might be thought, that all conspiracies, coniurations, and confederacies against king Richard had bene extinct, especiallie considering the duke of Buckingham and his allies were dispatched out of the waie, some by death, and some by flight and banishment into farre countries: yet king Richard, more doubting than trusting to his owne people and friends, was continually bered and troubled in mind for feare of the earle of Richmonds returne: which battie dread and horrible agonie caused him to liue in dolefull miserie, euer vniquiet, and in manner in continuall calamitie.

Therefore he intending to be relieved, and to haue an end of all his doubtfull dangers, determined therelie to extirpate and plucke vp by the roots all the matter and ground of his feare and doubts. Insomuch that (after long and deliberate consultation had) nothing was for his purpose and intent thought either more necessarie or expedient than once againe with price, prayer, and rewards, to attempt the duke of Britaine, in whose territorie the earle of Richmond then abode, to deliuer the said earle into his hands: by which onelie meanes he should be discharged of all feare and perill, and brought to rest and quietnes both of bodie and mind. Therefore incontinent he sent certeine ambassadoys to the duke of Britaine, which toke vpon them (beside the great and ample rewards that they brought with them into Britaine) that king Richard should pearelie paie and answer the duke of all the reuenues, rents, and profits of the seignories, lands, and possessions, as well belonging and appertaining to the erle of Richmond, as to anie other noble or gentleman, which then were in the earles companie; if he after that time would keepe them in continuall prison, and restrain them from libertie.

The ambassadoys (furnished with these and other instructions) arrived in Britaine, and came to the dukes house; where with him they could haue no manner of communication concerning their weightie affaires; by reason that he being faint and weakened by a long and dallie infirmittie, began a little to waxe idle and weake in his wit and remembrance. For which cause Peter Landoise his chiefe treasure, a man both of pregnant wit and great authoritie, ruled and aduoged all things at his pleasure and commandement, for which cause (as men set in authoritie be not best beloued) he excited & prouoked against him the malice and euill will of the nobilitie of Britaine, which afterward (for diuerse great offenses by him during his authoritie perpetrate & committed) by their meanes was brought to death & confusion.

The English ambassadoys moued their message and request to Peter Landoise, and to him declared their masters commandement, instantlie requiring and humble desiring him (in whose power it laie to do all things in Britaine) that he would frendlie assent to the request of king Richard: offering to him the same rewards and lands, that they should haue offered to the duke. This Peter (which was no lesse disdained than hated almost of all the people of Britaine) thought that if he did assent & satisfie king Richards petition and desire, he should be of power and abilitie sufficient to withstand and repell the malicious attempts and disbeinfull inuentions of his enuious aduersaries. Wherefore he faithfullie promised to accomplish king Richards request & desire: so that he kept promise with him, that he might be able to withstand the cankered malice of his secret enemies.

This act that he promised to do, was not for anie grudge or malice that he bare vnto the erle of Richmond: for (as you haue heard before) he deliuered him from the perill of death at saint Malos, when he was in great doubt of life, and leoparde. But as cause ariseth we euer offend, and that cursed hunger of gold, and execrable thirst of lucre, and inward feare of losse of authoritie, dyueth the blind minds of couetous men, & ambitious persons to euils and mischiefs innumerable, not remembering losse of good name, obloquie of the people, nor in conclusion the punishment of God for their merits and deserts. [Which vengeance of God for such falshood was moze to be feared, than the gaie offers of the king to be desired; for the one was sure to fall, the other was likelie to faile. Wherefore it is wisdome to make choise of a friend, by the rule of the wiseman to be obserued in wine, which is drunke with pleasure when it is old. Neither doth it stand with a mans safetie to trust a friend too farre: for occasions maie fall out wherby he shall become an enimie, as the poet saith:

Hospis erit fors an qui tuus hospes erit.]

But fortune was so fauourable to the publike wealth of the realme of England, that this deadlie and dolozous compact toke none effect or place. For while posts ran and letters were sent to and fro for the finishing of this great enterpryse betwixt king Richard and Peter Landoise, John Morton bishop of Elie (sojourning then in Flanders) was of all this craftie conuenance certified by his secret and sure friends. Wherefore he sent Christopher Urswike (which at that verie season was come out of Britaine into into Flanders) to declare to the earle of Richmond how all the deceit and craftie working was conueied and compassed, giuing him charge to counsell and aduise the earle in all half possible with all his companie to retire out of Britaine into France.

When these newes were brought to the earle, he then kept house in Tannes, and incontinent dispatched againe Christopher Urwolke vnto Charles the French king, requiring him that he and his might safetie passe into France. Which desire being obtained, the messenger shortly returned to his lord and prince. The earle, well perceiuing that it was expedient and necessarie, with all speed and diligence to looke to this weightie matter, calling verie few to counsell, he made inquirie and search of all secret & by-waies, & sent before all his noble men, as though for a certaine familiaritie and kindnesse they should visit and comfort the duke, which then (for recreation and change of aire) laie on the borders and confines of France. And secretly he gaue charge to the earle of Penbroke, which was the leader and conductor of his companie, that when they approached the marches and limits of Britaine, they should diuert and take the next waie into France.

The noble men somewhat suspicious of things newlie imagined, without any tarieng, scowring the waies as fast as their horses could runne, came out of the duchie of Britaine into the duchie of Anjou in the dominion of France, where they taried the erles coming, which two daies after departed out of Tannes, onelie accompanied with five seruitors, as though he had gone secretly to visit a familiar friend of his, in a small village adioining. No man suspected that he would depart, considering that a great multitude of Englishmen were left and continued in the citie. But after that he had passed dreadie five miles forward, he suddenly turned into a solitarie wood next adioining, where clothing himselfe in the simple coat of his poore seruant, made and appointed his sallowinister leader and master of his small companie, & he as an humble page diligentlie followed and serued his counterfeited gouernor, neither resting nor refreshing themselves, except the baiting of their horses, till they by waies vniuersall, now this way, now turning that way, came to their companie abiding them in Angiers.

The fourth day after the earle of Richmond was thus departed, that craftie merchant Peter Landoise, thinking still after his price promised by king Richard, was ready to set forward his crew of souldiers, which he priuillie had consigned, with certaine trustie captains for that onelie purpose appointed and elected, to performe and atchieue his pretended enterprise; dissembling and feining them to be conducted and hired by him to serue the earle of Richmond, and him to conduct in his returne toward his native countrie: meaning no other thing but to apprehend him, and the other noble men in his retinue, which no such fraud suspected, nor yet anie treason imagined, vnto ware and vnprouided, and destitute of all aid, and them to cast and commit suddenly into continuall captiuitie and bondage, to the intent that by this his wretched and naughtie act, he might satisfie the charitable request and loving desire of good king Richard, more for his owne profit than king Richards gaine.

But when this craftie dissembler Peter Landoise, which was no trulier than an old fox, perceined that the earle was departed (thinking that to be true that he imagined) Lord how curroas ran into euerie coast! how light horsemen galloped in euerie street! to follow and deteine him, if by anie possibilitie he could be met with and onertaken, and him to apprehend and bring captiue into the citie of Tannes. The horsemen made such diligence, and with such celeritie set forward their tourne, that nothing was more likelie than they to haue obtained, yea and seized their price. For the earle of Richmond was not entered into the realme of France scarce one houre, but the followers came to the limits and confines of Britaine, and durst adventure no further, but baine (without their desire) sorrowfullie returned.

At which season were left at Tannes about the number of three hundred Englishmen, which not being called to counsell, and vnto ware of this enterprise, but knowing of the earles sudden departure, were so incontinentlie affronted, that in manner they were all in despair, both of him, and their owne suertie and safegard. But fortune turned hir saile, and otherwise it happened than their feare them incumbered. For the duke of Britaine, now being somewhat recovered, was sore displeased, and nothing contented, that the earle of Richmond was in his dominion so vncourteouslie bled and intreated, that he should be by fraud and vntruth compelled to leaue and flee out of his duchie and countrie, contrarie to his honour. Wherefore he took verie great displeasure with Peter Landoise his treasurer, to whome (although he knew not, and was ignorant that all the plot was devised and deuised by him) he laid the fault, and imputed the crime.

Hereupon he sent for Edward Mowbray, and Edward Boynings, valliant esquires of England, and deliuered vnto them monie sufficient for their conduct, willing them to conuie the rest of the Englishmen being in Britaine, to the earle of Richmonds presence. When the earle was thus furnished, and appointed with his trustie companie, and was escaped all the dangers, labirinthes, and snares that were set for him: no maruell though he were iocund and glad of the prosperous successe that happened in his affaires. Wherefore, least he should seeme to be blotted with the note of ingratitude, he sent diuers of his gentlemen to the duke of Britaine, the which should publish and declare to him on the behalfe of the earle, that he and his were onelie by his benefit and fauour conserued and deliuered from the imminent danger that they were like to be trapped in. Wherefore at that time he rendered vnto him his most hartie thanks in words, trusting and not doubting, but in time to come liberallie to recompense him with acts and deeds.

After this, the earle took his tourne to Charles the French king, lieng then at Langes vpon the river of Loire, to whome (after great thanks giuen for manifold pleasures by him to the earle helmed) he disclosed and manifested the cause and occasion of his access and repaire to his person. After that, he required of him helpe and succour, to the intent that by his immortal benefit to him at that time helmed, he might safetie returne vnto the nobilitie of his realme; of whome he was generallie called to take vpon him the crowne & scepter of the realme, which much hated and abhorred the tyrannie of king Richard. King Charles promised him aid and comfort, and bade him be of good courage, and make good cheare; for he assured him that he would gladlie shew to him his beneuolent mind and bountifull liberalitie. Which king from thence removed to Spoutargis, leading with him the earle of Richmond, and all the noble personages of his retinue and faction.

¶ This is that Charles the French king, in whose time France was all adiant, for the state of that realme is said, that then it was verie populous in multitudes of men, for wealth and riches euerie particular region most fertile and plentifull, for glorie in armes most flourishing & renowned, a policie well directed, discipline administred, an antipoxis deadly, and

Know you therefore, that this sir John Clere earle of Drford (that withdrew himselfe from Barnet field, and with all speed fled into Scotland) in the yere 1473, and the thirteenth of Edward the fourth, did (after he had sometime sojourned there) saile into France, about the borders whereof he was continually hauering, as hoping to win some preise (to support his estate) of such passengers as for merchandise cause or otherwise must keepe their course a long the sea. Whose good successe therein did not deceiue his mind. For in the end (what of one and other) he got such riches and other furniture, as he was able to support a choicse number of followers. Wherewith he (being releued and incouraged to adventure to set foot in his countrie in despite of king Edward) did with his companye of 397 persons, and with his saile of ships land in the west countrie the last of september, where (parlie by force of his, and partly through feare of the inhabitants, but mostlie by a subtil shift) he gat and entered the castell of saint Michaels mount, a place of strength, and such an harbour, as he determined to keepe the same against all assailants. During the time of his remainie there, he would with his companye manie times descend the hill, and come abroad in the countrie, where (for his loue, for his honour, and for the hatred they bare to king Edward) he was well intertained of manie gentlemen and others of the countrie.

But this matter vnpossible long to be kept in secret, was at the length brought to the knowledge of king Edward; who being somewhat moued, thought in the beginning to withstand such mischief, least suffering too long, & the earle growing to strength, he might be put to as great plunge for the crowne as he had bene twice before: wherewith seeing he was possessed, he grew resolute to keepe it both by policie and puissance, manure the open violence and priuie practices as well of his professed as secret enemies.

For he ran through the pikes yer he could obtaine it, and offered his bodie to manie desperate perils in hope to get it: which if he had either feared or thinned, it is a matter of demand whether he had euer had it. For picious things, as principalities and such like, vnlesse they be hereditarie, as they are hardlie kept, so are they not easilie gotten: for he that desireth to gather a rose, must not be tender ouer his fingers because of thornes; and he that would taste honie fresh out of the hieue, must not be scared with the stinging of bees, as the poet berie sweetlie noteth:

Non quisquam fruitur veris odoribus, Elybleas latebris nec spoliati fauos, Si frontis caueat si timeat rubos, Armat spina rosas, mella regunt apes.

Wherefore king Edward gaue in charge to Bodingham, ruler of Shrifte of Cornetwall, to assemble such power as he could, and besieging the mount, he should either take or kill the earle of Drford. The which the Shrifte did accordingly, but that so feintlie and fauourable, as he permitted the earle of Drford (now in distresse) to reuittell the mount, knowing that there was no waie to expell the earle from thence but by famine. These things thus done (the king not pleased, and the earle not displeased) one Forteescue (which surname is deduced from the strength of his shield, whereof that familie had first originall) was with a stronger and faithfuller company sent by king Edward to laie siege to the castell; which he did, and long continued. For it was not easie to be had, being (of it selfe) by nature stronglie set, by policie well vittelled, and by manhood valiantlie defended: which moued the king to assay an other means therefore, and to see if policie might do that which force could not.

For which cause, as Forteescue still continued the said siege, the king supposed it best (if possible he might) to weaken the earles part, by withdrawing the strength and hearts of his people from him: which might not be done but with rich promises and strong pardons. On which consideration he sent liberallie pardons to them, and in the end so secretlie wrought with the earles men: that if the earle (feareing the worst, and iudging it better to trie the kings mercie, than to hazard the extremitie of taking, in which rested nothing but assured death) had not wholie submitted himselfe to king Edward, he had bene by his owne men most dishonestlie betrayed, and suddenlie taken prisoner. Wherupon the earle comming forth to Forteescue, did there yeld himselfe and the castell into the kings hands. At what time (being the sixteenth of february, which from the first entrance of the earle into that castell being the last of september, was about foure moneths and foure score daies) the same Forteescue entred the mount, & tooke possession thereof, finding it yet sufficientlie vittelled to haue sustained an other siege more than one halfe yere. After all things were thus quieted, the earle, the lord Beaumont, two brothers of the said earle, and Thomas Clifford, were brought vp as prisoners vnto king Edward. And now to our present historie againe.]

When the earle of Richmond saw the earle of Drford, he was caused with an incredible gladnesse, that he being a man of so high nobilitie, of such knowledge and practices in feates of warre, and so constant, trustie and assured (which alwaie had stood for the maintenance and preferment of the house of Lancaster) was now by Gods prouision deliuered out of captiuitie and imprisonment; and in time so necessarie and conuenient come to his aid, succour, and advancement, in whome more surer than anie other he might put his trust and confidence, and take lesse paine and trauell in his owne person. For it was not hid from him, that such as cuer had taken part with king Edward before this time, came to do him service, either for malice they bare king Richard, or else for feare to liue vnder his cruell rule and tyrannous gouernance.

Not long after, the French king returned againe to Paris, whome the earle of Richmond followed, intending there to solicit his matter to the conclusion. Whereupon he brought king Charles to take vpon him the whole tuition and defense of him and his cause, so that he and his compaignie being (by his means) aided and comforted, should confesse and saie, their wealth, victorie, and aduancement to haue flowed and budded forth of his bountifullnesse and liberalitie, which they would (God willing) shortly acquite. In the meane season, diuise Englishmen, which either fled out of England for feare, or were at Paris to learne and studie good literature and vertuous doctrine, came voluntarie and submitted themselves to the earle of Richmond, and vowed & swore to take his part. Amongst whom was Richard for a preist, a man of great wit and no lesse learning, whome the earle incontinent receiued into secret familiaritie, and in brasse time erected and aduanced him to high dignities and promotions, and in conclusion made him bishop of Winchester.

St. Richards denies to in-purpose.

In the meane season, king Richard was credibly aduertised, what promises and othes the earle and his confederates had made and sworn together at Reims, and how by the earles means all the Englishmen were passed out of Britaine into France. Therefore being sore dismayed, and in a manner desperate, because his craftie chieftenance took none effect in Britaine, he imagined & deuised how to infringe and disturbe the earles purpose by an other meane, so that by the marriage of ladie Elizabeth his neece, he should pretend no claime nor title to the crowne. For he thought if that marriage failed, the earles chiefe combe had bene cleaerly cut. And because that he being blinded with the ambitious desire of rule before this time in obtaining the kingdome, had committed and done manie cursed acts, and detestable tyrannies, yet according to the old prouerbe; Let him take the bull that shall auaile the calfe: he thought all faas by him committed in times passed to be but of small moment, and not to be regarded in comparison of that mischieuous imagination, which he now newlie began and attempted.

Subtil and two practice of king Richard to beguile the earle
of Richmond.

There came into his vngracious mind a thing not onely detestable to be spoken of in the remembrance of man, but much more cruell and abhominable to be put in execution. For when he reuolued in his waivering mind, how great a fountaine of mischefe toward him should spring, if the earle of Richmond should be aduanced to the marriage of his neece: which thing he heard saie by the rumor of the people, that no small number of wise and witty personsages enterprised to compasse and bring to conclusion; he cleaerly determined to reconcile to his fauour his brothers wife queene Elizabeth, either by faire words, or liberall promises; firmelie beleeuing his fauour once obtained, that she would not sticke to commit (and longlie credit) to him the rule and gouernance both of hir and hir daughters, and so by that meanes the earle of Richmond of the affinitie of his neece should be utterlie defrauded and beguiled.

And if no ingenuous remedie could be otherwise inuented, to saue the innumerable mischafes which were euen at hand, and like to fall, if it should happen queene Anne his wife to depart out of this present life, then he himselfe would rather take to wife his consine and neece the ladie Elizabeth; than for lacke of that affinitie the whole realme should run to ruine, as who saide, that if he once fell from his estate and dignitie, the ruine of the realme must needs follow. Therefore he sent to the queene (being in sanctuary) diuise and often messengers, which first should excuse and purge him of all things before against hir attempted or procured, and after should so largelie promise promotions innumerable, and benefites, not onely to hir, but also to hir sonne lord Thomas Marquesse Dorset, that they should bring hir (if it were possible) into some wanhope, or (as men saie) into a soles paradise.

The messengers, being men both of wit and grauitie, so perswaded the queene with great and pregnant reasons, & that with faire and large promises, that she began somewhat to relent, and to giue to them no deafe eare; inso much that she faithfullie promised to submit and yeld hir selfe fullie and franke-ly to the kings will and pleasure. And so she putting in obliuion the murder of hir innocent children, the infamie and dishonour spoken by the king hir husband, the liuing in adulterie laid to hir charge, the bastarding of hir daughters; forgetting also the faithfull promise and open oth made to the countesse of Richmond mother to the earle Henrie, blinded by auaricious affection, & seduced by flattering words, first deliuered into king Richards hands hir five daughters, as lambs once againe committed to the custodie of the rauens wolfes.

nstance of St.
Elizabeth.

After she sent letters to the marquesse hir sonne, being then at Paris with the earle of Richmond, willing him in a while to leaue the earle, and without delaie to repaire into England, where for him were promised great honours, and honourable promotions; ascertaining him further, that all offences on both parts were forgotten and forgiven, and both he and she highlie incorporated in the kings heart. Suerlie the inconstancie of this woman were much to be marvelled at, if all women had bene found constant; but let men speake, yet women of the vorie bond of nature will follow their owne sex. But it was no small alluremeent that king Richard vied to ouercome hir (for we know by experience that women are of a proud disposition, and that the waie to win them is by promises of preferment) and therefore it is the lesse marvelled that he by his wille wit had made conquest of hir waivering will. Besides that, it is to be presumed that she stood in feare to impugne his demands by denials, least he in his malicious mood might take occasion to deale roughlie with hir, being a weake woman, and of a timorous spirit.]

Now when king Richard had thus with glorious promises, and flattering words, pleased and appeased the mutable mind of queene Elizabeth, which knew nothing lesse than that he most intended; he caused all his brothers daughters to be conueied into his palace with solemne reueling: as though with his new familiar and louing interteinment they should forget, and in their minds blot out the old committed iniurie, and late executed tyrannie. Now nothing was contrarie and against his diuelish purpose, but that his mansion was not void of his wife, which thing he in any wise abudged necessarie to be done. But there was one thing that so much feared and feared him from committing this abhominable murder, because (as you haue heard before) he began to counterfet the image of a god and well disposed person: and therefore he was afraid least the sudden death of his wife once openlie knowne, he should lose the god and credible opinion which the people had of him, without a while desert, conceiued and reported.

But in conclusion, euill counsell persuaded in a wit latelie minded to mischefe, and turned from all goodnesse. So that his vngracious desire ouercame his his honest feare. And first to enter into the gates of his imagined enterpryse, he abstained both from the bed and companie of his wife. When he complained to diuerse noble men of the realme, of the infortunate sterilitie and barrenesse of his wife, because she brought forth no fruit and generation of his bodie. And in especiall he recounted to Thomas Mothe-ran archbishop of Dorke (whome latelie he had deli-uered out of ward and captiuitie) these impediments of his queene, and diuerse other, thinking that he would reueale to hir all these things, trusting the sequele hereof to take due effect, that the hearing this grudge of hir husband, & taking therfore an inward thought, would not long lue in this world.

Of this the bishop gathered (which well knew the complexion and visage of the king) that the queenes daies were short, and that he declared to certeine of his secret freinds. After this he procured a common rumour (but he would not haue the author knowne) to be published and spred abroad among the common people, that the queene was dead; to the intent that the taking some conceit of this strange fame, should fall into some sudden sickness or greivous maladie; and to proue if afterwards she should fortune by that or anie other waies to lease hir life, whether the people would impute hir death to the thought or sick-nesse, or therof would laie the blame to him. Now when the queene heard tell that so horrible a rumour of hir death was sprung amongst the communalitie, she sore suspected and iudged the world to be almost at an end with hir. And in that sorrowfull agonie the with lamentable countenance and sorrowfull cheare, repaired to the presence of the king hir husband, beminding of him what it should meane, that he had iudged hir worthe to die.

The king answered hir with faire words, and with smiling and flattering leadings comforted hir, and bid hir be of good chere, for (to his knowledge) she should haue no other cause. But howsoeuer that it fortune, either by inward thought and pensiuess of hart, or by infection of poison (which is affirmed to be most likelie) within few daies after the queene departed out of this transitorie life, and was with due solemnitie buried in the church of S. Peter at Westminster. This is the same Anne, one of the daughters of the earle of Warwike, which (as you haue heard before) at the request of Lewes the French king was married to prince Edward, sonne to king Henrie the first. The king thus (according to his long desire) loosed out of the bonds of matrimonie, began to cast a foolish fantasie to ladie Elizabeth his nace, making much sute to haue hir ioined with him in lawfull matrimonie.

But because all men and the maiden hirselfe most of all detested and abhorred this vnlawfull, and in manner vnaturall copulation; he determined to prolong and defer the matter, till he were in a more quietnesse. For all that verie season he was oppressed with great, weightie, and vrgent causes, and businesses on euerie side; considering that daile, part of the nobilitie sailed into France to the earle of Richmond: other priuillie fauoured and abded certeine of the contrariation, so that of his short end few or none were in doubt. And the common people (for the most part) were brought to such desperation, that manie of them had rather be reputed and taken of him in the number of his enemies, than to abide the chance and hazard to haue their goods taken as a spoile of victorie, by his enemies. [In such hatred they had the wretch, wishing his hart in their hands with the hazard of their beaues. For how can people saie well or thinke well of tyrants, whose proper tie it is to teare them in peeces with their clawes, like a wolfe let lose among a fold of sheepe? Whereto Homer had an eie when he said in pitie sente as here followeth:

Quisquis inhumanis studet interfabilis uti Moribus, hinc omnes viro clam diraprecantur: Hinc omnes credunt fus insultare perempto.]

Amongst the noble men whome he most mistrusted, these were the principall. Thomas lord Stanleie, sir William Stanleie his brother, Gilbert Talbot, and sir hundred other: of whose purposes although king Richard were not ignorant, yet he gaue neither confidence nor credence to anie one of them; and least of all to the lord Stanleie, because he was ioined in matrimonie with the ladie Margaret, mother to the earle of Richmond, as afterward apparantlie yee may perceiue. For when the said lord Stanleie would haue departed into his countrie to visit his familie, and to recreate and refresh his spirits (as he openlie said, but the truth was, to the intent to be in a perfect readinesse to receiue the earle of Richmond at his first arriual in England) the king in no wise would suffer him to depart, before he had left as an hostage in the court George Stanleie lord Strange, his first begotten sonne and heire.

While king Richard was thus troubled and vexed with imaginations of the troublous time that was like to come: lo, euen suddenlie he heard newes, that fire was sprung out of the smoke, and the war fresh-lie begun; and that the castell of Hammes was deli-uered into the hands of the earle of Richmond, by the means of the earle of Orford; and that not onlie he, but also James Blunt capteine of the castell, were fled into France to aid the earle Henrie. Wherefore he, thinking it great policie to withstand the first bzunt, sent the most part of the garrison of Calis, to reconer againe by force the castell of Hammes. They which were in the castell, perceiuing their aduersaries to approach, prepared munitions and engines for their defense, and sent also to the earle of Richmond, to aduertise him of their sudden inuasion, requiring him of haste aid and speedie succour.

The earle sleeping not this first begun assault, sent the earle of Orford with an elected companie of soul-diers to raise the siege, and rescue the castell: which at their first arriuing pitched their campe not far from their enemies. Now while king Richards men gaue vigilant eie, waiting least the earle of Orford should take anie aduantage of them that laie on that side of the castell; Thomas Brandon with thirtie appoued men of war by a marish, which laie on the other side, entered into the castell. The souldiers within greatlie encouraged, & much comforted by this new succour and aid, griued the enemies, by shooting from the walles more than they were accustomed to doe. When they of the castell veyed their enemies on the fore part: and the earle of Orford no lesse molested & vniquieted them on the other part. Which was the occasion that king Richards men offered (of their owne meere motion) licence to all being within the castell to depart in safetie, with bag and baggage, nothing excepted.

Which condition the earle of Orford, comming onelie for that purpose to deliuer his louing freinds out of all perill and danger, and chiefe of all, his old hostesse Jane Blunt, wife to James Blunt the capteine, would in no wise for sake or refuse: and so leauing the castell bare and vngarnished both of vittels and artillerie, came safelie to the earle of Richmond sojourning in Paris. During this time, king Richard was crediblie informed of his inquisitors and espials, that the earle of Richmond was with long sute in the court of France soze wearied; and desiring great aid, could obtaine small reliefe: in somuch that all things went so farre backwards, that such things as were with great diligence (and no lesse deliberation) purposed and determined to be set for-

King Richard either being to light of credence, or seduced and deluded by his craftie tale-tellers, greatlie reioiced, as though he had obtained the ouer hand of his enemies with triumphant victorie, and thought himselfe neuer so sweetlie deliuered of all feare and dreadfull imaginations: so that he needed now no more once for that cause either to wake, or to breake his golden sleepe. Wherefore he called home againe his ships of warre, which he had appointed to keepe the narrow seas, and dispatched all such souldiers as he had deputed to keepe certeine garrisons, and to stop certeine passages (as you haue heard before.) Yet least he might for lacke of prouision be suddenly trapped, he straightlie charged and gaue in commandement to all noblemen, and especiallie such as inhabited nere the sea coast, and on the frontiers of Wales, that (according to the vse of the countrie) they should keepe diligent watch and strong ward, to the intent that his aduersaries in no wise should haue any place opportune easilie to take land, without defence or rebatting backe.

For the custome of the countries adioining nere to the sea is (speciallie in the time of warre) on euerie hill or high place to erect a beaconn with a great lanterne in the top, which may be seene and discerned a great space off. And when the noise is once bruted that the enemies approach nere the land, they suddenly put fire in the lanternes, and make shouts and outcries from towne to towne, and from village to village. Some run in post from place to place, admonishing the people to be readie to resist the leopordie, and defend the perill. And by this policie the fame is soon blabbed to euerie citie and towne, in somuch that aswell the citizens as the rural people be in short space assembled and armed, to repell and put backe the new arrived enemies. [Whereas if the necessary vse of this visible warning were neglected, the policie of the enemy might prouide so puerile, as that the people should sooner fall into perill irreuerable, than they could thinke on (much lesse prouide) means to auoid it.]

But now to returne to our purpose. King Richard thus somewhat cased of his accustomed pensiuensse, began to be a little more merrie, & toke lesse thought and care for outward enemies than he was wont to doe; as who say, that he with politike prouision should withstand the destiny which hong ouer his head, and was ordeined in briefe time suddenly to fall. Such is the force and puissance of diuine iustice, that euerie man shall lesse regard, lesse prouide, lesse be in doubt of all things, when he is most nereest punishment, and next to his mischance for his offenses & crimes. [For though God did forbear him a while, yet was that forbearance no acquittance, but rather a time of preparing & making vp that which wanted of the plagues that God had purposed in iustice to poure vpon and ouerwhelme him for his foule offenses, which could not scape beaue iudgment & vengeance:

About this season, while the earle of Richmond was desiring aid of the French king, certeine noble men were appointed to rule the realme of France, during the minority of king Charles, which amongst themselves were not of one opinion. Of which dissension, Lewis duke of Orleans was the chiefe stirrer, who because he had married ladie Joane sister to the French king, toke vpon him aboue other the rule and administration of the whole realme. By reason of which controuersie, no one man was suffered to rule all. Wherefore the earle of Richmond was compelled to make sute to euerie one of the counsell feuerallie one after another, requiring and desiring them of aid and reliefe in his weightie businesse, and so his cause was prolonged and deferred. During which time, Thomas marquesse Dosset, which was (as you haue heard) intised by his mother to returne againe into England, partlie despairing in the good successe of the earle of Richmond, and partlie overcome and vanquished with the faire glosing promises of king Richard: secretlie in the night season stole out of Paris, and with all diligent expedition toke his iourne toward Flanders.

When relation of his departure was made to the earle of Richmond, and the other noble men, no maruell though they were astonied and greatlie amazed, yet that notwithstanding, they required of the French king, that it might be lawfull for them in his name, and by his commandement, to take and staie their companion, confederate, and partaker of all their counsell, in what place within his readie and territorie so euer they could find him. Which petition once obtained, they sent out curroes into euerie part, amongst whom Humfreie Cheinie (plating the part of a good bloudhound) followed the tract of the fier so euen by the sent, that he ouertooke and apprehended him not far from Campeigne; and so with much reason, and what with faire promises, being persuaded, he returned againe to his companions.

The earle of Richmond unburdened of this misadventure, least by lingering of daies, and prolonging of time, he might lose the great opportunitie of things to him offered and ministered: also least he should further wound and molest the minds of his faithfull and assured friends, which daily did expect and tarie for his coming, determined no longer to protract and deferre the time; but with all diligence and celeritie attempted his begun enterprise. And so obtaining of king Charles a small crew of men, and borrowing certeine summes of monie of him, and of diuerse other his priuate friends, for the which he left as debter (or more likelie as a pledge or hostage) lord Thomas marquesse Dosset (whome he halfe mistrusted) and sir John Bourchier, he departed from the French court, and came to the citie of Rone.

While he taried there, making prouision at Harflet in the mouth of the riuier of Sene for all things necessary for his nauie, tidings were brought to him that king Richard (being without children, & now a widower) intended hostile to marie the ladie Elizabeth his brothers daughter; and to prefer the ladie Cecillie his sister to a man found in a cloud, and of an unknowne linage and familie. He toke these newes as a matter of no small moment; and so (all things considered) it was of no lesse importance than he toke it for. For this thing onelie toke awaie from him and all his companions their hope and courage, that they had to obtaine an happie enterprise. And therefore no maruell though it nipped him at the very stomack: when he thought, that by no possibilitie he might attaine the marriage of any of the Edwards daughters, which was the strongest foundation of his building; by reason whereof he iudged that all his friends in England would abandon and shynke from him.

Wherefore, making not manie of his counsell, after diuerse consultations, he determined not yet to set forward: but to tarie and attempt how to get more aid, more friends, and more stronger succours. And amongst all other, it was thought most expedient to allure by assintie in his aid, as a companion in armes, sir Walter Herbert, a man of an ancient stocke, & of great power among the Welsh, who had with him a faire ladie to his sister, of age ripe to be coupled with him in matrimonic. And for the attaining of this purpose, messengers were secretlie sent to Henrie earle of Northumberland (which had been

But in the meane season, there came to the earle a more sofull message from Morgan Kidwellie, learned in the temporall law, which declared that Rice ap Thomas, a man of no lesse valiantnesse than actiuitie, and John Sauage an approued capteine, would with all their power be partaker of his quarell. And that Reginald Hecie had collected and gotten together no small summe of monie for the payment of the wages to the souldiers and men of warre: admonishing him also to make quicke expedition, and to take his course directlie into Wales. The earle of Richmond, because he would no longer linger and waite his friends, living continuallie betweene hope and feare, determined in all conuenient hast to set forward, and caried to his ships armour, weapons, bittels, and all other ordinaunces expedient for warre.

After that all things were in readinesse, the earle being accompanied onlie with two thousand men, and a small number of ships sweied by his anchors, and hailed by his sailles in the moneth of August, and sailed from Harfiet with so prosperous a wind, that the sequenty daie after his departure, he arrived in Wales in the euening, at a place called Milford haue, and incontinent toke land, and came to a place called Valle; where he heard saie that a certeine companie of his aduersaries were laid in garri- son to defend his arriuall all the last winter. And the earle at the sunne rising remoued to Hereford west, being distant from Valle not full ten miles, where he was sofullie receiued of the people, and he arrived there so suddenlie, that he was come and entered the towne at the same time when the citizens had but knowledge of his comming.

Here he heard newes, which were as vntrue as they trulie were reported to him in Normandie; that Rice ap Thomas, and John Sauage, with bodie and goods, were determined to aid king Richard. While he and his companie were some what affronted at these new tidings, there came such message from the inhabitants of the towne of Penbroke, that refreshed and reuiued their frozen hartes and daunted courages. For Arnold Butler a valiant capteine, which first asked pardon for his offenses before time committed against the earle of Richmond, and that obtained, declared to him that the Penbrochians were readie to serue and giue their attendance on their naturall and immediat lord Jasper earle of Penbroke. The earle of Richmond, hauing his armie thus increased, departed from Hereford west to the towne of Cardigan, being siue miles distant from thence.

While the souldiers were refreshing and trimming themselves in their campe, strange tidings sprow among them without anie certeine author; that sir Walter Herbert, which laie with a great crew of men at Carmarden, was now with a great armie readie to appoach and bid them battell. With which newes the armie was sore troubled, and euery man assaid his armour and proued his weapon, and were prest to defend their enemies. And as they were in this fearfull doubt, certeine horsemen, which the earle had sent to make inquirie and search, returned and reported all the countrie to be quiet, and no let nor impediment to be laid or cast in their iournie. And euen at the same time, the whole armie was greatlie recomforted, by reason that the comming of Richard Griffith, a man of great nobilitie, the which notwithstanding that he was confederate with sir Walter Herbert, and Richard ap Thomas; yet at that verie instant he came to the earle of Richmond with all his companie, which were of no great number. After him the same daie came John Morgan with his men.

Then the earle aduanced forward in good hast, making no repose or abode in anie one place. And to the intent to passe forward with sure and short expedition, he assaulted euerie place where his enemies had set anie men of warre; which with small force, and lesse difficultie, he brieftie did overcome & vanquish. And suddenlie he was by his espials ascertained, that sir Walter Herbert, and Rice ap Thomas were in harnesse before him, readie to incounter with his armie, and to stop their passage. Wherefore like a valiant capteine he first determined to set on them, and either to destroie or to take them into his saueur, and after with all his power and puissance to giue battell to his mortall enimie king Richard. But to the intent his friends should know in what readinesse he was, and how he proceeded forward; he sent of his most secret and faithfull seruants with letters and instructions to the ladie Margaret his mother, to the lord Stanleie and his brother, to sir Gilbert Talbot, and to other his trustie friends; declaring to them that he being succoured and holpen with the aid and reliefe of his friends, intended to passe ouer the riuer of Seuerne at Shrewesburie, and so to passe directlie to the citie of London.

Wherefore he required them, as his speciall trust and confidence was fixed in the hope of their fidelitie, that they would meet him by the waie with all diligent preparation; to the intent that he and they, at time and place conuenient, might communicate together the depenense of all his doubtfull and weightie businesse. When the messengers were dispatched with these commandements and admonitions, he marched forward toward Shrewesburie: and in his passing, there met and saluted him Rice ap Thomas with a goodlie band of Welshmen, which making an oath and promise to the earle, submitted himselfe wholly to his order and commandement. For the earle of Richmond two daies before made to him promise, that if he would sweare to take his part and be obedient to him, he would make him chief gouernour of Wales: which part as he faithfullie promised and granted, so (after that he had obtained and possessed the realme and diademe) he liberallie performed and accomplished the same.

In the meane time the messengers, that were sent, diligentlie executed their charge, and laden with rewards of them to whom they were sent, returned to him the same day that he entered into Shrewesburie: and made relation to him that his friends were readie in all points to do all things for him, which either they ought or might do. The earle Denric brought in god hope with this pleasant message, continued forth his intended iournie, and came to a little towne called Newport, and pitching his campe on a little hill adioining, reposed himselfe there that night. In the euening the same daie came to him sir Gilbert Talbot, with the whole power of the young earle of Shrewesburie, then being in ward, which were accounted to the number of two thousand men. And thus his power increasing, he arrived at the towne of Stafford, and there paused.

There also came sir William Stanleie accompanied with a few persons. And after that the earle and he had communed no long time together; he reuerted to his souldiers, whom he had assembled together to serue the earle: which from thence departed to Lichfield, and lay without the walles in his campe all the night. The next morning he entered into the towne, and was with all hono? like a prince receiued. A daie or two before, the lord Stanleie, hauing in his hand almost siue thousand men, lodged in the same towne. But hearing that the erle of Richmond was marching thitherward, gaue to him place, dislodging him and his, and repaired to a towne called Aderstone, there abiding the coming of the earle. And this wilie for did this act, to auoid all suspicion on king Richards part.

For the lord Stanleie was afraid, least if he should seme openlie to be a fautor or aider to the earle his sonne in law, before the day of the battell, that king Richard, which yet vtterlie did not put in him diffidence and mistrust, would put to some cruell death his sonne and heire apparant George lord Strange, whome king Richard (as you haue heard before) kept with him as a pledge or hostage, to the intent that the lord Stanleie his father should attempt nothing preiudiciall to him. King Richard at this season keeping his house in the castle of Potingham, was informed that the earle of Richmond, with such banished men as were fled out of England to him, were now arrived in Wales, and that all things necessarie to his enterpryse were unprouided, unpurueied, and verie weakie, nothing meet to withstand the power of such as the king had appointed to meet him.

R. Richard concerneth the earle and his power.

This rumor so inflated his mind, that in manner disdaining to heare speake of so small a companie, he determined at the first to take little or no regard to this so small a sparkle, declaring the earle to be innocent and vnwise, because that he rashly attempted such a great enterpryse with so small and thin a number of warlike persons: and therefore he gaue a definitive sentence, that when he came to that point that he should be compelled to fight against his will, he either should be apprehended aliue, or else by all likelihood he should of necessitie come to a shamefull confession: and that he trusted to be shortly done by sir Walter Herbert, and Rice ap Thomas, which then ruled Wales with equall power and like authoritie.

But yet reuoluing and casting in his mind, that a small war begun and winked at, and not regarded, maie turne to a great boile and trouble; and that it was prudent policie not to contemne and disdeine the little power and small weakenesse of the enimie (be it neuer so small) thought it necessarie to prouide for afterclaps that might happen & chance. [For victorie doth not alwaies follow the greatest multitude, neither is it a necessarie consequent, that the biggest bodie is indued with most force. For we see that the small viper is the huge buls deable bane, and a little curie doth catch a boze boisterous and big; as the poet properlie (and to the purpose) verie well saith:

Ouid.

Parua necat morsu spatio sum vipera tantum, A cane non magno sepe tenetur aper.

The king sendeth to his friends for a chosen power of men.

Therefore he sent to John duke of Norfolk, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thomas earle of Surrie, and to other of his especiall & trustie friends of the nobilitie, which he iudged moze to preferre and esteeme his wealth and honour, than their owne riches and priuate commoditie; willing them to muster and view all their seruants and tenants, and to elect and chose the most couragious and active persons of the whole number, and with them to repaire to his presence with all speed and diligence. Also he wrote to Robert Brakenberie lieutenant of the Tower, commanding him with his power to come to his armie, and to bring with him (as fellows in armes) sir Thomas Bourchier, & sir Walter Hungerford, and diuerse other knights and esquiers, in whom he cast no small suspicion.

Now while he was thus ordering his affaires, tidings came that the earle of Richmond was passed Seuerne, & come to Shrewesburie without anie detriment or incumbiance. At which message he was sore moued and spoiled with melancholie and dolor, crying out, & asking vengeance of them that (against their oth and promise) had so deceiued him. For which cause he began to haue diffidence in other, informing that he determined himselfe out of hand the same daie to meet with and resist his aduersaries: and in all haste sent out espials to view and espie what waie his enimies kept and passed. They diligentlie doing their dutie, shortly after returned, declaring to the king that the earle was incamped at the towne of Lichfield.

The earle incamped at Lichfield.

When he had perfect knowledge where the earle with his armie was colourning, he hauing continual repaire of his subiects to him, began incontinently without delaie to marchall and put in order his battels (like a balliant capteine and polittike leader) and first he made his battels to set forward, sure and sure in a ranke, marching toward that way where his enimies (as was to him reported) intended to passe. In the middle part of the armie, he appointed the traffike and cartage pertaining to the armie. Then he (inured with his gard) with a flowing countenance and cruell visage, mounted on a great white courser, and followed with his footmen, the wings of horsemen coasting and ranging on euerie side: and keeping this arrate, he with great pompe entered the towne of Lichfield after the sunne set (full of indignation & malice, which vttered it selfe from the inward hart by the mouth, out of which flowed speaches of horrible heate, tempered with cruell threatnings, equall to his of whome it was thus said long ago:

Horrebant seuis omnia verbumini.]

The earle of Richmond raised his campe, and departed from Lichfield to the towne of Laimworth, therto nere adjoining, and in the mid way passing, there saluted him sir Walter Hungerford, and sir Thomas Bourchier knights, and diuerse other which yielded and submitted themselves to his pleasure. For they, being aduertised that king Richard had them in suspicion and gelousie, a little beyond Stone Stratford left and forsooke priuile their capteine Robert Brakenberie; and wandering by night, and in manner by vnknowne paths, and vncertaine waies searching, at the last came to earle Henrie. Diuerse other noble personages, which inwardlie hated king Richard worse than a tode or a serpent, did likewise resort to him with all their power and strength: nothing and working his destruction, who otherwise would haue bene the instrument of their casting away.

The earle of Richmond moueth his power to Laimworth.

There happened in this progression to the earle of Richmond a strange chance worthie to be noted. For albeit he was a man of balliant courage, & that his armie increased, and daile moze and moze he waxed mightier and stronger; yet he was not a little afraid, because he could in no wise be assured of his father in law Thomas lord Stanleie, which for feare of the destruction of the lord Strange his sonne (as you haue heard) as yet inclined to neither partie. For if he had gone to the earle, and that notified to king Richard, his sonne had bene shortly executed. Therefore he accompanied with twentie light horsemen lingered in his iournie, as a man musing & imagining what was best to be done. And the moze to aggravate his pensiuenesse, it was shewed him, that king Richard was at hand with a strong power & a great armie.

While he thus heauilie dragged behind his host, the whole armie came before the towne of Laimworth; and when he saw the deepe darknesse could not perceiue the steps of them that passed on before, and had wandered hither & thither, seeking after his companie, and yet not once hearing anie noise or whispering of them; he turned to a verie little village, being about three miles from his armie, taking great thought, and much fearing lest he should be espied, and so trapped by king Richards scoutwatch. There he he taried all night, not ones aduenturing to aske or demand a question of any creature, he being no more amazed with the icopardie & perill that was passed, than with this present chance, soe feared that it shuld be a prognostication or signe of some infortunate plage afterward to succed. As he was not merie being absent from his armie, so likewise his armie much mourned, and no lesse mourned for his sudden absence.

The next morning earlie in the dawning of the day he returned, and by the conduct of god fortune, espied and came to his armie, excusing himselfe not to haue gone out of the way by ignorance: but that for a policie (denied for the nonce) he went from his campe to receiue some glad message from certeine of his priuie friends and secret allies. This excuse made, he priuilie departed againe from his host to the towne of Aberfion, where the lord Stanleie and sir William his brother with their bands were abiding. There the erle came first to his father in law, in a litle close, where he saluted him, and sir William his brother: and after diuerse and frendlie imbracings, each reioiced of the state of other, and suddenlie were surprised with great ioy, comfort, and hope of fortunate successe in all their affaires and doings. Afterward they consulted together how to giue battell to king Richard if he would abide, whome they knew not to be farre off with an huge host.

In the evening of the same day, sir John Sauage, sir Brian Sanford, sir Simon Digbie, and manie other, leauing king Richard, turned and came to the part of the earle of Richmond, with an elect compaignie of men. Which refusall of king Richards part, by men of such experience, did augment and increase both the god hope, and the puissance of the earle of Richmond. In the meane season, king Richard which was appointed now to finish his last laboz by the very diuine iustice & prouidence of God (which called him to condigne punishment for his mischeifous deserts) marched to a place meet for two battells to incounter, by a village called Bosworth, not farre from Leicester: and there he pitched his field on a hill called Anne Weame, refreshed his souldiers, and toke his rest.

The same went, that he had the same night a dreadfull and terrible dreame: for it seemed to him being asleepe, that he did see diuerse images like terrible diuels, which pulled and haled him, not suffering him to take anie quiet or rest. The which strange vision not so suddenlie strake his heart with a sudden feare, but it stuffed his head and troubled his mind with manie busie and dreadfull imaginations. For incontinent after, his heart being almost damped, he prognosticated before the doubtfull chance of the battell to come; not vsing the alacritie and mirth of mind and countenance as he was accustomed to doe before he came toward the battell. And least that it might be suspected that he was abashed for feare of his enemies, and for that cause looked so pitiouslie; he recited and declared to his familiar friends in the morning his wonderfull vision and fearefull dreame.

But I thinke this was no dreame, but a punction and picke of his sinfull conscience: for the conscience is so much more charged and aggravated, as the offense is greater & more heinous in degree. [So that king Richard, by this reckoning, must needs haue a wonderfull troubled mind, because the deeds that he had done, as they were heinous and unnatural, so did they excite and stirre by extraordinarie motions of trouble and vexations in his conscience.] Which sting of conscience, although it strike not alwaie; yet at the last daie of extreame life, it is wont to shew and represent to vs our faults and offenses, and the paines and punishments which hang ouer our heads for the committing of the same, to the intent that at that instant, we for our deserts being penitent and repentant, maie be compelled (lamenting and bewailing our sinnes like forsakers of this world) to cund to depart out of this mischeifous life.

Now to returne againe to our purpose. The next daie after, king Richard being furnished with men & all ablements of warre, bzinging all his men out of their campe into the plaine, ordered his foreward in a maruellous length, in which he appointed both horsemen and footmen, to the intent to imprint in the hearts of them that looked a farre off, a sudden terror and deadlie feare, for the great multitude of the armed souldiers: and in the fore-front he placed the archers like a strong fortified trench or bulwark.ouer this battell was capteine, John duke of Norfolk, with whome was Thomas earle of Surrie his sonne. After this long vant-gard, followed king Richard himselfe with a strong compaignie of chosen men and approued men of warre, having horsemen for wings on both sides of his battell.

After that the earle of Richmond was departed from the communication of his friends (as you haue heard before) he began to be of a better stomack, and of a more valiant courage, and with all diligence pitched his field iust by the campe of his enemies, and there he lodged that night. In the morning betimes, he caused his men to put on their armour, and apparel themselves readie to fight and giue battell; and sent vnto the lord Stanleie (which was now come with his band into a place indifferent betwene both the armies) requirng him with his men to approach nere to his armie, and to helpe to set the souldiers in arraie. But he answered that the earle should set his owne men in god order of battell, while he would arrate his compaignie, and come to him in time conuenient. Which answer made otherwise than the earle thought or would haue iudged, considering the opportunitye of the time & the weight of the businesse. And although he was therewithall a litle vexed, & began somewhat to hang the head; yet he without anie time delaing, compelled of necessitie, after this manner instructed and ordered his men.

He made his foreward somewhat single and slender, according to the small number of his people. In the front he placed the archers, of whome he made capteine John earle of Wrenford. To the right wing of the battell he appointed sir Gilbert Talbot to be the leader. To the left wing, he assigned sir John Sauage, who had brought thither with him a crue of right able personages, clad in white coats and hoods, which mustered in the eyes of their aduersaries right bsimlie. The earle of Richmond himselfe, with aid of the lord Stanleie, gouerned the battell, accompanied with the earle of Penbroke, hauing a god compaignie of horsemen, and a small number of footmen. For all his whole number exceeded not fure thousand men, beside the power of the Stanleies, wherof three thousand were in the field, vnder the standard of sir William Stanleie. The kings number was double so much and more. When both these armies were thus ordered, and all men readie to set forward, king Richard called his chieftains together, and to them said as followeth.

and type of this famous realme, and noble region: by whose puissance & valiantnesse I haue inioind and possessed the state roiall & dignitie of the same, maugre the ill will and seditious attempts of all my cankered enimies, and insidious aduersaries: by whose prudent & politike counsell I haue so gouerned my realme, people, & subiects, that I haue omitted nothing apperteyning to the office of a iust prince; nor you haue pretermitted nothing belonging to the dutie of wise and sage counsellors. So that I maie saie, and trulie affirme, that your approued fidelitie & tried constancie, maketh me to beleue firmelie, and thinke that I am an vndoubted king, and an indubitate prince.

And although in the adeption and obtaining of the garland, I being seduced, and provoked by sinister counsell, and diabolical temptation, did commit a wicked and detestable act: yet I haue with streit penance and salt tears (as I trust) expiated & clerele purged the same offense: which abhominable crime I requie you of friendship as clerele to forget, as I daile remember to deploze and lament the same. If ye will euen now diligentlie call to remembrance in what case and perplexitie we do stand; and in what doubtfull perill we be all intrapped; I doubt not but you in heart will thinke, and with mouth confesse, that if euer amitie and faith preuailed betwene prince and subiects, or betwene subiect and subiect; or if euer bond of allegiance obliged the bassall to loue and serue his naturall souereigne lord; or if anie obligation of dutie bound anie prince to aid & defend his subiects; all these loues, bonds, and duties of necessitie are now this day to be tried, shewed, and put in experience.

He speaketh approbouslie of the earle of Richmond.

For if wise men saie true (as they do not lie) there is some policie in getting, but much more in keeping; the one being but fortunes chance, & the other high wit and policie. For which cause, I with you, and you with me, must needs this day take labour and paine, to keepe and defend with force, that preheminence and possession, which by your prudent deuises I haue gotten & obtained. I doubt not but you know how the diuell (continuall enimie to humane nature, disturber of concord, & sower of sedition) hath entered into the heart of an vnknowne Welshman (whose father I neuer knew, nor him personallie saw) exciting him to aspire and couet our realme, crowne, and dignitie, and thereof clerele to depriue and spoile vs and our posteritie. Ye see further, how a companie of traitors, chaues, outlaues, and runnagates of our owne nation, be aiders and partakers of his feat and enterprise, readie at hand to ouercome and oppresse vs.

You see also, what a number of beggerlie Britans and faint-hearted Frenchmen be with him arrived to destroe vs, our wines and children. Which imminent mischiefs and apparant inconueniences, if we will withstand & refell, we must liue together as brethren, fight together like lions, & feare not to die together like men. And obseruing and keeping this rule and precept, beleue me, the fearefull haue neuer fled faster before the gracie greihound, nor the sillie lark before the sparrowhawk, nor yet the simple shepe before the rauinous wolfe; than your proud bragging aduersaries, astonied and amazed with the onelie sight of your manlie visages, will flee, run, and skir out of the field. For if you consider and wiselie ponder all things in your mind, you shall perceiue, that we haue manifest causes, and apparant tokens of triumph and victorie.

And to begin with the erle of Richmond capteine of this rebellion, he is a Welsh milkelop, a man of small courage, and of lesse experience in martiall acts and feats of warre, brought up by my mothers meanes, and mine, like a captiue in a close cage in the court of Francis duke of Britaine; and neuer saw armie, nor was exercised in martiall affaires: by reason whereof he neither can, nor is able by his owne will or experience to guide or rule an host. For in the wit and policie of the capteine consisteth the chiefe adeption of the victorie, and ouerthrow of the enimies. Secondly feare not, but put awaie all doubts; for when the traitors and runnagates of our realme, shall see vs with banner displayed come against them, remembering their oth, promise, and fidelitie made vnto vs, as to their souereigne lord and anointed king; they shall be so pricked and stung in the bottome of their scrupulous consciences, that they for verie remorse and dread of the diuine plague, will either shamefullie flee, or humble submit themselves to our grace and mercie.

And as for the Frenchmen and Britans, their valiantnesse is such, that our noble progenitors, and your valiant parts haue them oftener banquished and overcome in one moneth, than they in the beginning imagined possible to compasse and finish in a whole yeare. What will you make of them: braggers without audacitie, drunkards without discretion, ribalds without reason, cowards without resisting, and in conclusion, the most effeminate and lasciuious people that euer shewed themselves in front of battell; ten times more courageous to flee & escape, than once to assault the breast of our strong & populous armie. Wherefore considering all these aduantages, expell out of your thoughts all doubts, auoid out of your minds all feare; and like valiant champions aduance forth your standards, & assaie whether your enimies can decide and trie the title of battell by dint of sword. Aduance (I say againe) forward my capteins, in whome lacketh neither policie, wisdom, nor yet puissance. Euerie one giue but one sure stripe, & succilie the iournie is ours. What preuaileth a handfull to a whole realme?

Desiring

Richard the third
the confusion and the confusion.

Desiring you (for the love that you beare to me) and the affection that you have to your native and naturall countrie, and to the safeguard of your prince & your selves, that you will this daie take to you your accustomed courage and couragious spirits, for the defense and safeguard of vs all. And as for me, I assure you, this daie I will triumph by glorious victorie, or suffer death for immortall fame. For they be maimed and out of the palace of fame disgraced, dieng without renowne, which do not asmuch prefer and exalt the perpetuall honour of their native countrie, as their owne mortall and transitorie life. Now saint George to borrow, let vs set forward, and remember well, that I am he which shall with high advancements reward and preferre the valiant and hardie champions, and punish and torment the shamefull cowards, and dreadfull dastards.

This exhortation encouraged all such as favoured him; but such as were present (more for dread than love) hated them openly, whome they inwardly hated. Other swore outwardly to take part with such, whose death they secretly compassed, and inwardly imagined. Other promised to invade the kings enemies, which fled and sought with fierce courage against the king. Other stood still and looked on, intending to take part with the victors and overcomers. So was his people to him untrue and unfaithfull at his end, as he was to his nephews untrue and unnatural in his beginning. [How then was it possible that this princes regiment could long stand, seeing the preservation and prologation of his reigne consisted not in the love of his subjects? In place thereof because feare (yea servile and forced feare succeeded) he was the sooner forsaken of his people, whose hearts fell from him as scales from a penthouse in a sunnie daie; and in this case the poet saith truelie, and was well worthy of credit when he craued it, saying:

When the earle of Richmond knew by his followers that the king was so nere imballeted, he rode about his armie from ranke to ranke, & from wing to wing, giving comfortable words to all men, and that finished (being armed at all peeces, saving his helmet) mounted on a little hill, so that all his people might see and behold him perfectlie, to their great relief. For he was a man of no great stature, but so formed and decorated with all gifts and lineaments of nature, that he seemed more an angelicall creature, than a terrestriall personage. His countenance and aspect was cherefull and couragious, his haire yellow like the burnished gold, his eyes graine shining and quicke; prompt and readie in answering, but of such sobrietie, that it could never be iudged whether he were more dull than quicke in speaking (such was his temperance). Now when he had overlooked his armie over everie side, he paused awhile, and after with a low voice and bold spirit spake to his companions these, or the like words following.

The oration of king Henrie the seventh to his armie.

If ever God gave victorie to men fighting in a iust quarrell, or if he ever aided such as made warre for the wealth & ruinion of their owne naturall and nutritive countrie, or if he ever succoured them which adventured their lives for the release of innocents, suppressing of malefactors and apparant offenders; no doubt my fellows & friends, but he of his bountifull goodnesse will this daie send vs triumphant victorie, and a luckie tourne over our proud enemies, and arrogant adversaries: for if you remember and consider the bette cause of our iust quarrell, you shall apparantlie perceive the same to be true, godlie, and vertuous. In the which I doubt not, but God will rather aid vs (yea and fight for vs) than let vs be banquished and overthrowne by such as neither feare him nor his laws, nor yet regard iustice or honestie.

Our cause is so iust, that no enterprise can be of more vertue, both by the lawes divine & ciuill. For what can be a more honest, godlie, or godlie quarrell, than to fight against a capteine, being an homicide and murthrer of his owne blood or progenie, an extreme destroyer of his nobilitie, and to his and our countrie and the poore subjects of the same a deadly mallet, a drie brand, and a burthen intollerable? Beside him, consider who be of his band and companie: such as by murthre and buttruetie committed against their owne kin and lineage, yea against their prince and soueraigne lord, have disherited me and you, and wrongfullie deteine and blurpe our lawfull patrimonie & lineall inheritance. For he that calleth himselfe king, keepeth from me the crowne and regiment of this noble realme and countrie, contrarie to all iustice and equitie.

Likewise, his mates and friends occupie your lands, cut downe your woods, and destroye your manors, letting your wives and children range abroad for their living: which persons for their penance and punishment I doubt not, but God of his goodnes will ether deliver into our hands, as a great gaine and bootie; or cause them (being greaved and compassed with the pricke of their corrupt consciences) cowardlie to flee, and not abide the battell. Beside this I assure you, that there be yonder in the great battell, men brought thither for feare, and not for love; souldiers by force compelled, and not with good will armed; persons which desire rather the destruction than saluation of their maister and capteine: and finally, a multitude, whereof the most part will be our friends, and the least part our enemies.

For truelie I doubt which is greater, the malice of the souldiers toward their capteine; or the feare of him conceived of his people. For truelie this rule is infallible, that as ill men daile court to destroye the good; so God appointeth the good men to confound the ill. And of all worlde goods the greatest is to suppress tyrants, and release innocents; whereof the one is as much hated, as the other is beloved. If this be true (as clearkes preach) who will spare spare ponder tyrant Richard duke of Glocester, but tricke calling him selfe king, considering that he hath violated and broken both the lawes of God and man: What vertue is in him which was the confusion of his brother, and murtherer of his nephewes: What mercie is in him that sleieth his trustie frends as well as his extreame enemies: Who can haue confidence in him which putteth diffidence in all men?

If you haue not read, I haue heard good clarkes saie, that Tarquine the proud for the vice of the bodie lost the kingdome of Rome; and the name of Tarquine banished the cite for euer: yet was not his fault so detestable as the fact of cruell Pero, which slue his own mother, and opened his entrails, to behold the place of his conception. Behold ponder Richard, which is both Tarquine and Pero: yea a tyrant more than Pero, for he hath not onlie murthered his nephew being his king and souereigne lord, bastarded his noble brethren, and defamed the wombe of his vertuous and womanlie mother; but also compassed all the meanes and waies that he could inuent, how to defile and carnallie know his owne merce, vnder the pretense of a cloked matrimonie, which ladie I haue sware and promised to take to my make and wife, as you all know and beleue.

If this cause be not iust, and this quarell godlie, let God (the giuer of victorie) iudge and determine. We haue (thanks be gi-uen to Christ) escaped the secret treasons in Britaine, and auoided the subtile snares of our fraudulent enemies there, passed the troublous seas in good and quiet safegard, and without resistance haue ouergone the ample region & large countrie of Wales, and are now come to the place which we so much desired: for long we haue fought the furious boze, and now we haue found him. Therefore let vs not feare to enter into the toile, where we may suerlie sleie him; for God knoweth that we haue liued in the vales of miserie, tossing our ships in dangerous stormes: let vs not now dread to let bp our full sailes in faire weather, hauling with vs both God and good fortune.

If we had come to conquer Wales and had atchined it, our praise had bene great, and our gaine more: but if we win this battell, the whole rich realme of England, with the lords and rulers of the same, shall be ours; the profit shall be ours, and the honour shall be ours. Therefore labour for your gaine, & sweate for your right. While we were in Britaine, we had small liuings and little plentie of wealth or welfare; now is the time come to get aboundance of riches, and copie of profit; which is the reward of your seruice, and merit of your paines. And this remember with your selues, that before vs be our enemies; and on either side of vs be such, as I neither suerlie trust, nor greatly beleue; backe-ward we cannot fle; so that here we stand like shepe in a fold, circumuented and com-passed betwene our enemies and our dourfull frends.

Therefore let all feare be set aside, and like sware brethren let vs ioine in one; for this daie shall be the end of our trauell, and the gaine of our labour, either by honorable death or famous victorie: and as I trust, the battell shall not be so slowe, as the profit shall be swate. Remember that victorie is not gotten with the multitudes of men, but with the courages of hearts, and ballantnesse of minds. The smaller that our number is, the more glorie is to vs if we banquish: if we be ouercome, yet no laud is to be attributed to the victors, considering that ten men fought against one. And if we die so glorious a death in so good a quarell, neither fretting time, nor rancarding obliuion, shall be able to darken or rase out of the booke of fame either our names, or our godlie attempt. And this one thing I assure you, that in so iust and good a cause, and so notable a quarrell, you shall find me this daie rather a dead carrion vpon the cold ground, than a free prisoner on a carpet in a ladies chamber.

Let vs therefore fight like invincible giants, and set on our enemies like bitu-rous tigers, & banish all feare like rumping lions. And now aduance forward true men against traitors, pitifull persons against murtherers, true inheritors against blurspers, the scourges of God against tyrants. Displaie my banner with a good courage, march forth like strong and robustious champions, and begin the battell like hardie conquerors. The battell is at hand, and the victorie appoerth; and if we shamefullie recule, or cowardlie fle; we and all our sequele be destroyed, and dishonored for euer. This is the daie of gaine, and this is the time of losse; get this daie victorie, and be conquerors: and lese this daies battell, and be villaines. And therefore in the name of God and S. George, let euerie man couragiously aduance forth his standard.

These cherefull words he set forth with such gesture of his bodie, & smiling countenance, as though alreadie he had banquished his enemies, and gotten the spoile. He had scantlie finished his saying, but the one armie spied the other. Lord how hastily the soldiers buckled their healmes, how quickly the archers bent their bowes and frusht their feathers, how readilie the bilmen shoke their billes, and pruned their flaues, readie to approach and ioine, when the terrible trumpet should sound the bloudie blast to victorie or death! Betwixt both armies there was a great marish then (but at this present, by reason of ditches cast, it is growne to be firme ground) which the carle of Richmond left on his right hand; for this intent, that it should be on that side a defense for his part, and in so doing he had the sunne at his backe, and in the faces of his enemies. When king Richard saw the earles companie was passed the marsh; he did command with all hast to set vpon them. Then the trumpets sounded, and the soldiers shouted, and the kings hangs archers couragiously let fly their arrows. The earles bowmen slow not still, but paid them home againe.

The terrible shot once passed, the armies joined and came to hand-strokes, where neither sword nor bill was spared. At which encounter, the lord Stanleie joined with the earle. The earle of Orford in the meane season, fearing least while his companie was fighting, they should be compassed and circumsuaded with the multitude of the enemies, gave commandement in euerie ranke, that no man should be so hardie, as to go about ten feet from the standard. Which commandment once haueing, they knit themselves together, and ceased a little from fighting. The aduersaries suddenly aduancing in the matter, and mistruſting some fraud and deceit, began also to pause and leſt ſtriking; and not against the wills of manie, which had rather had the king destroyed, than saved, and therefore they fought verie faintlie, or slow still.

The earle of Orford, bringing all his hand together on the one part, set on his enemies freshlie againe. The aduersaries perceiving that, placed their men slender and thin before, but thicke and broad behind, beginning againe hartlie the battell. While the two fore-wards thus mortallie fought, each intending to vanquish and conuince the other; king Richard was admonished by his crypatores and espials, that the earle of Richmond (accompanied with a small number of men of armes) was not far off. And as he approached and marched toward him, he perceived alie knew his personage by certaine demonstratiens and tokens, which he had learned and known of others that were able to give him full information. Not being inflamed with ire, and vered with outrageous malice, he put his spurs to his horse, and rode out of the side of the range of his battell, leaving the vant-gard fighting; and like a hungry lion ran with speare in rest toward him. The earle of Richmond perceived well the king furiously coming toward him, and because the whole hope of his wealth and purpose was to be determined by battell, he gladlie proffered to encounter with him bodie to bodie, and man to man.

King Richard set on so sharplie at the first brunt, that he overthrew the earles standard, and slew sir William Brandon his standard-bearer (which was father to sir Charles Brandon by king Henrie the eight created duke of Suffolke) and matched hand to hand with sir John Cheinie, a man of great force and strength, which would have resisted him: but the said John was by him manfullie overthrowen. And to be making open passage by dint of sword as he went forward, the earle of Richmond withstood his violence, and kept him at the sword's point without advantage, longer than his companions either thought or indged: which being almost in despair of victorie, were suddenly recomforted by sir William Stanleie, which came to his succors with three thousand tall men. At which verie instant, king Richards men were driven backe and fled, & he himselfe manfullie fighting in the middle of his enemies, was slaine, and (as he worthlie had deserved) came to a bloudie death, as he had lead a bloudie life.

In the meane season, the earle of Orford with the aid of the lord Stanleie, after no long fight, discomfited the fore-ward of king Richard, whereof a great number were slaine in the chase and fight: but the greatest number which (compelled by feare of the king, and not of their owne voluntarie motion) came to the field, gave neuer a stroke, and having no harme nor damage, safely departed, which came not thither in hope to see the king prosper and preuaile, but to heare that he should be shamefullie confounded and brought to ruine. In this battell died few a boue the number of a thousand persons: and of the nobilitie were slaine John duke of Suffolke, which was warned by diuerse to refraine from the field, in so much that the night before he should set forward toward the king, or wrote this rime upon his gate:

Jacke of Norfolk be not too bold,

For 'Dik on thy maister is bought and sold.

Yet all this notwithstanding, he regarded more his oth, his honor, and promise made to king Richard, like a gentleman; and as a faithfull subiect to his prince, absented not himselfe from his maister; but as he faithfullie lived under him, so he manfullie died with him, to his great fame and laud. And therefore, though his seruice was ill imployed in aid of a tyrant (whome it had bene more honorable to haue suppressed than supported) yet because he had upon his fealtie undertaken to fight in his quarell, he thought it lesse losse of life and liuing than of glorie & honour: so that he might haue said, in respect of his loialtie & promised truth testified with constancie to the death:

There were slaine beside him, Walter lord Ferrers of Chartleie, sir Richard Radcliffe, and Robert Bakenberie lieutenant of the Tower, and not manie gentlemen more. Sir William Catesbie learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the chiefe counsellors to the late king, with diuerse other, were two daies after beheaded at Leicester. Amongst them that ran awaie, were sir Francis vicount Lonell, and Humfreie Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother, which toke sanctuary in saint Johns at Clochester. Of captiues and prisoners there were a great number. For after the death of king Richard was knowne and published, euerie man in manner vnrming himselfe, & casting awaie his abilitiments of warre, meeklie submitted themselves to the obedience and rule of the earle of Richmond: of the which the more part had gladlie so done in the beginning, if they might haue conuenientlie escaped from king Richards espials, which hauing as cleere eyes as Lynx, and open eares as Aspidas, ranged & searched in euerie quarter.

Amongst these was Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, which (whether it was by the commandement of king Richard, putting diffidence in him; or he did it for the loue and fauour that he bare vnto the earle) stood still with a great companie, and intermitted not in the battell, which was continually recelued into fauour and made of the council. But Thomas Howard earle of Surreie, which submitted himselfe there, was not taken to grace; because his father was chiefe counsellor, and he greatly familiar with king Richard, but committed to the Tower of London, where he long remained; and in conclusion deliuered, was for his truth and fidelitie after promoted to high honors, offices and dignities. On the earle of Richmonds part were slaine scarce one hundred persons, among whom the principall was sir William Brandon his standard-bearer. This battell was fought at Bosworth in Leicestershire, the two and twentieth date of August, in the yeare of our redemption 1485. The whole conflict indured little about two houres.

King Richard (as the same went) might haue escaped and gotten safeguard by fleeing. For when the which were next about his person, saw and perceived at the first joining of the battell the souldiers faintlie and nothing couragiously to set on their enemies; and not onlie that, but also that some withdrew themselves priuile out of the prease and departed; they began to suspect fraud and to smell treason; and not onlie exhorted, but determinallie aduised him to save himselfe by flight. And when the losse of the battell was imminent and apparant, they brought to him a swift swift and a light horse, to conueie him awaie. The which was not ignorant of the grudge and ill will that the common people bare toward him, casting awaie all hope of fortunate successe and happie chance to come, answered (as men saie) that on that daie he would make an end of all battels, or else there finish his life. Such a great audacitie and such a stomach reigned in his bodie.

For suerlie he knew that to be the daie, in the which it should be decided and determined whether he should peaceablie obtaine and inioy his kingdome during his life, or else vtterlie forgo and be deprived of the same. With which too much hardines he being overcome, hastily closed his helmet, and entered fiercelie into the hard battell, to the intent to obtaine that daie a quiet reigne and regiment; or else to finish there his vnquiet life, and vnfortunat gouernance. And so this miser at the same verie point had like chance and fortune, as happeneth to such which in place of right iustice and honestie, following their sensuall appetite, loue, and vse to embrace mischiefe, tyrannie, and vnchastitie. Suerlie these be examples of more vehemencie, than mans tong can expresse, to feare and astonish such cuill persons, as will not liue one houre vacant from doing and exercising crueltie, mischiefe, or outrageous liuing.

When the earle had thus obtained victorie, and slaine his mortall enemy, he kneeled downe and rendered to almighty God his hartie thanks, with deuout and godlie orisons; beseeching his godnesse to send him grace to aduance and defend the catholike faith; and to mainteine iustice and concord amongst his subiects and people, by God now to his gouernance committed & assigned. Which prayer finished, he replenished with incomparable gladnesse ascended vp to the top of a little mountaine, where he not onelie praised and lauded his valiant souldiers; but also gaue vnto them his hartie thanks, with promise of condigne recompense for their fidelitie and valiant facts, willing and commanding all the hurt and wounded persons to be cured, and the dead carcases to be deliuered to the sepulture. When the people reioiced, and claped their hands, crieng vp to heauen; King Henrie, King Henrie.

When the lord Stanleie saw the good will and gladnesse of the people, he took the crowne of king Richard which was found amongst the spoile in the field, and set it on the earles head; as though he had bene elected king by the voice of the people, as in ancient times past in diuerse realmes it hath bene accustomed: and this was the first signe and token of his good lucke and felicitie. ¶ I must put you here in remembrance, how that king Richard (putting some diffidence in the lord Stanleie) had with him as an hostage the lord Strange, his eldest sonne, which lord Stanleie (as ye haue heard before) ioined not at the first with his sonne in lawes armie, for feare the king would haue slaine the lord Strange his heire.

When king Richard was come to Bosworth, he sent a pursuant to the lord Stanleie, commanding him to aduance forward with his companie, and to come to his presence; which thing if he refused to do, he sware by Christs passion, that he would strike off his sonnes head before he dined. The lord Stanleie answered the pursuant that if the king did so, he had more sonnes aliue; and as to come to him, he was not then so determined. When king Richard heard this answer, he commanded the lord Strange incontinent to be beheaded; which was at that verie same season, when both the armies had fight ech of other. But the counsellors of king Richard pondered the time and cause, knowing also the lord Strange to be innocent of his fathers offense, & perswaded the king that it was now time to fight, & no time to execute,

Besides that, they abused him to keepe the lord Strange as prisoner till the battell were ended, and then at leisure his pleasure might be accomplished. So (as God would) king Richard brake his holie oath, and the lord was deliuered to the keepers of the kings tents, to be kept as prisoner. Which, when the field was done, and their maister slaine, and proclamation made to know where the child was, they submitted themselves as prisoners to the lord Strange, and he gentlie received them, and brought them to the new proclaimed king; where, of him and of his father he was receiued with great ioy. After this the whole campe removed with bag and baggage.

The same night in the euening, king Henrie with great pompe came to the towne of Leicester; where as well for the refreshing of his people & souldiers, as for preparing all things necessarie for his iournie toward London, he rested and reposed himselfe two daies. In the meane season the dead corps of king Richard was as shamefullie caried to the towne of Leicester, as he gorgeouslie (the day before) with pompe and pride departed out of the same towne. For his bodie was naked and despoiled to the skin, and nothing left about him, not so much as a clout to couer his priuite members, and was trusted behind a pursuant of arms, one Blanch Dengler, or White boze, like a hog or calfe, his head and armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and his legs on the other side, and all bespinkled with mire and blood he was brought to the graie friers church within the towne, and there late like a miserable spectacle.

But suerlie considering his mischievous acts and vngratious doings, men made wonder at such a castife, who although he deserved no buriall place either in church or churchyard, chappell or chancell, but otherwise to haue bin bestowed: yet in the said church he was with no lesse funerall pompe & solemnitie interred, than he would to be done at the buriall of his innocent nephues, whom he caused cruellie to be murdered, and vnnaturallie killed. How when his death was knotone, few lamented, and manie reioiced. The proud bragging white boze (which was his badge) was violentlie raised & plucked downe from euerie signe and place where it might be espied: so ill was his life, that men wished the memorie of him to be buried with his carrion corps. He reigned two yeers, two moneths, and one daie (so long by fir and twentie moneths, and foure and twentie houres in most mens opinions, to whom his name and presence was as sweet and delectable, as his doings princelie, and his person amiable.)

As he was small and little of stature, so was he of bodie greatlie deformed; the one shoulder higher than the other; his face was small, but his countenance cruell, and such, that at the first aspect a man would fudge it to fauour and smell of malice, fraud, and deceit. When he stood musing, he would bite and chaw busilie his nether lip; as who said, that his fierre nature in his cruell bodie alwaies chafed, stirred, and was euer vnquiet: beside that, the dagger which he ware, he would (when he studied) with his hand plucke vp & dowe in the sheath to the midst, neuer drawing it fullie out: he was of a readie, pregnant, and quicke wit, tollie to feine, and apt to dissemble: he had a proud mind, and an arrogant stomach, the which accompanied him euen to his death, rather choosing to suffer the same by dint of sword, than being forsaken and left helpelesse of his vnfaithfull companions, to preferue by cowardlie flight such a fraile and vncertaine life, which by malice, sickness, or condigne punishment was like sportlie to come to confusion.

Thus ended this prince his mortall life with infamie and dishonour, which neuer preferred fame or honestie ness before ambition, tyrannie and mischief. And if he had continued still protector, and suffered his nephews to have lived and reigned, no doubt but the realme had prospered, & he as much praised & loved as he is now had in hatred: but to God, which knew his inward thoughts at the houre of his death, I remit the punishment of his offenses committed in his life; (which if the one be as manifold as the other, Gods justice were not to be charged with crueltie. For by nature he is mercifull, slow to anger, and loth to smite: but yet crueltie sinne (in respect of his righteousness) being deadlie (much more heinous and horrible) how can he but by justice (which is an essentiall vertue in him) punish it fenelie? And if he did it with ten thousand torments, who shall be so hardie as to epsestate and reason why he so doth?)

But to leave the tyrant as he died, you shall understand that Henry the seventh caused a tombe to be made and set by over the place where he was buried, in the church of the graie friers at Leicester, with a picture of alabaster representing his person, doing that honour to his enimie, upon a princelie regard and pittifull zeale, which king Richard (moved of an hypocriticall shew of counterfeit pittie) did to king Henry the first, whom he had first crueltie murdered, and after in the second yeare of his usurped reigne, caused his corps to be remoued from Chertsey unto Windsor, and there solemnlie interred. And now to conclude with this cruell tyrant king Richard, we may consider in what sort the ambitious desire to rule and gouerne in the house of Yorke, was punished by Gods iustt providence.

For although that the right might seeme to remaine in the person of Richard duke of Yorke, claime at Wakefield yet maie there be a fault worthilie reputed in him, so to seeke to prevent the time appointed him by authoritie of parlement to attaine to the crowne intailed to him and his issue; in whome also, and not onelie in himselfe, that offense (as maie be thought) was duilie punished. For althow his eldest sonne Edward the fourth, being a prince right proud and circumfpect for the suertie of his psonell estate and his chyldren, insomuch that not content to cut off all his armed and apparant enimies, he also of a gealous feare, made a waite his brother the duke of Clarence, and so thought to make all sure: yet Gods vengeance might not be disappointed, for (as ye haue partly heard) he did but further thereby the destruction of his issue, in taking a waite him that onlie might haue staied the crueltie of his brother of Gloucester, who enraged for desire of the kingdome, bereft his innocent nephews of their liues & estates.

And as it thus well appeared, that the house of Yorke shewed it selfe more bloudie in seeking to obtaine the kingdome, than that of Lancaster in usurping it: so it came to passe, that the Lords vengeance appeared more heauie towards the same than towards the other, not ceassing till the whole issue male of the said Richard duke of Yorke was extinguished. For such is Gods justice, to leaue no vnrepentant wickednesse unpunished, as especiallie in this cause Richard the third, not deserring so much as the name of a man, much lesse of a king, most manifestlie appeareth. (At whom we will end, with a comparison of the like practise in Lodowicke the fourth, aspiring to the dukedome of Millane, the name, armes and title wherof he took upon him, hauing secretlie professed before, that he receiued them as appertaining to him by the inheritance of the king of Romans.

It was published that the death of Calcas (his late predecessor) happened by immoderate cohabitation, but the vnfortunall indgment of Italie was, that he died not of infirmities naturall, nor by incontinencie, but by poison and violent compulsion. Whereof Theodor de Paula, one of the physicians, assisting when the king visited him, assured the king to see most apparant and manifest signes: and if he were dispatched by poison, there was none that doubted that his uncle was innocent, either directlie or indirectlie, as he, who not content with an absolute power to be gouernor of the state, but aspiring according to the common desires of great men, to make himselfe glorious with titles and honours; and especially he iudged, that both for his proper suertie and the succession of his chyldren, the death of the lawfull prince was necessarie, and therefore thought to establish in himselfe the power and name of duke. Wherein ambition and couetousnesse preuailed aboue conscience and law of nature, and the gealous desire of dominion enforced his disposition (otherwise abhorring blood) to that vile action.

But to end with king Richard sometimes duke of Gloucester, a title of dignitie ioined with misfortune and vnluckinesse (as is noted before.) So that for infelicite it might well be compared vnto the name of Jone, a name vnhappie and much accursed for the kingdome of Naples. As for king Richard, better had it bene for him to haue contented his heart with the protectorship, than to haue cast by his snout, or lifted by his hornes of ambition so high (and that with a felled intent) as to hacke and hew downe by violent blowes all likelie impediments betwixt him and home. Better (I say) had it bene for him to haue dwelt vpon his first hono, than to haue wandered in princeliesse; and better had it bene for him neuer to haue intioied the flattering prosperitie of a king, than afterwards to fall, and neuer to recover losse or ruine, as is noted by the poet, saying:

Est melius nunquam felicia tempora nosse, Quam post blanditis fortuna fata maligna Nec reparanda pati infortunia sortis iniqua.

In this yere 1483 died William Dupleie who (by the translation of Laurence Both bishop of Durham and chancelor of England from the see of Durham to the cite of Yorke) was made bishop of Durham (in place of the said Laurence) by the popes bulles. For by vertue thereof, Edward the fourth in the sixteenth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of Christ 1476, directed his letters patents to the knights and other free men of that bishopricke, with all solemnitie to install the said William Dupleie (borne of the honorable house of the lords Dupleies) in the said bishopricke of Durham, and to deliuer him quiet possession therof, who was consecrated therunto in the yeare of Christ 1477, in which he worthilie gouerned six yeares, and died in this yeare, as before.]

Now of learned men that liued, and wrote in the daies of this usurper and his nephew king Edward the first, these we find recorded by John Bale. First, John Penketh an Augustine frier of Warrington in Lancashire, a right subtil fellow in disputation, following the footsteps of his master John Duns, whome he chieflie studied, he wrote diuers treatises, and made that infamous sermon at Pauls crosse, in fauour of the duke of Gloucester then protector, to the disheriting of Edward the first, his lawfull king and gouernor; John Bent or Callee borne in South Wales; George Ripley, first a chanon of Wyndleson, and after a Carmelit frier in Boston, a great mathematician, rhetorician, and poet; John Wynter a Carmelit frier of Wyllow, that proceeded doctor of diuinitie in Cambridge; and such like.

Henrie the seauenth, sonne to Ed- mund earle of Richmond, which Edmund was brother by the moother's side to Henrie the sixt.

Anno Reg. 1.

Edward
Plantagenet
earle of Warwicke sonne
and heire to George duke
of Clarence committed to the Tower.

King Henrie
commeth to London.

King Henrie hauing thus got the victorie at Bosworth, and slaine his moztall enimie there in the field, did send before his departure from Leicester, sir Robert Willoughby knight, to the manour of Sheriffhuton in the countie of Yorke, for Edward Plantagenet earle of Warwicke, sonne and heire to George duke of Clarence then being of the age of fiftene yeares; whome king Richard had kept there as prisoner during the time of his usurped reigne. Sir Robert Willoughby re-ceiuing the yong earle of the constable of that castell conueied him to London, where he was shut vp in the Tower, for doubt lest some inquiet and euill disposed persons might inuent some occasion of new trouble by this yong gentleman: and therefore king Henrie thought good to haue him sure.

There was beside him in the castell of Sheriff-huton the ladie Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Edward the fourth, whome king Richard (as ye haue heard) meant to haue married: but God otherwise ordained for hir, and preserved hir from that vnlawfull copulation and incestuous bed. Shortly after, she being accompanied with a great number as well of noblemen, as honourable matrons, was with good speed conueied to London, and brought to hir mother. In the meane season king Henrie remoued forward by soft iournies towards London, the people comming in from all sides to behold him, and exceeding reioysing at his presence, as by their voices and gestures it well appeared.

At his approaching nere to the citie, the maior and his brethren, with other worshipfull citizens, being clothed in violet, met him at Shordich, and reuerentlie saluted him: and so with great pompe and triumph he rode thorough the citie to the cathedrall church of S. Paule, where he offered three standards.
In the one was the image of saint George, in an other was a red fierie dragon beaten upon white and greene sarcenet, and in the thirde was painted a dun cote upon pellow tarterne. After his prayers said, and Te Deum song, he departed to the bishops palace, and there sojourned a season. Anon after, he assembled together the sage counsellors of the realme, in which counsell like a prince of iust faith, and true of promise, to auoid all ciuill discord, he appointed a daie to loine in marriage with the ladie Elizabeth, heire of the house of Yorke; with his noble personage, heire to the line of Lancaster. Which thing not onlie reioysed the hearts of the nobles and gentlemen of the realme, but also gained the fauours and good wils of all the commons.

After this, with great pompe he rowed into Westminster, & there the thirtieth daie of October he was with all ceremonies accustomed, annointed, & crowned king, by the whole assent as well of the commons as of the nobilitie, and called Henrie the sea-uenth of that name: which was in the yeare of the world 5452, and after the birth of our Lord 1485, in the fortie and sixt yeare of Frederike the third then emperour of Almaine, Martinian his sonne being netolie elected king of the Romans, in the second yeare of Charles the eight then king of France, and in the siue and twentieth of king James then ruling the realme of Scotland. For the establishing of all things, as well touching the preservation of his owne estate, as the commendable administration of iudice and preferment of the common wealth of his realme, he called his high court of parliament at Westminster the seauenth daie of November, wherein was atteinted Richard late duke of Glocester, calling and naming himselfe by usurpation, king Richard the thirde.

Likewise there was atteinted as chiefe alders and assistants to him in the battell at Bosworth, aduanced against the present king, John late duke of Bosfolke, Thomas earle of Surrie, Francis Louell knight vicount Lough, Walter Deuereux knight late lord Ferrers, John lord Zouch, Robert Harrington, Richard Charleton, Richard Ratcliffe, William Berkeley of Willele, Robert Spibleton, James Harrington, Robert Wakenberie, Thomas Wilmington, Walter Hopton, William Catesbie, Roger Wake, William Saprote of the countie of Huntington, Humfrie Stafford, William Clerke of Wenlocke, Gessrie saint Germaine, Richard Watkins herald of armes, Richard Reuell of Der-byshe, Thomas Bulster of the countie of Kent, John Welsh otherwise called Hastings, John Kendall late secretarie to the said Richard late duke of Glocester, John Bucke, Andrew Kat, and William Brampton of Burford.

In which atteintment neuertheless there were di-uerse clauses and promissos for the benefit of their wiues and other persons, that had or might claime anie right, title, or interest lawfullie vnto anie castles, manours, lordships, townes, towneships, honours, sons atteinted were possessed or seized to the uses of such other persons: with a speciall promiss also, that the said atteintment should not be preiudiciall to John in, of, and vpon anie other lands and tenements in notwithstanding this atteindor, diuerse of the said persons afterwards were not onely by the king pardoned, but also restored to their lands and liuings.

Moreover, in this present parlement, he caused proclamation to be made, that all men were pardoned and acquitted of their offenses, which would submit themselves to his mercie, and receiue an oth to be true and faithfull vnto him: wherevpon manie that came out of sanctuaries and other places were receiued to grace, and admitted for his subjects. After this, he began to remember his speciall friends, of whome some he aduanced to honour and dignitie, and some he enriched with goods and possessions, eue-rie man according to his deserts and merits. And to begin, his vncle Jasper earle of Penbrooke, he created duke of Bedford; Thomas lord Stanleie was created earle of Derby; and the lord Ghendew of Britaine his especiall friend, he made earle of Bath; sir Giles Daubeney was made lord Daubeney; sir Robert Willoughbie was made lord Brooke. And Edward Stafford eldest sonne to Henrie late duke of Buckingham, he restored to his name, dignitie, & possessions, which by king Richard were confiscat and atteindor. Beside this, in this parlement was this notable act assented to and concluded as fol-loweth; to the pleasure of almighty God, wealth, prosperitie, and suertie of this realme of England, and to the singular comfort of all the kings subjects of the same, in auoiding all ambiguities and questions.

croune in the line of Henrie the feuenth.

BE it ordeined, established, and enacted by this present parlement, that the inheritance of the crown of this realme of England, & also of France, with all the preheminence, and dignitie roiall to the same appertaining, all other seignories to the king belonging beyond the sea, with the appurtenances thereto in anie wise due or appertaining, shall rest, remaine, and abide, in the most roiall person of our now soueraine lord king Henrie the feuenth, and in the heires of his bodie lawfullie comming, perpetual-lie, with the grace of God so to indure, and in none other.

Beside this act, all atteindors of this king enacted by king Edward and king Richard were aduilated, and the record of the same iudged to be defaced; and all persons atteindor for his cause and occasion were restored to their goods, lands, and possessions.
Diuerse acts also made in the time of king Edward and king Richard were reuoked, and other aduiled more expedient for the common wealth were put in their places and concluded. After the dissolution of this parlement, the king remembering his friends left in hostage beyond the seas, that is to wit, the marquess Dorset, & sir John Bourchier, he with all convenient speed redeemed them, and sent also into Flanders for John Dorton bishop of Ely. These acts performed, he chose to be of his counsell a conuenient number of right grane and wise counsellers.

¶ This did he, that he might the more rosallie gouerne his kingdome, which he obtained and inioied as a thing by God elected and provided, and by his speciall fauour and gracious asper compassed and atchued. Insomuch that men commonlie report that seauen hundred nintie & seauen yeres passed, it was by a heauenlie voice reuealed to Cadwalader last king of Britains, that his stocke & progenie should reigne in this land & beare dominion againe. Where-vpon most men were perswaded in their owne opinion, that by this heauenlie voice he was provided & ordeined long before to inioy & obtaine this kingdome.
Which thing B. Henrie the first did also shew before, as it were by propheticall inspiration, at such time as the earle of Penbrooke presented the said Henrie (at that time a proper child) vnto Henrie the first, whome after he had beheld, and a good while viewed the com-lineesse of his countenance, and orderlie lineaments of his bodie, he said to such yeres as stood about him: Lo, suerlie this is he, to whome both we and our ad-uersaries, leauing the possession of all things, shall hereafter giue roime and place: & so it came to passe by the appointment of God, to whose gouernement, gift, and disposing, all realmes and all dominions are subiect, as king David confesseth, saieing:

Omnia sunt regno subdita regna Dei.

Now although by this meanes all things seemed to be brought in god and perfect order, yet there lacked a wrest to the harpe, to set all the strings in a monocord and perfect tune, which was the matrimonie to be finished betwene the king and the latie Elizabeth, daughter to king Edward. Which like a good prince, according to his oth, & promise, he did both so-lemnize & consummate shortly after, that is to saie, on the eighteenth daie of Januarie. By reason of which marriage, peace was thought to descend out of heauen into England, considering that the lines of Lancaster and York were now brought into one knot, and connered together, of whose two bodies one heire might succeed to rule and inioie the whole monarchie and realme of England, which before was rent and diuided into factions & partakings, whereby manie a mans life was lost, great spoiles made of peoples goods, wast of wealth, worship, and honor, all which ended in this blessed and gracious conuenion, authorized by God, as our Anglorum prelia falsi:

Hoc Deus omnipotens pacis confecerat auctor,

Ciuisque habuit tandem contentio finem.

Shortly after, for the better preservation of his roiall person, he constituted and ordeined a certeine number, as well of archers, as of diuerse other persons, hardie, strong, and aduise to giue daillie attendance on his person, whom he named yeomen of his gard, which president men thought that he learned of the french king when he was in France. For it is not remembered, that anie king of England before that daie vsed anie such furniture of daillie souldiers.
¶ In this same yere a new kind of sickness inuaded suddenlie the people of this land, passing through the same from the one end to the other. It began about the one and twentieth of September, and continued vntill the latter end of October, being so sharpe and deadlie, that the like was neuer heard of to anie mans remembrance before that time.

For suddenlie a deadlie burning sweate so affai-led their bodies, and dis tempered their blood with a most ardent heat, that scarce one amongst an hundred that sickened did escape with life: for all in maner as sone as the sweate took them, or within a short time after, yelded the ghost. Beside the great number which decaised within the citie of London, two maiors successiuelie died within eight daies and sir aldermen. At length, by the diligent obseruation of those that escaped (which marking what things had done them good, and helpen to their deliuerance, bled the like againe. When they fell into the same disease, the second or thirde time, as to diuerse it chanced, a remedie was found for that mortall maladie, which was this. If a man on the day time were taken with the sweat, then should he streight lie downe with all his clothes and garments, and continue in his sweat foure and twentie houres, after so moderate a soyt as might be.

If in the night he chanced to be taken, then should he not rise out of his bed for the space of foure and twentie houres, so casting the clothes that he might in no wise prouoke the sweat, but lie so temperatlie, that the water might distill out softlie of the otone accord, and to abstaine from all meat if he might so long suffer hunger, and to take no more drinke neither hot nor cold, than would moderatellie quench and assuage his thirstie appetite. Thus with lukewarme drinke, temperate heate, and meassurable cloathes manie escaped: few which bled this order (after it was found out) died of that sweat. Harie one point diligentlie about all other in this cure is to be obserued, that he neuer did put his hand or feet out of the bed to refresh or coole himselfe, which to do is no lesse teopardie than thort and present death. Thus this disease comming in the first yeare of king Henries reigne, was iudged (of some) to be a token and signe of a troublous reigne of the same king, as the profe partlie afterwards shewed it selfe.

The king requested a prest of six thousand marks.

The king standing in need of monie to discharge such debts, and to mainteine such port as was behoofull, sent the lord tresuroz with maister Reginald Bzaine, and others, unto the lord maiorz of London, requiring of the cite a prest of six thousand marks. Whereupon the said lord maiorz and his brethren, with the commons of the cite, granted a prest of six thousand pounds, which was leued of the companies, and not of the wards: and in the yeare next ensuing, it was well and trulie againe repaid euerie penie, to the good contentation and satisfieng of them that disbursed it. The king considering that the suertie of his roiall estate and defense of the realme consisted theselle in good lawes and ordinaunces to be had and obserued among his people, summoned estates his high court of parlement, therein to deuise and establish some profitable aas and statutes, for the wealth and commoditie of his people.

A parlement summoned & new lawes

monwealth

The king goeth into the North.

After this, hauing let things in quiet about London, he take his tourne into the North parts, there to purge all the breges of malicious treason that might rest in the hearts of vnguiet persons, and namelie in Yorkshire, where the people bare more fauour unto king Richard in his life time, than those of anie other part of the realme had commonlie done. He kept the feast of Easter at Lincoln; where he was certified that the lord Louell and Humfreie Stafford, and Thomas Stafford, his brother, were departed out of the sanctuarie at Colchester, to what place or whither, no man as yet could tell. The king little regarding the matter, kept on his tourne, and came to Poike, where as soon as he was once settled, it was openlie shewed and declared for a truth to the king himselfe, that Francis lord Louell was at hand with a strong and mightie power of men, and would with all diligence inuade the cite.

A rebellion made by the

and others.

Humfreie Stafford,
Thomas
Stafford.

It was also told him, that the forenamed Staffords were in Worcester-shire, and had raised a great band of the countrie people and commons there, and had cast lots what part should assaile the gates, what men should scale the walls of the cite of Worcester, and who should let the passages for letting of rescues and others. The king could not beleue this report to be true at the first, but after that, by letters of credence sent from his friends, he was fullie persuaded that it was so true, he was put in no small feare, and not without great cause. For he wisely considered, that he neither had anie competent armie ready, nor convenient furniture to arme them that were present: and also he was in such place, where he could not assemble anie power, but of those whome he soze mistrusted, as friends to them that were most his enemies; the memorie of king Richard as yet being not amongst them forgotten nor twome out of mind.

But bicause the matter required quicke expedition, he appointed the duke of Bedford with three thousand men not altogether the best armed (for their best plates for the most part were of tanned leather) to march forth against the lord Louell, and to set upon him without anie lingering of time. The duke hastening forward, approached to the campe of his enemies, & before he would assaile them, he caused the heralds to make proclamation, that all those that would depart from their armour, and submit themselves as subiects unto their naturall prince and soueraigne lord, should be pardoned of all former offenses. The lord Louell upon this proclamation, either putting mistrust in his souldiers, or fearing himselfe in his owne behalfe, fled priuilie in a night from his companie, and left them as a flocke of sheepe without a shepheard.

Which departure of the lord when his armie understood, it put the souldiers in such despaire of atchieving anie further enterpryse, that they immediatlie put off their armour, and came directlie unto the duke, euerie man humbly submitting himselfe, and desiring pardon of his offenses. So in this wise was that dangerous storme and cruell rage of those furious rebels appeased, which was doubted would haue growne to the destruction of manie a man. The lord Louell the procurer of this businesse, escaping alwaie got him into Lancashire, and there for a certeine space lay lurking in secret with sir Thomas Blough-ton knight, which in those parties was a man of no small authoritie and power.

Sir Humfreie Stafford also, hearing what had happened to the lord Louell, in great displeasure and sorrowe, and for feare lest his enterpryse, and in like manner fled, and took sanctuarie at Colham, a village not past two miles from Abindon. But bicause that sanctuarie was not a sufficient defense (as was proued before the iustices of the kings Bench) for traitours, he was taken from that place, & brought to the Tower, & after put to execution at Abome: but his brother Thomas that was with him, was pardoned, bicause he was thought not to haue attempted anie thing of himselfe other wise than by the euill counsell and persuation of his elder brother. After that the king had quieted all these commotions and tumults, and reformed the rude and babling people of the North parts, he returned to London.

In this yeare John Persuall, one of the maiors of Londons officers, and his caruer, was chosen one of the Shyrrifes of London. For when the maiors (as the custome of London is) doth elect one of the Shyrrifes of London for the yeare ensuing, by taking and drinking a cup of wine to such a one as he list to name Shyrrife; the maior for the time being, whose name was sir Henrie Collet, took the cup of wine, and dranke unto the aforesaid John Persuall his caruer standing bareheaded before him, and walking upon his bowd, and called him Shyrrife of London for the yeare ensuing: and forthwith the said maior caused the same Persuall to sit downe at his owne table, and to couer his head. And the same Persuall took upon him the office of Shyrrifallie, and after was maior of London, and was made knight.]

fame altogether false and fained, there was an open path made and beaten forth, for a greater inconuenience to insue. The which matter might seeme verie strange, how such trouble and mischefe should grow thereof, if the time were not considered, in which it happened. For in those daies manie persons, either borne in the wombe of continuall dissention, or nourished with the milke of ciuill sedition, could not for-beare their vsuall custome of mouing strife, and sol-uing debate, euer glad to haue anie occasion, though neuer so small, to stirre vpproces of warre, and slaughter of people. Which men if they knew (a matter of weightie conceipt) the hurts thereof, they would be as earnest in seeking after peace as they are griedie in pursuit of warre, speciallie ciuill warre: but the cause whie they are defective therein, is the want of mekenesse and humilitie, as the wiseman saith:

Mite cor horribili seditione vacat.

Amongst other such monsters and limmes of the duell, there was one sir Richard Simond priest, a man of base birth, and yet well learned, but not so learned as willie, nor so willie as vngacious, delighting in fraud & deceit, euen from his youth. He had a scholer called Lambert Simenell, one of a gentle nature and pregnant wit, to be the organe and cheefe instrument, by the which he might conueie and bring to passe his mischeuous attempt. The diuell cheefe master of such practises, put in the venemous baine of this dissuall and traitorous priest, to deuise how he might make his scholer the foresaid Lambert to be reputed as right inheritor to the crowne of this realme: namelie, for that the same went that king Edwards childzen were not dead, but fled secretlie into some strange place, and there to be liuing: and that Edward earle of Warwike, sonne and heire to the duke of Clarence, either was, or shoulde should be put to death.

These rumors though they seemed not to be grounded of anie likelihood to the wiser sort of men, yet incouraged this pœuish priest to thinke the time come, that his scholer Lambert might take vpon him the person and name of one of king Edwards childzen.
And herevpon at Wysox, where their abiding was, the said priest instructed his pupill both with prince-lie behaviour, ciuill maners, and good literature, declaring to him of what linage he should affirme himselfe to be descended, and omitted nothing that might serue for his purpose. Some after, the rumor was blowne abroad, that the earle of Warwike was broken out of prison. And when the priest sir Richard Simond heard of this, he straight intended now by that occasion to bring his inuented purpose to passe, and changing the childes name of baptisme, called him Edward, after the name of the yong earle of War-wike, the which were both of like yeares, and of like stature.

Then he with his scholer sailed into Ireland, where he so set forth the matter vnto the nobilitie of that countrie, that not onelie the lord Thomas Cera-dine chancelor of that land deceiued through his craft-ie tale, receiued the counterfeite earle into his castell with all honour and reuerence; but also manie other noble men determined to aid him (with all their powers) as one descended of the blond roiall, and lineallie come of the house of Paske, which the Irish people euermore highlie fauoured, honoured, and loued aboue all other. By this meanes euerie man throughout all Ireland was willing and readie to take his part, and to submit themselves to him; already reputing and calling him of all hands king. So that now they of this sect (by the abuse of the priest) sent into England certeine priuie messengers to get friends here.

Also they sent into Flanders to the ladie Margaret, sister to king Edward, & late wife to Charles duke of Burgognie, to purchase aid and helpe at hir hands. This ladie Margaret bare no small rule in the low countries, and in verie deed soze grudged in hir heart, that king Henrie (being descended of the house of Lancaster) should reigne and gouerne the realme of England: and therefore, though she well vnderstood that this was but a coloured matter; yet to worke hir malicious intencion against king Henrie, she was glad to haue so fit an occasion: and therfore promised the messengers all the aid that she should be able to make in furtherance of the quarrell; and also to procure all the friends she could in other places, to be aiders and partakers of the same conspiracie.

King Henrie aduertised of all these doings, was greatlie vexed therewith: and therefore to haue good advice in the matter, he called together his counsell at the Charterhouse beside his manor of Richmond, and there consulted with them, by which means best this begun conspiracie might be appeased and disappointed without more disturbance. It was therefore determined, that a generall pardon should be published to all offenders that were content to receiue the same. This pardon was so frelie granted, that no offense was excepted, no not so much as high treason committed against the kings roiall person. It was further agreed in the same counsell for the time then present, that the earle of Warwike should personal-lie be shewed abroad in the citie, and other publike places: whereby the vntreue report falselie spread abroad, that he should be in Ireland, might be among the communalitie proued and knowne for a baine imagined lie.

In this solenne counsell, diuerse & manie things for the wealth of the realme were debated and concluded. And among other it was determined, that the ladie Elizabeth wife to king Edward the fourth, should lose and forfeit all hir lands and possessions, because she had voluntarilie submitted hir selfe and hir daughters wholie to the hands of king Richard, contrarie to hir promise made to the lords and nobles of this realme in the beginning of the conspiracie made against king Richard, whereby she did inough to haue quailed all the purpose of them that joined with hir in that matter. But though hir fault was greuous, yet was it iudged by some men that she deser-ued not by equitie of iustice so great a losse and punishment. Wholoebeit, this iudgement was altogether affectionate and parciall in hir behalfe; besides that it was reasonable in great measure (all circumstances considered) for she was not lightlie induced to do as she did, neither stood it with the frailtie of a woman to withstand the temptations of a mightie man, or rather a reaching tyrant.

But such was hir chance by hir lightnesse and inconstancie, that she wan the displeasure of manie men, and for that cause liued after in the abbete of Bermondseie beside Southwarke a wretched and a miserable life, where not manie yeares after she deceased, and is buried with hir husband at Windsoze.
Though fortune thus ruleth manie things at hir ple-sure, yet one worke that this quene accomplished cannot be forgotten: for in the life time of hir husband king Edward the fourth, she founded and erected a notable colledge in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, for the finding of scholers and students of the same vniuersitie, and endowd it with sufficient possessions for the long maintenance of the same, which at this daie is called the Quenes colledge.

When all things in this counsell were sagelie concluded and agreed to the kings mind, he returned to London; giuing in commandement, that the next sundaie insuing, Edward the yong earle of Warwhiche should be brought from the Tower through the most publicke streets in all London, to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, where he went openlie in procession, that euerie man might see him, hauing communication with manie noble men, and with them especiallie that were suspected to be partakers of the late begun conspiracie; that they might perceiue how the Irishmen vpon a vaine shadowe moued warre against the king and his realme. But this medicine little auailed euill disposed persons. For the earle of Lincolne sonne to John de la Pole duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth, thought it not meet to neglect and omit to reade an occasion of new trouble.

All matter followed to the p[ro]u[er]b.

Wherefore they determined to vphold the enterprise of the Irishmen, and other complices of this conspiracie: so that consulting with sir Thomas Broughton, and certaine other of his most trustie friends, he purposed to saile into Flanders to his aunt the ladie Margaret duchesse of Burgognie, trusting by hir helpe to make a puissant armie, and to ioin with the companions of the new raised rebellion. Therefore after the dissolution of the parlement which then was holden, he fled secretlie into Flanders vnto the said ladie Margaret; where Francis lord Louell landed certeine daies before. Where after long consultation had how to proceed in their business, it was agreed, that the earle of Lincolne, and the lord Louell should go into Ireland; and there to attend vpon the duchesse hir counterfeited nephew, and to honor him as a king, and with the power of the Irishmen to bring him into England.

Now they concluded, that if their doings had successe, then the foresaid Lambert (misnamed the earle of Warwicke) should by consent of the counsell be deposed, and Edward the true earle of Warwicke delivered out of prison and anointed king. King Henrie supposing that no man would haue bene so mad as to haue attempted anie further enterprise in the name of that new found & counterfeited earle, he onelie studied how to subdue the rebellious conspiracie of the Irishmen. But hearing that the earle of Lincolne was fled into Flanders, he was somewhat moued therewith, and caused soldiors to be put in a readinesse out of euerie part of his realme, and to bring them into one place assigned, that when his aduersaries should appeare, he might suddenly set vpon them, vanquish and overcome them.

The marques Dofet committed to
the Tower.

Thus disposing things for his sauetie, he went towards S. Edmunds burie, and being certified that the marquesse Dofet was coming towards his maiestie, to excuse himselfe of things that he was suspected to haue done when he was in France, he sent the earle of Dyford to arrest the said marquesse by the waie, and to conueie him to the Tower of London, there to remaine till his truth might be tried. From thence the A. went forth to Poewich, and tarrieng there Chastimasse daie, he departed after to Walsingham, where he offered to the image of our ladie, and then by Cambridge he hoztly returned to London. In which meane time, the earle of Lincolne had gotten together by the aid of the ladie Margaret about two thousand Almains, with one Martine Sward, a valiant and noble capteine to lead them.

Martine Sward a valiant capteine
of Almains,
assistant to the earle of Lin-colne.

With this power the earle of Lincolne sailed into Ireland, and at the citie of Diuelin caused yong Lambert to be proclaimed and named king of England, after the most solemne fashion, as though he were the verte heire of the bloud roiall lineallie borne and descended. And so with a great multitude of beggerlie Irishmen, almost all naked and unarmed, saving skains and mantels, of whome the lord Thomas Ceran line was capteine and conducto; they sailed into England with this new found king, and landed for a purpose at the pile of Fowdrie, within a litle of Lancaster, trusting there to find aid by the means of sir Thomas Broughton, one of the chiefe companions of the conspiracie.

The king had knowledge of the enemies intent before their arrivall, and therefore hauing assembled a great armie (ouer the which the duke of Bedford, and the earle of Ardenford were chiefe capteins) he went to Countreie, where he was aduertised, that the earle of Lincolne was landed at Lancaster with his new king. Where he took aduise of his counsellors what was best to be done, whether to set on the enemies without further delaie, or to protract time a while. But at length it was thought best to delaie no time, but to giue them battell, before they should increase their power, and therevpon he remoured to Potingham, & there by a litle wood called Botwyes, he pitched his field.

Shortlie after this came to him the lord George Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, the lord Strange, sir John Cheinie, right valiant capteins, with manie other noble and expert men of warre, namelie of the countries nere adioining; so that the kings armie was wonderfullie increased. In this space the earle of Lincolne being entered into Poekethire, passed soltie on his iournie without spoiling or hurting of anie man, trusting thereby to haue some companie of people resort vnto him. But after he perceived few or none to follow him, and that it was too late now to retorne backe, he determined to trie the matter by dint of sword, and herevpon directed his waie from Poekethire to Shewarke vpon Trent.

But before he came there, king Henrie knowing all his enemies purposes, came the night before the daie of the battell to Shewarke; and tarrieng there a litle, went thre miles further, and pitching his field, lodged there that night. The earle of Lincolne certified of his coming, was nothing abashed, but kept still on his iournie; and at a litle bilage called Stoke, nigh to the king and his armie, set downe his campe. The next daie the king diuided his whole power into thre battells, and after in god arraie approached nigh to the towne of Stoke. The earle likewise set forth his armie, and incounting with the kings people in a faire plaine there, met for the triall of such a conflict, set vpon them with a manlie courage, desiring his soldiors to remember his honour and their owne liues.

When both the armies ioined and fought verie earnestlie, in so much that the Almains, being tried and expert men of warre, were in all things, as well in strength as policie, equals and matches to the Englishmen. But as for Martine Sward their coronell, few of the Englishmen, either in valiant courage, or strength, and nimblenesse of bodie was to him comparable. On the other side, the Irishmen, although they fought manfullie, and stucke to it valiantlie; yet because they were (after the maner of their countreie) almost naked, without anie conuenient furniture of armour, they were stricken downe and slaine like dull & brute beasts, which was a great discouragement to the residue of the companie. Thus they fought for a space so long and so egerlie on both parts, that no man could well iudge to whome the victorie was like to incline.

But at length the kings foreward being full of people, and well fortified with wings, which onelie both began and continued the fight, set vpon the aduersaries with such force and violence, that first they oppelled and killed such capteins, one by one, as resisted their might and puissance: and after that, put all the other to flight, the which were either apprehended as prisoners in their running awaie, or else slaine.

slaine and brought vnto confusion in a small moment. Now when this battell was ended, and fought out to the extremitie, then it well appeared, what high prowesse, what manfull stomachs, what hardie and courageous hearts rested in the kings aduersaries. For there the chiefe capitaine, the earle of Lincolne, and the lord Louell, sir Thomas Broughton, Martine Sward, and the lord Gerardine capitaine of the Irishmen were slaine, and found dead in the verie places which they had chosen alieue to fight in, not giuing one foot of ground to their aduersaries.

Howbeit some affirme, that the lord Louell took his horse, and would haue fled ouer Trent, but was not able to recover the further side for the highnesse of the banke, and so was drowned in the river. There were killed at that battell, with their five capitaine beforechered, of that partie about foure thousand. Of the kings part there were not halfe of them which fought in the foreward, and gaue the onset slaine or hurt. Then was Lambert the youngling, which was falslie reported to be the sonne of the duke of Clarence, and his maister sir Richard Simond priest both taken, but neither of them put to death; because that Lambert was but an innocent, and of yeares insufficient of himselfe to do any such enterprise; and the other was pardoned of life, because he was a priest, and anointed man; but yet was committed to perpetuall prison.

Lambert was at length made one of the kings falconers, after that he had bene a turnebroch for a space in the kings kitchen. This battell was fought on a saturday being the sixteenth daie of June, in this second yere of his reigne. In this yere died Thomas Bourchier archbishop of Canturburie; and John Spotton bishop of Ely, a man of excellent learning, vertue and policie, succeeded in his place, whom Alexander pope of Rome, the first of that name, created a cardinall, and the king created him also chancellor of England. Of which pope (hauing so conuenient a place to speake) it were a fault to omit the ambition, accompanied with other disorders vnbefitting a successor of Peter (but neither personallie nor localle) as all the brood of them bzag of themselves; & will be intituled with a pyramie, vsurped.

This Alexander the first pope of that name, was sometime an ancient cardinall, and one of the greatest in all the court of Rome. One meane that raised him to the seat of the pope, was the difference betwene the cardinals Ascanius Sforze, and Julian S. Petri ad Vincula: but the chiefe thing that accomplished his election, was, that with a new example for that time, he bought by the consent and knowledge of euery one, partlie for monie, and partlie with promises of offices and great dignities, manie voices of the cardinals, who reiecting the instruction of the gospell, were not ashamed to passe to him by sale, an authoritie and potuer to make merchandize of the holie treasures, & that with the name of the celestiall authoritie in the most high part of the temple.

To which abhominable & too prophane negotiation manie of them were induced by the cardinall Ascanius, but that was not more with persuasions and suites, than with his example: for that being corrupted with the insatiable desire of riches, he made the pope promise him for his hire and recompense of so great wickednesse, the office of vicechancellorship (the principallest place in the court of Rome) together with benefices, castles, and his palace of Rome full of mouables of great valour. But the pope for all this could not auoid; neither for the time to come, the iudgement and iustice of God; nor for the present, the infamie and iust hate of men, in whom for this election was no small impressions of astonishment and horror, nor onelie for that it was intangled with meanes dishonest, but also because the natures and conditions of the man chosen, were (for the greatest part) known to manie.

Manie sentences and coniectures were made of his successe. And amongst other, Ferdinand king of Naples, dissembling openlie the griefe he had of that election, signified to the quene his wife with teares (which he was wont to forbear even in the death of his children) that there was created a pope who would be most hurtfull to Italie, and the whole common weale of christendome. A iudgement not vnwoorthie of the wisdom of such a prince: for that in Alexander the first (for so would this new pope be called) was a subtiltie, sharpnesse, and expedition of wit most singular, a counsell excellent, a wonderfull efficacy in persuation, and in all great affaires a iudgement and care incredible. But these vertues were maruellouslie defaced by his vices, for touching his maners and customes, they were verie dishonest, in his administration he expressed little sinceritie, in his countenance no shame, in his words small truth, in his heart little faith, and in his opinion lesse religion. Of the contrarie, all his actions were defiled with an insatiable couetousnesse, and immoderate ambition, a barbarous crueltie, and a burning desire to raise and make great (by what meanes soeuer) his children, who were manie in number; and amongst others, one no lesse detestable than the father, to whose cursed counsels he became a wicked instrument. Thus much (by waie of digression) of Alexander, a pope (as you heare) well qualified, and therefore forward enough to creat cardinals both in England and elsewhere of like disposition. But to returne to the storie.]

After that the king had got the vpper hand of his enemies, he removed to Lincolne, and there taried thre daies, causing euery of the same daies solemn processions to be made in rendering thanks to God for his fortunate victorie. Then caused he execution to be done, of such rebels & traitors as were taken in the field, either at the battell, or in the chase. And shortly after he went into Dorsetshire, & there coasted the countrie ouerthwart, searching out such as had aided his enemies, and were thought to be seditious persons, whom he punished, some by imprisonment, some by fines, and some by death: according to the qualitie of their offences, and as was thought most expedient [not by extremitie of rigor inclining to tyrannie, but by due moderation of iustice tempering execution with clemencie; according to the good rule of iustice prescribed by the wise man, saying:

Solus commissum plebat clementia crimen, Parua negat poenam culpa subire grauem.

About the middelt of August entering into the third yere of his reigne, he came to Newcastle vpon Tyne, and from thence sent in ambassage into Scotland Richard For, latelie before made bishop of Excester, and with him Richard Edgecombe knight, controller of his house, to conclude some peace or truce with king James of Scotland. The English ambassadors were honozable receiued, and longlie interteined of the said king, who gladlie would haue concluded a perpetuall peace with the king of England, if he might haue bene licenced so to haue done: but his people being stedfast in their old accustomed blage, would not agree to any peace, but yet were contented to gratifie their king, that he should take truce with England for the tearme of seuen yeares, which was concluded.

Then was secret promise made by king James, that he would not onlie obserue peace, & continue in perfect amitie with the king of England during his life, but also would renew againe this truce new taken for other seuen yeares, before the first seuen yeares were fullie expired. The king of Scots indeed was as desirous of the king of Englands friendship, as the king of England was of his : because that his subiects bare him much euill will, mistaking with all things that either he could do or saie. [So that his regiment was no longer liked, than they were in a good mood, which was when they were well minded; and that was neuer : for that if by gentleness he allured them, they esteemed him a flatterer; if by severity, a tyrant. And therefore it stood him vpon to strengthen himselfe against such a people, of whose pleasure & displeasure depended his estate.]

King Henrie returneth out of the north countrie.

The French kings request for aid against Francis duke of Britaine.

13. Henrie after the returne of his ambassadors out of Scotland, came from Peterhead to Forke, and so toward London, and in the way being at Leicester, there came to him ambassadors from Charles the French king, which declared both the recouerie of certeine towne out of the hands of Maximilian king of Romans, which he had wrongfullie detained from the crowne of France before that time; and also that their maister king Charles had now wars in hand against Francis duke of Britaine, because that he succoured and maintained diuers noble men, as the duke of Alenche and others, that were rebels and traitors, against him and the realme of France. Wherefore his request was, that for the old familiaritie that had bene betwixt them, he would either assist and helpe him, or else stand neuter betwixt them, neither helping nor yet hurting the one nor the other.

Upon good and deliberate aduise taken in this matter, because it was iudged weightie, the king for answer told the french ambassadors, that he would neither spare paine nor cost, to set some reasonable state betwixt their soueraine lord king Charles, and the duke of Britaine : so that a final end and some perfect conclusion of friendship might be had betwixt them. And so as soon as the French ambassadors were returned home, the king sent his chapleine Christopher Urswike ouer into France to king Charles, as well to shew that he was glad of the victorie which he had against Maximilian; as to declare that a tempestuous storme of ciuill rebellion himselfe had escaped & ouercome here in England.

King Henries offer to make an attonement betwixt the French king and the duke.

Christopher Urswike.

But the chiefest point of Urswikes errand consisted in this, that he should intimate to the French king, how his maister king Henrie offered himselfe as a mediator betwixt him and the duke of Britaine, to make them friends : and if he perceived that the French king gaue care hereunto, then should he go into Britaine, to moue the duke there to be contented, that some reasonable order might be taken for a quietnesse to be had betwixt the French king and him. Whilest Urswike was travelling in this matter (according to his commission) the king came backe againe to London, where he was receiued of the citizens with great joy and triumph, they being heartilie glad and greatly reioicing that he with such good successe had subdued his enemies.

The marques Dorset deliuered out of the Tower.

The kings loue to his wife queene Elizabeth.

Shortlie after, he deliuered the lord Thomas marques Dorset out of the Tower, receiuing him againe to his former fauor and old familiaritie : because his truth and loialtie by diuers assaies and sundrie arguments had bene thoroughlie tried, and sufficientlie proued. In which meane time, the king for the great loue that he bare to his wife queene Elizabeth, caused hir to be crowned and anointed queene on saint Batharins day in November, with all solemnitie, as in such cases apperteineth. In the meane season Christopher Urswike (according to his commission) travelled betwixt the French king and the duke of Britaine in the king of Englands name, to make them friends. But although the French king seemed willing enough to haue peace, yet meant he nothing lesse. For he had as manie subtilties in his heart, as there be faces in the world, according to the poet:

For whilest he went about with faire words, courteous letters, and sweet promises to beare the king of England in hand to labour a peace betwixt him and the Britains, he enforced his whole puissance to subdue them, and besieged the citie of Hants. And on the other part, the duke of Alenche being withdrawne to the duke of Britaine, and one that ruled most about him, had no liking to heare of peace, but did what he could to hinder it. The English ambassador Christopher Urswike (having thus passed from the French king to the duke of Britaine, and backe againe to the French king) returned hostilie after into England, and shewed vnto king Henrie what he had done betwixt them.

Immediatlie after came to the French king the lord Bernard Daubeneie a Scot borne, which on the French kings behalfe required 13. Henrie to make some maner of end of those Brittish warres, whatsoeuer it were. King Henrie being desirous of the same, sent ouer againe into France, John the abbat of Abingdon, sir Richard Edgecombe knight, and the forenamed Christopher Urswike, with full and perfect commission & long instructions how to proceed, in obtaining of some agreement betwixt the French men and the Britons. These orators (according as they had in commandement) first went vnto the French king, and after they had communed with him, sir Richard Edgecombe, and Christopher Urswike departed straight to the duke of Britaine, in full hope to conclude a peace, vpon such offers and articles as they had to propound vnto him.

But all their hope was vaine, for the duke refused to agree vpon anie such articles and conditions as they offered; and so without concluding anie thing with the duke, they returned backe into France; and from thence signified to the king of England by letters all that they knew, or had done. But in the meane time, Edward lord Mowbray, uncle to the 40. queene, sued to king Henrie that he might haue a power of men appointed to him, with the which he would steale priuilie ouer without licence or passport, so that euerie man should thinke that he was fled the realme, without knowledge of the king, for that no warre should arise by his meanes betwixt the realmes of France and England, and yet should the duke of Britaine be aided against the power of the Frenchmen, which sought to vanquish him, that they might loine his countrie vnto the dominion of France : which in no wise ought to be suffered, considering what annoiance & hurt the same might bring to the realme of England in time to come.

Although this request was utterly denied, and that the lord Mowbray was straightlie commanded by the king to make no such attempt; yet could not all that staie him, but that withdrawing him into the Ile of Wight, whereof he was made ruler and capitaine, he there gathered together a cruoe of tall & hardie personages, to the number of 400, & with prosperous wind & weather arrived in Britaine, and loined himselfe with the Britons against the Frenchmen. The French king aduertised herof, was not well pleased in his mind towards the king of England; till 13. Henrie by new messengers informed him how gallantly he was in the matter, and that by plaine and euident proofes. With the which excuse the French king seemed to be the better pacified, and was content to dissemble the matter.

Then the English ambassadors, renewing the league and amitie betwixt king Henrie & the French king, for the space of twelue moneths, they returned into England, and shewed the king all things that they had either heard or seene : so that he perceived that the French king dealt craftilie in this matter of Britaine,

The duke of Alenche being with the duke of Britaine.

Edward lord Mowbray uncle to the queene.

Lord Mowbray gathered a power into the Ile of Wight.

The league renewed betwixt king Henrie and the French king.

Britaine, still motioning peace when he meant nothing else but warre. He therefore called his high court of parlement, in the which it was not onelie determined that the duke of Britaine should be aided with a power of men against the wrongfull invasions of the Frenchmen, but also there were diuerse summes of monie granted to the furnishing forth and maintenance of the same. And immediatlie herupon, the king sent his ambassadoys into France to certifie the french king what the estates assembled in parlement here in England had decreed.

Wherefore he required him either to surceasse the warres which he had in hand against the Britons, or else not to be greued though he condescended to the iudgement and determination of the lords both spirituall and temporall, and commons of his realme, in taking vpon him the defense of the duke of Britaine; promising neuertheless that the English armie should onelie take land within the duchie of Britaine, and seeke to defend the same against all those that did invade it, and not to make anie warre within the french dominions. This message was nothing regarded of the french king, in so much that the french armie proceeded in oppressing the Britons, destroying the countrey, and besieging towncs.

At length on the seuen and twentieth, (as the chronicles of Anjou haue) the eight and twentieth daie of Julie, the duke of Britains armie gaue battell to the french host nere to a towne called saint Aubin, hauing apparelled a thousand and seuen hundred of the Britons in coates with red crosses, after the English fashion, to make the frenchmen beleue that they had a great number of Englishmen, although they had but foure hundred onelie with the lord Moulle. The victorie in this battell fell to the frenchmen, so that almost all the Englishmen were slaine with the lord Moulle, beside sir thousand Britons. The duke of Orleans and the prince of Dainge were taken prisoners, which were there on the Britons part. The frenchmen lost twelue hundred men, and amongst other, that valiant Italian capteine James Galeot.

These newes being brought into England, caused king Henrie to make hast in sending forth his armie, and therefore was the lord Brooke, with sir John Cheine, sir John Spiddleton, sir Rafe Hilton, sir Richard Corbet, sir Thomas Leighton, sir Richard Laton, and sir Edmund Cornetwall sent ouer into Britaine with all convenient speed, hauing with them an eight thousand men, well armed and furnished in warlike wise, to aid the duke of Britaine against the frenchmen. These lustie capteins being arrived in Britaine, after they had a little refreshed them, marched forward, and comming nere to their enemies, pitched downe their field, not farre from the frenchmens campe.

The frenchmen by experience knowing the Englishmen so long as they be fresh and lustie) in maner to be inuincible, thought not good to match with them in open battell, till they were somewhat wearied with lying and lingering abroad in the field. And therefore at the first they sought to wearie them with light skirmishes, appointing their hoarsemen to giue them alarmes, & some skirmishes; in the which the frenchmen, by reason of the English archers (which galled both men and horses) were euer put to the worse. But behold the mutabilitie of worldlie chances! While this warre was thus set forward, Francis duke of Britaine departed this life, & then the cheefe rulers of Britaine, falling at dissention among themselves, tendered not the defense of their countrey, but rather minded the destruction thereof.

Whereupon the Englishmen, perceiving in what danger they were, and considering that it was in the midst of winter, a time not meet for men of warre to lie in the cold and frostie fields, they returned into England, within five monethes after their first setting forth. So that finally the french king got the vpper hand of the Britons, and did incorporate that duchie to his realme and crowne of France, as in the historie of France it may appeare at large. ¶ In Julie this yere was a pest lentied for the king in the citie of London, of foure thousand pounds, which was repaied the yere next following. In September, the queene was deliuered at Winchester of hir first sonne, named prince Arthur; and the five and twentieth of Nouember (next ensuing) he was crowned at Westminster with all due solemnitie.

As haue heard, how there was in the last parlement monie granted for the furnishing forth of the armie into Britaine; that is to wit, it was agreed, that euerie man should be taxed after the rate of his substance, to paie the tenth partie of his goods. Which monie the most part of them that dwelled in the bishopricke of Durham, and in the parties of Northshire refused vnto to paie: either for that they thought themselves ouercharged with the same; or were procured to shew themselves disobedient, thorough the euill counsell of some seditious persons, which conspired against the king, to put him to new trouble. Therefore such as were appointed collectors, after that they could not get the monie, according to their extract deliuered to them by the commissioners, they made their complaint priuilie to Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, chiefe ruler of the North parts.

The earle forthwith signified to the king all that matter, and the king not willing to pardon them of anie one partie (least the example might do hurt by encouraging others to shew the like stubbornnes in other parts of the realme) commanded the earle either by distresse or otherwise, to leaue the monie as he should thinke most meet. The rude and beastlie people hearing of this answer from the king, by and by with great violence set vpon the earle by the exciting of a simple fellow named John a Chamber, whome the earle with faire words sought to appease. But they like vnreasonable villaines, alledging all the fault to be in him, as chiefe author of the tax, furiously and cruelly murdered both him and diuerse of his household seruants. Diuerse asseme that the Northmerne men bare against this earle continuall grudge euer since the death of king Richard, whome they entircly favoured.

Although this offense was great and heinous; yet there succeeded a more mischief: for incontinentlie (to cloke this presumptuous murder) the Northmerne men got them to armour, and assembling together, chose them a capteine, no lesse seditious than desirous of trouble, called sir John Egremond knight; and passing by the countreies, they published and declared that they would bid the king battell onlie in defense of their liberties & common freedom, of the which he went about to bereaue them. But when the matter should come to be tried with blowes, their harts so fainted that they scattered a waie, euerie man seeking to saue himselfe by flight: but that little auailed them.

For the king hearing of this businesse, sent forth Thomas earle of Surreie (whome not long before he had deliuered out of the Towre, and receiued to his speciall fauour) with a cruoe of men, to chastise those rebels of the north parts, who skirmished with a certeine companie of them, and them discomfited, and tooke alius John a Chamber, the first beginner of this rebellion. The king himselfe rood after into Northshire, of whose comming the Surreie rebels were so abashed and afraid, that they fled more and lesse: which afterward were apprehended, and punished.

shed according to their demerits. Yet the king of his clemencie pardoned the innocent people, and executed the chiefe procurers. For John a Chamber was hanged at Yorke on a gibbet set vpon a square plices and lewd disciples were hanged on the lower gallowes round about their maister, to the terrible example of other.

But sir John Grenmond fled into Flanders to the ladie Margarete duchesse of Burgognie, that euer enmied the prosperitie of king Henrie. After this the king returned to London, leauing the earle of Surreie to rule the north parts, and appointed sir Richard Cunsaill, a man of great wit and policie, to gather the subsidie to him due of the people. This yeare the king borrowed of euery alderman of London two hundred pounds, and of the Chamber nine thousand eightie two pounds seuentene shillings foure pence; which he repaid againe to the bittermost, with great equitie and thankfulness. A vertue verie laudable in this god king, and so much the more noteworthy as it is rare, speciallie in mightie men and great estates of the world, that count what soeuer they can catch their owne, as though the purses of the people were theirs to possesse at pleasure & vse at soule fault Ecclesiasticus noteth (affirming that all is lost that is lent them) in expresse words, sayeng :

Reddere magnates nolunt, que mutua sumunt, Mutua que trades interisse scias.

In this season, the emperor Frederike made warre against the Flemings, namelie against Bruges and certeine townes of Flanders, which had rebelled against his sonne Marimilian king of Romans, their liege and souereigne lord; in so much that they of Bruges had not onelie slaine his officers but imprisoned him within their towne, till they had caused him to pardon all their offences, and also to swear neuer to remember, nor reuenge the same in time to come. But his father Frederike the emperour could not suffer such a reproch & dishonour done to his sonne (whose fame & princelie estate as he tendered and had in gelosie; so was it his hart grieue and inmoderat vexation that he should be abused of open contentners, in such villanous sort as tended highlie to the indignitie of his person, and the aggrauating of their offense and punishment) to passe unreuenged, & therefore scourged the countrie of Flanders with sharpe and cruell warre.

The lord of Hauensfeine being dynen to take the same oath, that his maister Marimilian toke at Bruges, to shew that the warre was not begun with his assent, to take Marimilian his lord, and toke the towntes of Ypre and Sluis, with both the castles of the same haueu, and further did not onelie stir the Cantois, Brugeans, and other towne of Flanders, to rebell against their souereigne lord; but also sent to the French kings lieutenant in Picardie, the lord Cordey, to aid him to conquer such towne of Flanders, as were not of his opinion. The lord Cordey, otherwise called monsieur de Querdes, was glad to haue so good occasion to set foot in Flanders, as he that had sufficient instructions of his maister the French king, vpon anie such offered occasion so to do, sent forthwith to the aid of the Flemings eight thousand Frenchmen, commanding them to conquer such towne, as were in the waie betwixt France and Bruges.

The captiues, according to his denisse, besieged a little walled towne called Dirmew, to whome came four thousand Flemings with biftels and artillerie, sent from the lord of Hauensfeine. They laid siege on the north side of the towne, in a marish ground then being drie, and so depeleie ditched and rampired their campe about (on which rampire they laid their ordinance) that it was in manner impossible to enter their campe, or do them anie displeasure or damage. The king of England was dailie aduertised of the doings, which nothing lesse desired than to haue the English pauement that mischief in time, with all expedition he sent ouer to the lord Daubeneie, then his deputie at Calis, the lord Pooleie, with a crue of valiant archers & souldiers, to the number of a thousand men, with priuie instructions what they should do.

At their comming ouer it was hanted abroad, that they were sent onelie to defend the English pale, against all attempts that might vpon the sudden in anie wise be made by the Frenchmen, or Flemings: but their enterprize was all otherwise. For on a tuesdaye at the shutting of the gates at night, the lord Daubeneie chiefe teine of the armie, the lord Pooleie, sir James Tirrell capteine of Guisnes, sir Henrie Willoughbie, sir Gilbert Talbot, and sir Humfreie Talbot marshall of Calis, with diuerse other knights, and esquieres, and other of the garisons of Hammes, Guisnes, and Calis, to the number of two thousand men or thereabouts, issued priuie out of Calis, & passed the water of Graueling in the moning betimes, and left there for a scale, and to keepe the passage, sir Humfreie Talbot, with sir score archers, and came to Newpoort, where they found the so-ueraigne of Flanders with his hundred Almaines, and there they staid that night.

On the next daie they went toward Dirmew, and by the guiding of a prisoner, that should haue bene hanged on the next morning, they issued out of the south gate of the towne of Dirmew, and were conueied by their said guide by an high banke set with willowes; so that the Cantois could not well espie them, and so secretlie gat to the end of their enemies campe, and there paused. The lord Daubeneie commanded all men to send their horses and wagons backe, but the lord Pooleie said he would ride till he came to hand strokes. Thus they marched forth till they came to a low banke, and no deepe ditch, where the ordinance laie; and there the archers shot altogther, euery man an arrow, and so fell prostrate to the ground. The enemies here with discharged their ordinance, and ouershot them.

The Almaines leapt ouer the ditch with their mo-rice pikes. The Englishmen in the fore-front waded the ditch, and were holpen by by the Almaines, and set on their enemies, and toke manie prisoners. The other Englishmen halsted by the cause to enter in at the north gate of the campe, where the lord Pooleie being on horsebacke in a rich coate, was slaine with a gun. When his death was knowne, euery man killed his prisoner, and slue all such as did withstand them, to the number of eight thousand men; in so much that of two thousand that came out of Bruges (as the Flemish chronicle reporteth) there came not home one hundred. On the English part was slaine the lord Pooleie, and not an hundred more.

The Englishmen toke their ordinance and sent it to Newpoort, with all the spoile and great horses.
And by the waie bearing certeine Frenchmen to be at Ostend, they made thitherward: but the Frenchmen fled, and so they burned part of the towne, and came againe to Newpoort, where the lord Daubeneie left all the Englishmen that were hurt and returned to Calis, where he buried the bodie of the lord Pooleie.
The Englishmen got great riches at this field, for they that went forth in cloth, came home in silke, and those that went out on foot, came home on great horses.
The lord Cordey being at Ypre with twentie thousand men, was soe displeased with this ouer-throw; & therefore thinking to be reuenged, besieged towne of Metopost right stronglie, and shot daile at the wals, breaking them in manie places.

But the Englishmen that were hurt at Dymetw field before, and might either stand or draw bolue, neuer came from the wals. On a daie the Frenchmen gaue a great assault to a towre, and perforce entered it, and set vp the banner of the lord Cordes. But see the chance! During the time of the assault, there arrived a barke with foure score fresh English archers, which came straight to the towre, and did so much, that what with the helpe of such as before were wounded and hurtmen, and of the courageous hartes of the new come archers, crying; Shot Englishmen, shot: the towre was regained out of the Frenchmens hands, and the banner of the lord Cordes rent in peces, and in place thereof the penon of saint George set vp. Then the Frenchmen, supposing a great aid of Englishmen to haue bene come to the towne by sea, left the assault.

And the night following, the enuious lord Cordes (which so longed for Calis, that he would commonlie saie, that he could be content to lie seuen yeares in hell, so that Calis were in possession of the Frenchmen) byake by his siege, and returned to Helyding with shame. And the Englishmen glad of this victorie returned to Calis. This yeare James the thirde of that name king of Scots was slaine by his owne subjects, after they had banquished him in a pighy field. About the same time one Adrian an Italian was sent in ambassage from pope Innocent the eight into Scotland, to haue taken by the variance betwixt the king there and his people. But being arrived here in England, he was informed that king James was slaine, and therfore taried here certeine moneths.

And for that he was a man of excellent learning, vertue, and humanitie, the archbishop of Canturburie John Morton so commended him to the king, that he made him first bishop of Hereford, and shortly after, that reigned and given ouer, he promoted him to the bishopricke of Bath and Welles. And after that with these honours he was returned to Rome, he was advanced by all the degrees of spiritual dignities into the college of the cardinals. And wostly sure he was of great preferment, for by his meanes, learned men were moued to sake out the vse of eloquent writing and speaking in the Latine tongue, he being the first in the time of our fathers that taught the trade to chose and vse apt words and fit termes.

In the first yeare of king Henries reigne there came ambassadors to him from the French king the lord Francis of Auzemburgh, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gaguine minister of the Bonnehomes of the trinitie. The effect of their coming was to haue concluded a peace with king Henrie, and that with god will the French king might dispose of the marriage of the young dutchesse of Britaine, as he should thinke good; and to make bold the contract and former marriage, which by priorie the depuise of Parmilian king of Romans had before time contracted & made with hir. But thereto would not king Henrie geue his consent, ener harping on this string, that the maiden being once lawfullie combined in matrimonie with Parmilian, ought not to be compelled against hir will and promise (yea and contrarie to all law, right and equitie) to take anie other person than him to hir spouse and husband.

In deed king Henrie was loth that the French king should marrie the dutchesse of Britaine himselfe (as he perceived his meaning was) and so toine the dutchie of Britaine to the crowne of France; and therfore he did what he could to hinder that bargaine. Yet at length it was agreed that a forme of a league should be drawn with conditions, clauses, and covenants. And so full concluding of the same, it was thought expedient, that the king of England should send ambassadors to the French king to finish all matters betwixt them. Whereupon the French ambassadors being dismissed with great rewards, freightwaies Thomas eric of Dymond, and Thomas Goldenston prior of Wyldes church in Canturburie, were appointed by the king to followe them into France, instructed fullie in althings that he would haue on his behalfe either moued or determined.

In this meane space, Lionell the bishop of Concordia was sent as outour from pope Alexander the first to the French king for certeine matters: and amongst other things, he had in charge to conclude a peace and vntitie betwixt the French king and the king of England. He mouing this matter to the French king, found him nothing strange to incline to his motion. Whereupon the bishop of Concordia conceiuing god hope, and therewith desirous (as became him best bearing that title) to set an attonement betwixt those two kings, took his iourne towards England, to the intent he might moue king Henrie to be agreeable therunto, and so coming to Calis, found the English ambassadors there, being so farre on their waie towards the French king; and being honorablie receiued of them into that towne, after they had communed together, the bishop took the sea, and was transported ouer into England, and the ambassadors departed towards the French king.

After the bishop of Concordia had talked with king Henrie, and perceived that (vpon reasonable conditions) he could be content to conclude a peace with all christian princes, and to lye in rest after so manie troubles afore time sustained, the said bishop returned backe into France to sollicit this purpose to some perfect conclusion. But the Frenchmen so handled the matter, that whilist they outwardlie shewed holie they desired nothing but friendship and amitie, they allured the young dutchesse of Britaine to submit herselfe wholie to their discretion, so that shortly after she was married to king Charles. So the English ambassadors, after they perceived which waie the wind would blow, returned againe to their countrie, and nothing done; agreed vpon in their matter.

King Henrie so troubled in his mind therewith, determining no more with peaceable messages, but with open warre to determine all controuersies betwixt him and the French king, called his high court of parlement; and theret declared the cause why he was iustlie prouoked to make warre against the Frenchmen: and therfore desired that of their beneuolent aid of men and monie toward the maintenance thereof. The cause was so iust, that euerie man allowed it; and to the setting forth of the war taken in hand for so necessarie an occasion, euerie man promised his helping hand. The king commended them for their true and faithfull hearts. And to the intent that he might spare the power lost of the commons (whome he euer desired to keepe in fauor) he thought good first to exact monie of the richest sort by waie of a beneuolence.

Which kind of lending monie was first denfied by king Edward the fourth, as it appeareth before in his history. King Henrie following the like example, published abroad, that by their open gifts he would measure and search their beneuolent hearts and good minds toward him; so that he that gaue most, should be iudged to be his most louing friend; and he that gaue little, to be esteemed according to his gift. By this it appeareth, that what soeuer is praised for the prince princes profit, and brought to a president by matter of record, maie be turned to the great prejudice of the people, if rulers in authoritie will so adiudge and determine it. But by this means king Henrie got innumerable great summes of monie, with some grudge of the people, for the extremitie shewed by the commissioners in diuers places.

We haue heard before, how the lord of Kauenstein, by the aid of Bruges & Cant, had taken the towne and two castels of Sluis, which he kept against his soueraigne lord Maximilian, and getting into the haven certeine ships and barks, robbed, spoiled, & took prisoners: the ships and vessels of all nations that passed alongest by that coast, towards the mart at Antwerpe, or into anie part of Brabant, Zeland, or Friseland, and was ener sufficientlie vittelled out of France and Picardie. There was a little towne also two miles from Bruges towards the sea, called Dam, which was a bulwourke to Bruges, and an hedging to Sluis. The king of Romans had attempted the winning of this towne diuers times, but missed his purpose; till at length Albert duke of Saronie, a great friend to the king of Romans, by policie found meanes to get it.

Albert the duke of Saronie policie to get the towne of Dam.

This duke feining himselfe as a neuter betwixt the king of Romans, and the rebels of Flanders, required of the lords of Bruges, that he might enter peaceable into their towne according to his estate, with a certeine number of men of armes, to communicate with them diuerse matters of great weight, and sent before his cariages and herbersgers to make promise. They of Bruges were in no doubt of him, so that his men of warre entered into the citie in good order, and he followed. They that went before, inquired for innes and lodgings, as though they would haue rested there all the night, and so went forth still in order asking after lodgings, till they came at the gate that leadeth directlie toward Dam, distant from Bruges a Flemish mile, which is called the bulwourke of Bruges.

Bruges suspected no harme to come out of Bruges, thought their friends (knowing some danger towards) had sent them aid, and so nothing mistrusting those that approached their towne, suffered them to enter, and so was the towne of Dam taken by sleight, which could not be wone by open force. This chance soze displeased them of Bruges, for now could they haue no recourse to the sea, so that they must needs fall into ruine and decaye.

The duke of Saronie sent forth for aid to king Henrie to win Sluis.

The captaine and inhabitants of Dam suspecting no harme to come out of Bruges, thought their friends (knowing some danger towards) had sent them aid, and so nothing mistrusting those that approached their towne, suffered them to enter, and so was the towne of Dam taken by sleight, which could not be wone by open force. This chance soze displeased them of Bruges, for now could they haue no recourse to the sea, so that they must needs fall into ruine and decaye. The duke of Saronie thus having wone the towne of Dam, sent to the king of England, that if it would please him to minister anie aid by sea, he would besiege Sluis by land. Whereupon the king of England, vpon due consideration of the dukes motion (as he was wise enough in all his enterprises, and no lesse fortunate in the issue of the same) would conclude nothing vpon the sudden, but (as he did alwaies) ruled his affaires by god counsell, like to the wise man commended in the holie scripture:

Gen. Ha. in Tob. 4.

At last he well remembering that Sluis was a rousest, and a verie den of thieues to them that trauesed the seas towards the east parts, incontinentlie dispatched sir Edward Poynings a right haliant knight and hardie captaine, with twelue ships well furnished with bold soldiers, and sufficient artillerie. Which sir Edward sailed into the haven, and kept the lord of Kauenstein from starting by sea. The Duke of Saronie besieged one of the castels, lieng in a church ouer against it: and the Englishmen assaulted the lesse castell, and issued out of their ships at the ebbe, neuer suffering their enemies to rest in quiet one day together, for the space of twentie daies, and euerie day slew some of their aduersaries; and on the English part were slaine one there; by other to the earle of Oxford, and fiftie more.

Sir Edward Poynings a haliant captaine sent into Flanders with an armie

The lord of Kauenstein had made a bridge of botes betwene both the castels, to passe from the one to the other; which bridge one night the Englishmen did set on fire. Then he, perceiving that he must lose his castels by force, and that the Flemings could not aid him, yielded the castels to sir Edward Poynings, and the towne to the duke of Saronie, vpon certeine conditions. Sir Edward Poynings kept the castels a while, of whom the Almaines demanded their wages, because the duke had nothing to paie. Then these two captaine so handled them of Bruges, that they not onelie submitted themselves to their lord Maximilian; but also were contented to paie and dispatch the Almaines. And so sir Edward Poynings taried there a long space, and at length returned to the king before Bullogne.

The first day of Aprill this present yeare, the nobles of the realme assembled in the cathedrall church of S. Paule in London, where the maior of the same citie, his brethren the aldermen, and the craftmen in their liueries also assembled: to whom doctor Ascham chancelor made an oration, declaring how the king of Spaine had wone the great and rich citie & countrie of Granada from the Turks: for toy whereof Te Deum was song with great solemnitie. But because it is requisite and necessarie in this ample volume, to set downe the report of accidents as they are to be found at large in our owne English writers: you shall heare for the furtherance of your knowledge in this matter concerning Granada, what Ed. Hall hath left noted in his chronicle. Which although it containe diuerse actions of superstition, and popish trumperie: yet should it not offend the reader, considering that a people estranged from the true knowledge of God and sincere religion put the same in practice, as supposing principall holinesse to consist in that blind deuotion.

On the first of Aprill (saith he) this yeare, the king commanded all the nobilitie of his realme to assemble at the cathedrall church of S. Paule in London, where (after Te Deum solemnly song) the cardinal of Cantuarburie, standing on the steps before the quier doore, declared to the people, how the famous citie of Granada, which manie yeares had bene possessed of the Moors or Mauritan nation, being infidels & unchristened people, was now of late besieged a great time by Don Ferdinando and Elizabeth his wife, king and queene of Spaine, Arragon, and Castile. And the said infidels, by reason of siege brought to great penurie and miserie, for lacke of vittells & necessarie viands, perceiving that all succours were clerelie stopped and excluded from them, and so brought into bitter despaire of aid, or comfort, after long consultation had amongst them, determined to render themselves and their citie to the said king vpon diuerse covenants and conditions, and thereupon sent to him diuerse senators of the citie fullie instructed of their mind and purpose.

The king of Spaine and his counsell, considering and sagelie pondering that winter approached & was at hand, and that the christian host had long lien in the fieldes in soze tempests and greuous stormes (which they gladlie suffered for Christs sake, in whose cause and quarell they made that present warre) remembering also that the citie was of such riches, fame, and estimation, that it contained an hundred and fiftie thousand houses of name, beside other small houses and cotages; & that it was replenished with people innumerable, and furnished with three score and ten thousand good fighting men; and finally perceiving that he might inioy now the possession of the same, without assault or effusion of christian blood, bloud by the aduise of his counsell, he accepted, accorded, and agreed to their offers the twentieth and fift of November, in the yeare of Christs incarnation 1491, then being the daie of saint Katharine.

The citie of Granada was taken and the Moors were driven out, as before is shewed in the next page.

By the which composition, the roiall citie of Granada, with all the holds and fortresses of the realme, and the towres and castels of Alpuſſarare was reuidered into the hands of the said king of Spaine; and that the king of Granada should become subiect and vassall to the king of Spaine, and to relinquish and forsake the vsurped name of a king for euer: and that all the men of warre should franklie depart out of the citie, and none there to remaine, but artificers and merchants: and all these things to be done before the five & twentieth day of Januarie. But the time was prevented, for the Moyses on the first day of Januarie sent six hundred notable personages out of the citie with their children for hostages into the campe of the king of Spaine, to the intent that he should put no diffidence nor mistrust in the citizens, but that he might peaceable and quietlie with his people enter into the citie, and take possession of the same. The which hostages were distributed and lodged in the tents and pavillions of the Spanish armie.

The third of Januarie, the lord of Guiterins Cardenes, great master & gouernor of Lion, of the order of S. James, departed from the armie, noble and triumphantlie accompanied with five hundred horsemen, and three thousand footmen toward the citie. And as he approached nere to the suburbs, there issued out diuers noble and valiant captains of the Moyses, making to him humble obeisance, and conducted him to a palace adioining to the citie, called the palace of Anararas, and from thence conueied him to the palace roiall of the same citie called Alhambra, whereof hee toke quiet and peaceable possession, to the behoofe of the king of Spaine, whome the Moyses promised and confessed to take and obey, as their king and soueraigne lord. And in signe and token that they thought in their hearts, that which they promised by mouth; they prostrated and humbled themselves before the said great master, and with dolorous lamentation and salt teares deliuered to him the keies of the said palace.

When he had the keies, and was also possessed of that strong and magnificent place, he first of all dispatched the house of all the Moyses and pagans, and appointed a garrison of valiant and noble christians, to keepe and defend the same: and the same day caused a masse solemnie to be celebrate in a place of the same palace called Melchita, which done and finished, he toke possession of all the fortresses, towres, and holds to the said citie and towne of Granada belonging: & pertaining. And then he caused to be erected and set vp on the highest tower of the palace (where it might best be seene) the signe and token of the crosse, whereon Christ for vs sinners suffered his bitter passion. At the raising whereof were present an archbishop, and three bishops, with other prelates, which deuoutlie sang this anthem: O crux, ane spes

The said crosse was three times deuoutlie lifted, and at euerie exaltation, the Moyses being within the citie, rosed, howled, & cried, prostrating themselves, grousing on the ground, & making dolorous noise and pitifull outcries. The armie incamped without the citie, seeing these things, humbled themselves meeklie before the crosse, rendering to almighty God their most humble and heartie thanks. The king of Spaine, being mounted on horsebacke, perceiving the creation of the crosse, descended from his genet, and kniolel downe on the bare ground; and rendered to God, laud, honour, and praise; for that noble and triumphant victorie. And after that the crosse was thus set vp on the high tower, the banner of saint James, and the kings banners were pitched and fixed vpon the turrets and pinacles of the citie: an herald standing in the top of the high tower, proclaiming and publishing these words following.

Saint James, saint James, saint James; Castile, Castile, Castile; Granada, Granada, Granada. By high and mightie power, lord Ferdinando and Elizabeth, king and queene of Spaine, haue woone from the infidels and Moyses the citie and realme of Granada, through the helpe of our Lord God, & the most glorious virgin his mother, and the vertuous apostle S. James, and the holie father Innocent the eight, together with the aids and succours of the great prelates, knights, and other gentlemen boine, and commons of their realmes and countries. When the herald had finished, the artillerie sounded, the minstrels blew, the people applauded and clapped their hands for gladnesse, that the earth seemed to tremble and quake vnderneath them.

After this ioy ended, there issued out of the citie in manner of procession, seven hundred and mo christians, as well men, as women and children, which had bin there prisoners and liued in bonds, seruitude, and miserable captiuitie, whereof the most part were naked, wounded, and in manner famished for hunger. To whome the king (of his great libeallitie) gaue both apparell, blands and monie. These poore prisoners coming out of the citie sang this psalme; Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel, qui visitauit & fecit redemptionem plebi sue; Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which hath visited and redeemed his people. And so singing forth the psalme, went to the church of saint Faith, which the king Ferdinando had caused to be most sumptuouſlie edified during the time of the sieg, being distant from Granada two or three miles.

Now as this poore procession passed by the host, one espied his sonne, and another saw his brother; and the son perceived the father, and the father found the daughter, which were now deliuered out of miserable seruitude and bondage. But they could not reſtaine nor hidde themselves from distilling of teares and sobbing, seeing their parents and kinnsfolke restored to libertie & freedom. And when these people had said their orisons in the church of saint Faith, and were come to the armie, they kniolel before the king, kissed his feet, crying with one voice; God grant to the king of Spaine euerlasting life. The next daie after the lord Cuerus de Mendoza, earle of Tendegile, was by the king made captaine of the house roiall and principall tower of the citie of Granada, called Alhambra, hauing to him appointed and assigned one thousand men of armes, and two thousand footmen. Vnto the which earle, the great master deliuered the keies of the said palace and tower, and other ports and fortresses.

On saturday the eight daie of Januarie, in the 60 yeare of our Lord 1492, Ferdinando II. of Spaine & Granada, the queene, & their eldest son Don John prince of Spaine, the lord Peter of Mendoza, the archbishop of Toledo, the patriarch of Alexandria, the cardinal of Spaine, the lord Peter prince of Lion, the duke of Caditan, the marques of Villena & Poia, the erle of Capre, the erle of Alenra of Cisnentes, and manie other earles, barons, and nobles, whereof some were Englishmen (whose names I haue not) with ten thousand horsemen, and fiftie thousand footmen, with great triumph and roialtie entered into the citie of Granada, and thereof toke reall possession & seazine, and caused masse to be song in a great place called Melchita, where hee caused a solemne church to be builded in the honour of God and his mother.

So the king of Spaine there remained till the countrie was reduced into a good conformitie and order, and diuerse fortresses and castels were made for the safeguard and tuition of the realme. And because this victorie obtained, was to the glorie of God, and to the publike wealth of all christiantie, the said cardinal of Canturburie declared to the people, that the king had sent him and the other nobles thither that day, not onlie to notific and declare to them the vertie of the fact; but also to exhort them to giue lands and praissions to almighty God, for delivering so goodlie a citie, so plentifull a countrie, and so notable a region out of the hands of his enemies, and persecutors of his faith and religion. Which declaration ended, the archbishop with the cleargie & the nobles with the communaltie, in most deuout maner went in generall procession, rendering to God for this great atchieued enterprise, glorie, honour, and most reuerent thanks.] consented to the request of Sparimilian; and promi-

Charles the French king receiued the ladie Anne of Britaine, as his pupill into his hands, and with great solemnitie hir espoused, hauing with hir in dowry, the whole duchie of Britaine.

Now was Sparimilian in great chafe toward the French king, not onlie for that he had refused his daughter, but also had bereeued him of his assured wife the said ladie Anne, contrarie to all right and conscience. Therefore he sent vnto king Henrie, desiring him with all speed to passe the seas with his armie, that they might pursue the warre against their aduersarie, with fire, sword and bloud. King Henrie hearing this, and hauing no mistrust in the promise of Sparimilian, with all speed leued an armie, and rigged his nauie of ships. And when all things were readie, he sent his almoner Christopher Arlwinke, and sir John Kisele knight vnto Sparimilian, to certifie him, that the king was in a readinesse, and would arrive at Calis, as soone as he should be aduertised that Sparimilian and his men were readie to ioine with him.

These ambassadoes coming into Flanders, perceiued that Sparimilian was neither purueied of men, monie, nor armoz, nor of any other thing neces-sarie for the setting forth of warre; sauing onlie that his will was good, although his power was small.
King Henrie being aduertised hereof by letters sent to him from his said ambassadoes, was soze disquieted in his mind, and was almost brought to his wits end, to consider how his companions in arms should thus faile him at need; but taking abuse of his counsell, at length he determined not to stay his prepensed iournie, and therefore he so increased his numbers before he took ship, that he with his owne power might be able to match with his aduersaries. When he had thus gathered and assembled his armie, he sailed to Calis the first day of October, and there in-camped himselfe for a space, to see all his men and prouision in such readinesse, as nothing should be wanting.

In this place all the armie had knowledge by the ambassadours (which were newlie returned out of Flanders) that Sparimilian could not set forth anie armie, for lacke of monie: and therefore there was no succour to be looked for at his hand. But the Englishmen were nothing dismayd therewith, as they that iudged themselves able enough to match the Frenchmen without the helpe of anie other nation.
In the meane season, although the French king had an armie together, both for number and furniture able to trie in battell with the Englishmen: yet he made semblance as though he desired nothing more than peace, as the thing much more profitable to him than warre: considering the minds of the Britains were not yet wholly settled.

And againe, he was called into Italie to make warre against the king of Naples, whose kingdome he pretended to appertene to him by lawfull succession from his father king Aluise, to whome Reine duke of Antou last king of Sicill, of the house of Antou, had transferred his right to that kingdome (as partlie before ye haue heard) wrongfullie and without cause disinheriting his cosine, godsonne and heire, Reine duke of Lorraine and Bar. The lord Charles hauing commission from his maiesty the French king to make some entrie into a treatie for peace with the king of England, wrote letters to him before he passed ouer to Calis, signifieng to him that if it might stand with his pleasure to send some of his counsellors to the borders of the English pale adjoining to France, there should be so reasonable conditions of peace proffered, that he doubted not but his grace might with great honour breake up his campe, and retire his armie home againe.

The king of England considering that Britaine was cleerelie lost, and past recoverie, and that Sparimilian for lacke of monie, and mistrust which he had in his owne subjects, late still like a doymouse doing nothing; and here with seeing that it should be honorable to him, and profitable to his people to determine this great warre without bloodshed, appointed

Conclusion of peace between the English and French.

passed the seas to Calis, and so to commun with the lord Choydes of articles of peace, which took effect as after ye shall perceive. In the meane time, whilest the commissioners were communing of peace on the marches of France, the king of England (as ye haue heard) was arrived at Calis: from whence after all things were prepared for such a tournee, he remained in foure battels forward, till he came nere to the towne of Bullogne, & there pitched his tents before it in a convenient place for his purpose, meaning to assaile the towne with his whole force & puissance.

But there was such a strong garison of warlike souldiers within that fortress, and such plenty of ar-tillerie, and necessarie munitions of warre, that the losse of Englishmen assailing the towne (as was doubted) should be greater damage to the realme of England, than the gaining thereof should be profit.
Whobeeit the daillie shot of the kings battering pec-ces brake the walls, and soze defaced them. But when euerie man was readie to give the assault, a sudden rumor rose in the armie that peace was concluded; which byte as it was pleasant to the Frenchmen, so was it displeasing to the Englishmen, because they were prest and readie at all times to set on their enemies, and brought into great hope to haue bene inriched by the spoile and gaine to haue fallen to their lots of their enemies goods, beside the glorious fame of renowned victorie.

And therefore to be defranded hereof by an unprofitable peace, they were in great fume, and verie angrie: and namelie for that diuerse of the capitaine to set themselves and their bands the more gorgeously lie forward, had borrowed large summes of monie, and for the repairement had mortgaged their lands and possessions, and some happilie had made through sale thereof, trusting to recouer all againe by the gaines of this tournee. Wherefore offended with this sudden conclusion of peace, they spake euill both of the king and his counsell. But the king like a wise prince affected their displeasure in part with excusing the matter, alleging what losse and bloudshed was like to insue both of capitaine and souldiers, if the assault should haue bene given to the bitterance, especiallie sith the towne was so well furnished with men and munitions. When he had somewhat appeased their minds with these and manie other reasons, he returned backe againe to Calis.

There were not manie of the English armie left at this siege of Bullogne, & few or no men of name, saying that valiant capitaine sir John Sauage knight, the which, as he and sir John Kilslic rode about the wals of the towne, to view in what place it might be easilist assaulted, was compassed about by certeine Frenchmen that were issued out of the towne, and there staine standing at defense, and vtterlie refusing to yeld himselfe as prisoner. But sir John Kilslic escaped by fleeing auaie. When the k. was thus returned to Calis, he began to smell a cer-teine secret smoke, which was like to turne to a great flame, without wise foresight, and good looking to. For by the craftie inuention, and diuellsish imagination of the ladie Margaret duchesse of Burgognie, a new idoll was set vp in Flanders, and by a forged name called Richard Plantagenet second sonne to king Edward the fourth, as though he had bene raised from death to life.

The newes hereof somewhat troubled him, so that he was with better will content to receive the honorable conditions of peace offered of his enimie: because he should not be constrained at one time to make warre both at home, and also in a forren region. The conclusion of this agreement made with the Frenchmen, was this: That this peace should continue both these liues; and that the French king should pay to the king of England a certeine summe of monie in hand, according as the commissioners should appoint for his charges sustained in this tour-nee. Which as the king certified the maior of London by his letters the ninth of November amounted to the summe of seven hundred fortye and five thousand duchats: the which is of sterling monie, one hundred four score and six thousand, two hundred and fiftie pounds. It was also concluded that he should yeare-lie (for a certeine space) paie or cause to be paid, for the monie that the k. had spent & expended in the defence of the Britains five & twentie thousand crowns.

Which yearelie tribute the French king (afterwards continuallie occupied in the wars of Italie) yearelie satisfied & paid so long as k. Henrie liued, who after he had taried a convenient space at Calis, toke the sea, and arrived at Douer, and so came to his manour of Greenwich. Immediatlie after his returne thus into England, he elected into the fellowship of saint George, commonlie called the order of the garter, Alphonse duke of Calabze, sonne and heire to Ferdinando king of Naples. Christopher Erskwie the kings almoner was sent to him unto Naples with the garter, collar, mantell, and other habillments appertaining to the companions of that noble order. The which was reuerentlie received of the said duke, who in a solemne presence renewed himselfe with that habit, supposing by the countenance of that apparell to be able to resist his aduersarie the French king, sith he was now made a friend and companion in order with the king of England: but that little auailed him, as after it was right apparant. And here, because in sundrie actions we haue sene and obserued the French kings subtilties, his inconstancie, lacke of truth, honestie, and kinglie modestie; we maie be bold to set downe the description of his person, as we find the same readie set downe to hand; that by a view thereof we maie conclude that his properties were proportioned to his person.

It is verie certeine (saith mine author) that king Charles from his infancie was of complexion verie delicate, and of bodie unsound and diseased, of small stature, and of face (if the aspect and dignitie of his eyes had bene taken auaie) folwe and deformed, his other members bearing such equall proportion, that he seemed more a monster than a man: he was not onelie without all knowledge of god sciences, but scarcelie he knew the distinct characters of letters: his mind desirous to command, but more proper to anie other thing, for that being inuironed alwaies with his familiars and fauourits, he retained with them no maiestic or authoritie: he reiected all affaires and businesse, and yet if he did debate and consider in anie, he shewed a weake discretion and iudgement.
And if he had any thing in him that caried apparance of merit or praise, yet being thoroughlie wetted and sounded, it was found further off from vertue than from vice: he had an inclination to glorie, but it was tempered more with rashnesse and furie than with moderation and counsell: his liberalities were without discretion, measure, or distinction: immaneable offentimes in his purposes, but that was rather an ill grounded obstinacie than constancie. And that which manie call bountie, deserved more reasonable in him the name of coldnesse & slackenesse of spirit.]

This yeare the two and twentieth of June, was borne at Greenwich the lord Henrie, second sonne to this king Henrie the seuenth, which was created duke of Yorke, & after prince of Wales, and in conclusion succeeded his father in gouernance of this realme, by the name of Henrie the eight, father to our gracious souereigne quene Elizabeth. But now

The malice of condemned by mens policies from death to life: ye shall vnderstand that the duchesse of Burgoyne euer desiring to cast a scorpion in the bosome of king Henrie, not for anie displeasure by him towards hir waught or done; but onelie because he was descended of the house of Lancaster, being an enimie to hir line, began to spin a new web, like a spider that daile weaueh when his hall is tozme: for after that the earle of Lincolne, which was by hir set forth, had missed the cushion, and lost both hozle and spurres, he could not be quiet, vntill he had practised a new deuise to put king Henrie to trouble. And as the diuell prouideth venomous sauce to corrupt stomachs, so for hir purpose she espied a certeine yong man of visage beautiful, of countenance demure, and of wit craftie and subtil.

Perkin war-
becke & counterfeit duke of York.

This youths name was Peter Warbecke, one for his faintnesse of stomach of the Englishmen in derision called Perkin Warbecke, according to the dutch phrase, which change the name of Peter to Perkin, of yonglings and little boies, which for want of age, lacke of strength, and manlike courage, are not thought worthe of the name of a man. This yong man traueilling many countries, could speake English and diuerse other languages; & for his basenesse of birth and stocke, was almost vnknotone of all men; and driuen to seeke liuing from his childehood, was constrained to go and traueill thorough manie countries. The duchesse glad to haue got so meet an organ for the conuensing of hir inuented purpose, as one not vnlike to be taken and reputed for the duke of Yorke, sonne to hir brother king Edward, which was called Richard, kept him a certeine space with hir priuillie.

Besides that, the with such diligence instructed him both in the secrets and common affaires of the realme of England, and of the linage, descent and order of the house of Yorke, that like a good scholer, not forgetting his lesson, he could tell all that was taught him promptlie without anie flackering or staie in his words. And besides that, he kept such a princelie countenance, and so counterfeited a maiestie roiall, that all men in manner did firmelie beleue, that he was extracted of the noble house and familie of the dukes of Yorke. For suerlie, it was a gift gluen to that noble progenie, as of nature planted in the root, that all the sequels of that line and stocke did studie and deuise how to be equiualent in honour and fame with their forefathers and noble predecessors.

The emulation

Perkin war-
becke arriueth in Ireland.

When the duches had framed hir cloast meet for the market, she was informed that king Henrie prepared to make warre against Charles the French king. Wherefore she, thinking that the time serued well for the setting forth of hir malicious inuention, sent this Perkin hir new inuented maiuemet, first into Portugale, and so craftilie into the countrie of Ireland; to the intent that he, being both wittie and wilie, might inuegle the rude Irishmen (being at those daies more inclined to rebellon than to reasonable order) to a new seditious commotion. Shortly after his arriuall in Ireland, whether by his shrewd wit, or the malicious exhortation of the sauage Irish gouernours, he entred so farre in credit with the people of that Ile, that his words were taken to be as true, as he vntrue lie with false demonstrations set forth and published them.

The French king aduertised hercof, then being in displeasure with king Henrie, sent into Ireland for Perkin, to the intent to send him against king Henrie, which was then inuading France (as ye before haue heard.) Perkin thought himselfe aloft, now that he was called to the familiaritie of kings, and therefore with all diligence sailed into France, and comming to the kings presence, was of him roiallie receiued, and after a princelie fashion interteined, and had a gard to him assigned, whereof was gouernour the lord Congreshall: and to him being at Paris, reioyced sir George Nevill bassard, sir John Tailor, Rowland Robinson, and an hundred English rebels. Now, after that a peace (as before is said) was concluded betwixt the French king, and the king of England, the French king dismissed Perkin, and would no longer keepe him.

But some haue said (which were there attending on him) that Perkin, fearing least the French king should deliuer him to the king of England, beguiled the lord Congreshall, and fled from Paris by night. But whether the French king knew of his departure or not, the truth is, that he being in maner in despaire, returned to his first founder the ladie Margaret, of whome he was so welcomed to all outward appearance, that it seemed he could not haue reioiced at anie earthlie thing more, than he did at his presence, and (as she could well dissemble) she made semblance as though she had neuer sene him before that time. Now as she had soze longed to know not once, but diuerse times in open audience, and in solemne presence, she willed him to declare and shew by what means he was preserved from death and destruction, and in what countries he had wandered and sought friendship; and finally, by what chance of fortune he came to hir court.

This did she, to the intent that by the open declaration of these fained phantasies, the people might be perswaded to giue credit, and beleue that he was the true begotten sonne of hir brother king Edward. And after this, she assigned to him a gard of thirtie persons in murrie and blew, and highlie honoured him as a great estate, and called him the white rose of England. The nobilitie of Flanders did to him all reuerence. [All which poise and pompe exhibited in most solemne sort, he was well content to take vpon him, forgetting the basenesse of his birth, and glorying in the counterfeited title of honour: much like the say that would be called a swan, or like the crow that trimming hir selfe with the stolne feathers of a peacocke, would seeme Junos bird; as the poet saith;

mentis nomine cygnum Graculus appellat sese, cornicula plumas Pauonis furata cupit pauis ipsa videri.

In this peare was one Hugh Clopton maior of London, and of the staple, a gentleman, borne at Clopton village, halfe a mile from Stratford vpon Auen by north, who continued (during his life) a bachelor: he builded the great and sumptuous byldge of Stratford vpon Auen, at the east end of the towne. This byldge hath foureteene great arches, and a long causeie with smaller arches, all made of stone, new walled on each side. At the west end of the byldge, he builded a faire large chappell. Toward the south end of that towne, nere vnto the same, a pretie house of bricke and timber, where he laie, and ended his life. He glased the chancell of the parish church in that towne, and made a waie of foure miles long, thre miles from Alesburie towards London, and one mile beyond Alesburie.]

But to returne to Perkin: the brute of whome in England, blowne throughout the realme, soze disquieted the people, insomuch that not onelie the meaner sort, but also manie of the nobles and worshipfull personages beleued and published it abroad, that all was true which was reported of him. And not onelie they that were in sanctuaries, but also manie other that were fallen in debt, assembled in a companie, and passed ouer the seas into Flanders, to their counterfeited duke of Yorke, otherwile rightlie named Perkin Warbecke. was in manner diuided (with the rumour and vaine fable spread abroad of this wise borne duke) into partakings and contrarie factions. And some of the noble men conspired together, purposing to aid the for-said Perkin, as the man whome they reputed to be the verie sonne of king Edward; and that the matter was not feigned, but altogether true, iust, and not imagined of anie malicious pretense or euill purpose.

Anno Reg. 8.

Perkin commenced the case of 7 yokes of comming-
in.

And because the thing was weightie, and required great aid and assistance, therefore they determined to send messengers vnto the ladie Spargaret, to know when Richard duke of Yorke might conueni-entlie come into England; to the intent that they being thereof certified, might be in a readinesse to helpe and succour him at his arriual. So by the common consent of the conspirators, sir Robert Clifford knight, and William Warleie, were sent into Flanders, which discouered to the dukes all the secret intents and priuie meanings of the friends and fau-tors of the new found duke. The dukes glablie re-ceiued this message, and after they had heard their errand, they brought the messenger to the sight of Perkin, who so well counterfeited the gesture, countenance, and manner of Richard duke of Yorke, that sir Robert Clifford beleued verelie, that he was the second sonne of king Edward; and therefore wrote a letter of credit into England to his complices: and to put them out of doubt, he affirmed that he knew him to be king Edwards sonne by his face, and other lineaments of his bodie.

Perkins true
image.

Vpon this letter, the chiefe doers in this businesse spread the signification thereof abroad through the realme, to the intent to stirre the people to some new tumult and commotion: but it was done by such a secret craft, that no man could tell who was the author of that rumour. The king perceiued that this vaine fable was not banished out of the mad brains of the common people. To prouide therefore against all perils that might thereby insue, he sent certeine knights that were skillfull men of warre, with competent bands of soldiers, to keepe the sea coasts and hauiens, to vnderstand who came in and went out of the realme; doubting least some great conspiracie were in brewing against him. He also sent into the low countries certeine persons, to learne the truth of this forged dukes progenie, where some of them that were so sent, comming to Tourne, got knowlege that he was borne in that citie, of base linage, and named Perkin Warbecke.

The ambassadors came Philip archduke of Burgonie.

The king then advertised not onclie by his espi-als vpon their returne, but also from other his trustie frendes, determined with all speed to haue the fraud published, both in England and foreyn parts: and for the same cause sent sir Edward Poynings knight, & sir William Warram doctor of the lawes vnto Philip archduke of Burgonie, and to his coun-cellors; because he was not of age able to gouerne of himselfe: to signifie to him and them, that the young man, being with the ladie Spargaret, had falselie and vntuallie vsurped the name of Richard duke of Yorke, which long before was murdered with his brother Edward in the Towre of London, by the commandement of their vnckle king Richard, as manie men then liuing could testifie.

The ambassadors comming to the court of Philip the archduke, were honozable interteined of him and of his counsell, and willed to declare the effect of their message. William Warram made to them an eloquent oration, and in the later end somewhat truelie against the ladie Spargaret, not sparing to declare, how she now in her later age had brought forth (within the space of a few yeares together) two detestable monstres, that is to saie, Lambert of whom yee heard before; and this same Perkin War-becke, and being conceiued of these two great babes, was not deliuered of them in eight or nine moneths as nature requireth; but in one hundred and eightie moneths, for both these at the least were fiftene yeres of age, yet she would be brought in bed of them, and shew them openlie; and when they were newlie crept out of hir wombe, they were no infants but lustie younglings, and of age sufficient to bid battell to kings. Although these talents angered the ladie Spargaret to the hart, yet Perkin was more vexed with the things declared in this oration, and especiallie because his cloaked fuggling was brought to light.

The dukes intending to cast hot sulphur into the new kindled fire, determined with might and maine to arme and set forward prettie Perkin against the king of England. When the ambassadors had done their message, and that the archdukes counsell had long debated the matter; they made answer, that to haue the king of Englands loue, the archduke and they would neither aid nor assist Perkin nor his conplices in anie cause or quarrell. Yet notwithstanding if the ladie Spargaret, persisting in hir coted malice towards the king of England, would be to him al-ling and helping, it was not in their power to withstand it; for because in the lands assigned to hir for hir dower, she might franklie and freelie order all things at hir will and pleasure, without contradiction of anie other gouernour.

After that the ambassadors were returned with this answer, the king straight sent forth certeine espi-als into Flanders, which should feigne themselves to haue fled to the duke of Yorke; and thereby search out the whole intent of the conspiracie, and after what sort they meant to proceed in the same. Others were sent also to intitle sir Robert Clifford and William Warleie, to returne into England, promising to them pardon of all their offenses, and high rewards, for obeying the kings request. They that were sent, did so earnestlie and prudentlie applie their businesse, that they brought all things to passe at their owne desires. For first they learned who were the chiefe conspirators, and after perswaded sir Robert Clifford to giue ouer that enterprise, which had no grounded staie to rest vpon. Albeit William Warleie at the first would not leaue off, but continued his begun attempt; till after two yeares, he repenting him of his follie, & hauing pardon granted him of the king, returned home into his native countrie.

When the king had knowledge of the chiefe captains of this conspiracie (by the ouerture of his espi-als which were returned) he caused them to be apprehended, and brought to London before his presence.
Of the which the chiefe were John Ratcliffe, lord Fitz-Water, sir Simon Montford, sir Tho. Thwaites knights, William Daubencie, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Cressenoz, and Thomas Astwood. Also cer-teine preests & religious men, as sir William Rich-ford doctor of diuinitie, and sir Thomas Poinces, both friers of saint Dominicks order, doctor William Sutton, sir William Mosseleie deane of Paules, Robert Laiborne, and sir Richard Leflete. Other which were guiltie, hearing that their fellows were apprehended, fled and toke sanctuary. The other that were taken were condemned, of the which sir Simon Montford, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dauberie were beheaded.

Some had their pardons, and the preests also for their order sake; but yet few of them liued long after. The lord Fitz-Water pardoned of life, was conueied to Calis, and there laid in hold, & after lost his head; because he went about to corrupt his keepers with rewards, that he might escape, intending (as was thought) to haue gone to Perkin. Thus by the policie and subtilie deuise of the king, practised to the point by his espials, the finewes of this conspiracie was rent in sunder. So that the malicious ladie Margaret was not a little shoolne with indignation when she saw the course of hir deuise (now that it had passed so far as that it was knowne to people on this side and beyond the seas) stopped, and the confederacie (whereunto she speciallie trusted) dissolved. Yet notwithstanding, as women will not (to die for it) give over an enterprise, which of an envious purpose they attempt; so she put hir irons afresh into the fier to set hir hatred forward: whome a while we will leaue at worke, and shew some doings betwene England and Flanders.]

King Henrie taking displeasure with the king of Romans, for that he kept not touch in aiding him against the French king, and partlie displeased with the Flemings, but speciallie with the ladie Margaret, for keeping and setting forward Perkin Warbecke, not onelie banished all Flemish wares and merchandizes out of his dominions, but also refreshed all English merchants from their repaite and traffike into anie of the lunds and territories of the king of Romans, or of the archduke Philip, sonne to the same king of the Romans; causing the mart to be kept at Calis, of all English merchandizes and commodities. Wherefore the said king and his sonne banished out of their lands and seignories all English clothes, yarne, tin, lead, and other commodities of this realme. The restraint made by the king sore hindered the merchants aduenturers; for they had no occupying to beare their charges, and to support their credit withall.

And that most greued them, the Casserlings being at libertie, brought to the realme such wares as they were wont, & so serued their customers through out the realme. Whereupon there ensued a riot by the seruants of the mercers, haberdashers, & clothworkers in the citie of London, the tuesday before saint Edwards day. For they perceiuing what hinderance grew to their maisters, in that they were not able so well to keepe them as before they had done, assembled together in purpose to reuenge their malice on the Casserlings, & so came to the Stillard, & began to rife & spoile such chambers & warehouses as they could get into. So that the Casserlings had much ado to withstand them, & keepe them back out of their gates, which with helpe of carpenters, smiths, and other that came to them by water out of Southwarke, they shored & so fortified, that the multitude of the seruants and apprentices, being assembled, could not preuaile.

At length came the maior with a number of men, defensible weaponed, to remoue the force; at whose approach those riotous persons fled awaie like a flocke of sheepe. But diuerse of them were apprehended, and upon inquirie made before the kings commissioners, about foure score seruants & apprentices were found to be conspired together, and sworne not to reueale it; of whom some of the chiefe beginners were committed to the Towre, and there long continued. But in conclusion, because none of their maisters, nor anie one housholder was found culpable, the king of his clemencie pardoned their offense, and restored them to libertie. [For he thought it no credit to his crowne to take vengeance of such sillie soules by execution of death, whom in clemencie pardoning he might restore to a reformed life.]

On the two & twentieth of Februarie in this yere were arraigned in the Chulohall of London foure persons, Thomas Wagnall, John Scot, John Heath, and John Kemington, the which were sanctuary men of saint Partins le grand in London, and latelie before were taken out of the said sanctuary, for forging of seditious bills, to the sunder of the king, & some of his counsell, for the which three of them were fugged to die; and the fourth named Wagnall, pleaded to be restored to sanctuary: by reason whereof he was reprieved to the Towre till the next tearme: and on the six and twentieth of Februarie, the other three with a Fleming, and a yeoman of the crowne, were all five executed at Tyborne. On the eight and twentieth of Aprill Jane Boughton widow was burnt in Smithfield, for holding certeine opinions of John Wickliffe. Wheat was sold at London at six pence the bushell, baire salt for three pence halfe penie the bushell, plantwich salt was sold for six pence the bushell, white herrings nine shillings the barrell, red herrings at three shillings the cade, red spots six pence the cade, & Gascoigne wine for six pounds the tun.]

Shortlie after sir Robert Clifford, partlie trusting on the kings promise, and partlie mistrusting the desperat begun enterprise, returned suddenly againe into England. The king certified before of his coming, went straight to the Towre of London the morow after the day of Epiphanie, & there taried till such time as sir Robert Clifford was there presented to his person. This was done for a policie, that if sir Robert accused anie of the nobilitie, they might be called thither without suspicion of anie euill, and their attached and laid fast. Some thought also, that for a policie king Henrie sent sir Robert Clifford ouer as an espie, or else he would not so sone haue receiued him into fauour againe. Nevertheless, there were great presumptions that it was nothing so, for both was he in great danger after his begun attempt, and neuer was so much esteemed with the king afterward as he was before.

But this is true, upon his coming to the kings presence, he besought him of pardon, and obtained it; and therewith opened all the maner of the conspiracie, so far as he knew, and who were aiders, assistants, and chiefe beginners of it; amongst whom he accused sir William Stanleie, whom the king had made his chiefe chamberleine, and one of his priue counsell. The king was fozie to heare this, and could not be induced to beleue that there was so much untruff in him, till by euident proofes it was tried against him. Then the king caused him to be refreshed from his libertie in his owne chamber within the quadrat towre, and there appointed him by his priue counsell to be examined, in which examination he nothing denied, but wiselie and sagelie agreed to all things laid to his charge, if he were faultie therein.

The report is, that this was his offense. When communication was had betwixt him, and the aboue mentioned sir Robert Clifford, as concerning Perkin, which falselie usurped the name of R. Edwards sonne; sir William Stanleie said, that if he knew certeinlie that the young man was the indubitate heire of king Edward the fourth, he would neuer fight or beare armour against him. This point argued, that he bare no hartie good will toward king Henrie as then. But that was the cause that he had conceived some inward grudge towards the king; or how it chanced that the king had withdrauen his speciall fauor from him, manie haue doubted. Some indeed haue gesied, that sir William Stanleie, for the service which he shewed at Bosworth field, thought that all the benefits which he receiued of the king, to be farre vnder that which he had deserued, in preferring not onelie the kings life; but also in obtaining for him the victorie of his enemies, so that his aduersarie was slaine in the field.

Wherefore desiring to be created earle of Chester, and therof denied, he began to discorde the king. And one thing incouraged him much, which was the riches and treasure of king Richard, which he onlie possessed at the battell of Bosworth; by reason of which riches and great power of men, he set naught by the king his soueraine lord and maister. The king hauing thus an hole in his coat, doubted first what he should do with him; for loth he was to lose the fauour of his brother the earle of Derby: and againe to pardon him, he feared least it should be an euill example to other, that should go about to attempt the like offense. And so at length, seueritie got the vpper hand, & mercie was put backe, in so much that he was arraigned at Westminster and adjudged to die, and (according to that iudgement) was brought to the Tower hill the fiftenth daie of Februarie, and there had his head striken off.

[This was the end of sir William Stanley the chiefe helper of king Henrie to the crowne at Bosworth field against king Richard the third, and who set the same crowne first vpon the kings head, when it was found in the field trampled vnder feet. He was a man (while he liued) of great power in his countrie, and also of great wealth; in so much as the common fame ran, that there was in his castell of Holt found in ready coine, plate, and iewels, to the value of fortie thousand markes or more, and his land and fees extended to thre thousand pounes by yeare. Heer he lesse all helped not; neither his good seruice in Bosworth field, neither his forwardnesse (euen with the hazard of life) to prefer H. Henrie to the crowne, neither his faithfullnesse in cleauing to him at all bunis, neither the bond of alliance betwixt them, neither the power that he was able to make, neither the riches which he was worth, neither intercession of friends, which he wanted not; none of these, nor all these could procure the redemption of his last life: officium decus hominum, & variable tempus.]

On the fiftenth of Nouember was holden the sergeants feast at the bishops place of Elm in Holborne, where dined the king, quene, and all the chiefe lords of Englnd. The new sergeants names were maister Dordant, Wigham, Kingmill, Constable, Butler, Pakelleie, Frowiche, Drenbridge, & Constable. In digging for to laie a new foundation in the church of saint Marie hill in London, the bodie of Becket, which had bene buried in the church of 175 yeares, was found whole of skinned, & the ioints of his armes pliable: which corpe was kept aboue ground foure daies without annoiſance, and then buried againe. Also this yeare (as maister Grafton saith) at the charges of maister John Late alderman of London was the church of saint Anthones founded, & annexed vnto the college of Windſor, wherein was erected one notable and free schole to the furtherance of learning, and a number of poore people (by the name of almshouses, which were poore, aged, and decrepit householders) releued, to the great commendation of that worthy man, who so liued in worship, that his death by his worthy doings maeth him still aliu; for he was not forgetfull to beaustifie the good state of this citie, in which by wealth he had tasted of Gods blessings.]

About this same time, diuerſe men were punished that had vpon a presumptuous boldnesse spoken manie slanderous words against the kings maiestie, hoping still for the arriuall of the seigned Richard duke of Yorke. After the death of sir William Stanley, Giles lord Daubenie was elected and made the kings chiefe chamberlaine. Also, the H. sent into Ire-land to purge out the euill & wicked seeds of rebellion amongst the wild & sauaige Irish people, soled there by the craftie conſealance of Perkin Warbecke sir Henrie Deane, late abbat of Langtonie (whome he made chamberlaine of that Isle) sir Edward Poynings knight, with an armie of men. The fauourers of Perkin, hearing that sir Edward Poynings was come with a power to persecute them, withdrew streightwaies, and fled into the woods and marishes for the safegard of themselves.

Sir Edward Poynings according to his commission, intending to punish such as had aided and aduanced the enterprise of Perkin, with his whole armie marched forward against the wild Irishmen, because that all other being culpable of that offense, fled and resorted to them for succour. But when he saw that his purpose succeeded not as he would haue wished it; both because the Irish lords sent him no succour according to their promises; and also for that his owne number was not sufficient to furnish his enterprise, because his enemies were dispersed amongst woods, mounteins, and marishes: he was constrained to recule backe, fore displeased in his mind against Gerald earle of Wildare, being then the kings deputie.

Now, the cause of this his discontentment was, for that the said earle was suspected to be the meane that he had no succours sent him, and was so informed in deed by such as bare the earle no good will. And therefore suddenlie he caused the earle to be apprehended, and as a prisoner brought him in his companie into England. Which earle being examined, and sundrie points of treason laid to him, he so annoyed them all, & laid the burthen in other mens necks, that he was dismissed, and sent into Ireland againe, there to be deputie and lieutenant as he was before. The king being now in some better snertie of his estate, did take his progresse into Lancashire the five & twentieth daie of June, there to make merrie with his mother the countesse of Derby, which then laie at Lathome in the countrie.

In this meane while, Perkin Warbecke, being in Flanders, fore troubled that his tuggling was discovered, yet he determined not to leaue off his enterprise, in hope at length to attaine the crowne of England: and so gathering a power of all nations, some bankrupts, some false English sanctuarie men, some theues, robbers, and vagabunds, which desiring to liue by rapine, were glad to serue him. And thus furnished, he toke such ships as his friends had prouided for him: and departing from Flanders towards England, he arriued vpon the Kentish coast, & there cast anchor, purposing to proue how the people there were affected towards him: and therefore he sent certeine of his men to land, to signifie to the countrie his arriuall with such powder, that the victorie must incline to his part.

The Kentishmen vnderstanding that Perkin was but Perkin, and had none with him (to make account of) but strangers bozne, like faithfull subjects determined to fall vpon those that were thus new come to land, and to trie if they might allure the whole number out of their ships, so to giue them battell. But Perkin wiselie considering that the maner of a multitude is not to consult, and sagelie to aduise with themselves in ante deliberate sort, but suddenlie and rashlie to run headlong into rebellion, would not set one foot out of his ship, but till he saw all things sure. Yet he permitted some of his souldiers to go on land, which being trained forth a pretie waie from their ships, were suddenlie compassed about and beset of the Kentishmen, and at one stroke vanquished and driuen backe to their ships.

Of these discomfited soules were taken prisoners an hundred and fortie persons, whereof Hue, Pontfort, Corbet, White, Belt, Quintin (or otherwile Genin) being capteins were brought to London by sir John Debie, shiriffe of Kent, railed in ropes like horses draving in a cart, & after vpon their arraignment confessed their offense, and were executed, some at London, and other in the towne adioining to the sea coast. And thus Perkin, missing of his purpose, fled backe into Flanders. In this verie season departed to the Countesse of Poike mother to king Edward the fourth, at hir castell of Berkhamsstead, a woman of small stature, but of much honour and high parentage, and was buried by hir husband in the college of Ffordinge.

The king being advertised that his enemies were landed, leaving off his progresse, purposed to have returned to London; but being certified the next day of the luckie speed of his faithfull subiects, continued his progresse, & did send sir Richard Wilford both to commend the fidelitie and manhood of the Kentishmen, and also to render to them most hartie thanks for the same. He also caused order to be taken for the creating of beacons, and watching of them. Perkin then perceiving that he should not be received into England, sailed into Ireland, trusting there to augment his numbers, and then to returne towards the coast of England againe, and to take land in the West countrie, if occasion served; but if not, then he determined to saile straight into Scotland, to seek his friendship there.

After he had therefore staid a while in Ireland, and perceived that the hope of victorie consisted not in the Irish nation, being naked people, without furniture of armour or weapon, he took the sea againe at Corke, and sailed into Scotland; where coming to the presence of king James, he forged such a painted processe to moue him to beleue that he was the verie sonne of king Edward; that the Scottish king, whether blinded with error, or bling dissimulation, that he might vnder a colourable pretext make war against England, began to haue Perkin in great honour, and caused him openlie to be called duke of Poike. And to persuaade the world that so he was indeed, he caused the ladie Katharine, daughter to Alexander earle of Huntley, his nigh kinsman, to be espoused to him. (But yet we passe anie further, you shall see and peruse (if you will) the said painted processe of Perkin, as it is left in record by Edward Hall for an example what working force is in words (speciallie where the hearers are easie to be seduced) and not to be ouer hastie to giue them too quicke & hastie credit. The colourable oration or counterfeited tale that Perkin told the king of Scots to iustifie his false title.

Abt. Elem. ex Edw. Hall fol. xxxviii, xxxix. Perkin saith that he is Edward the fourths lawfull sonne.

Thinke it is not vnknowne vnto you (most noble king and puissant prince) into what ruine the stocke house, and familie of Edward the fourth, of that name king of England, is now of late brought to and fallen in, either by Gods permission, or by diuine punishment; whose indubitate sonne (if you know not alreadye) I am, and by the power of almighty God, preferred alieue to this houre from the mightie hand of a tyrant. For my father king Edward (when he died) appointed his brother Richard duke of Gloucester to be our gouernour, protector, and defendour; whome the more that he loued & studied to aduance and promote, the better he thought that he would loue, fauour, and tender his children. But alas my vnfortunate chance I may say how hath his trust bene turned into treason, and his hope into hinderance, all men know and I feele.

Our vncke was not the tutor and preseruer of our stocke and linage, but the confounder & destroyer of our bloud and progenie. For that tyrant, blinded and gluttied with the desire of ruling and souereigntie, commanded Edward my brother & me to be slaine and dispatched out of this mortall life. Whereupon that person, to whome the weightie and cruell charge was committed and giuen to oppresse and destroye by power innocent infants and guiltlesse babes, the more that he abhorred this heinous and butcherlie offense, the more he feared to commit it.

And so wauering in mind and doubtfull what to doe, at the length willing in part to slanch the bloudie thirst of the unnatural tyrant, and in part to abstaine from so heinous & detestable homicide, he destroyed my brother and preserued me; like the good priest Joiada, who saved little Joas, when all the children of the bloud totall were commanded by Athalia the queene to be slaine and vtterlie destroyed. And further, to the intent that my life might be in surer, he appointed one to conueie me into some strange countrie; where when I was furthest off, and had most need of comfort he forsooke me suddenly (I thinke he was so appointed to doe) and left me desolate alone without friend or knowlege of anie reliefe or refuge. And so king Richard did obtaine the crowne as a preie mischevouslie gotten by the dispatching awaie of my brother and me. So that I thus elcasing, by reason of my tender infancie, forgot almost my selfe, and knew not well what I was. But after long wandering from countrie to countrie, and from citie to citie, I perceived and learned by little and little what was my estate & degree, and so in conclusion came to mine owne aunt the ladie Margaret living in Flanders, which was sometime married to Charles duke of Burgogne, which as ioifullie receiued and welcomed me, as if I had come out of hell into heauen, as the onelie type and garland of hir noble stirpe and linage. But forasmuch as he being onelie dowager of the duchie of Burgogne, and hauing nothing but hir dowrie proper to hir selfe, was not of power to helpe me with men and munitions of warre, as she would gladlie haue done for the recouerie of my fathers reime & rightfull inheritance: I therefore am driuen to seeke further aid and succour.

And therefore by hir counsell and aduertisement, with this small handfull of men of warre and souldiers, I am repaired to your presence for succours; of whome (as the publike fame is spread ouer the whole world) there was neuer man by wrong or iniurie chased or driuen out of his countrie, region, or inheritance, or by extort power and tyrannie kept out of the same (as I my selfe from mine infancie haue bene) whose request was frustrate and denied at your hand. Therefore, by the maiestie of your realme & countrie I desire, & heaue with with praier as I can, I beseech and exhort you to helpe and relieue me now in my extreme necessitie. And if it chance me by your aid and succour to recouer & possesse my fathers realme and dignitie; not onelie I, but all the kings of our linage, which hereafter shall obtaine the same, shall be so much obliged and bound vnto you; that they must needs thinke, that doing to you all the pleasure and benefits that they can, yet with all thanks that can be giuen your great kindnesse can neuer in full measure be recompensed.

When he had thus said, the king bad him be of good comfort, and promised him that whatsoeuer he were, it should neuer repent him of his comming to him.] Shortly after, hauing this Perkin with him in companie, he entered into England with a puissant armie, and caused proclamation to be made, to spare all those that would submit themselves vnto Richard duke of Yorke. Wherewith they began the warre in most cruell manner, with slaughter of men, burning of towne, spoiling of houses, and committing of all other detestable enormities; so that all the countrie of Northumberland was by them in manner wasted, and destroyed. At length, when the souldiers were laden with spoiles, and faciate with blood, perceiuing that no succours came out of England vnto the new inuaded duke, contrarie to that which he had made them to beleue would come to passe; they determined to retire rather with assured gaine, than to tarrise the vncertaine victorie of that counterfeit duke, and so thereupon they withdrew backe into Scotland enriched with preies and booties.

It is said, that Perkin Warbeck, being returned into Scotland with the king of Scots, vnder a cloaked pretense should fore lament the great slaughter, spoile, and damage, which had bene done at this last roade made into England; and therefore as one that bare a naturall loue toward his native countrie, besought the king of Scots, that from thenceforth, he would no more so deface his naturall reline, and destroy his subiects with such terrible fire, flame and haucke; as who should saie, he being overcome now with compassion, did beuaile the cruell destruction of his naturall countrie of England. But the Scottish k. told him, that he seemed to take thought for that which appeared to be none of his, sith that not so much as one gentleman or yeoman (for ought he could see) would once shew themselves readie to aid him in the warre begun for his cause, & in his name, within that realme which he pretended to claime to appertene to him.

The king of England being certified of this inuasion, prepared an armie with all diligence to haue resisted the Scots: but they were returned yer the English power could assemble together. Now when the king was truelie certified that the Scottish king was returned home, he staied all the preparations made at that time to go against him. But yet meaning to be reuenged of the wrongs done to him by king James and his people; he first called a parlement, and in that assemble of three estates of the realme, he declared the cause of the instant warre, and how necessarie it should be for the suertie and wealth of the realme of England to haue that warre pursued against those enemies that had begun it. To this motion all the nobilitie wholie agreed. And to the maintenance of that warre, a subsidie was by whole assent of the parlement freely giuen and granted. Which payment though it was not great, yet manie of the common people soze grudged to pay the same, as they that euer abhorre such taxes and exactions. At the same parlement were diuerse acts and statutes made, necessarie & expedient (as was thought) for the publike weale of the realme.

In the meane season the king of Scots, perceiuing that the Englishmen would shortly go about to reuenge the iniuries done to them by him and his people, assembled esthones a puissant armie, that he might either defend his realme against the English power, attempting to inuade his countrie, or else freshly to enter into the English borders. And thus these two mightie princes minded nothing more than the one to indamage the other. But the king of England would not deferre one houre by (his good will) till he were reuenged, and therefore prepared a mightie armie to inuade Scotland, and ordeined for chiefeine thereof the lord Daubenie. But as this armie was assembled, and that the lord Daubenie was forward on his iourne towards Scotland, he was suddenie staied and called backe againe, by reason of a new commotion begun by the Cornishmen for the payment of the subsidie which was granted at the last parlement.

These vnrulie people the Cornishmen, inhabiting in a barren countrie and vnfruitfull, at the first soze repined that they should be so grauonslie taxed, and burdened the kings counsell as the onelie cause of such polling and pilling: and so being in their rage, menaced the chiefe authozs with death and present destruction. And thus being in a roze, two persons of the same affinitie, the one called Thomas Flam-mocke, a gentleman, learned in the lawes of the realme; and the other Michaell Joseph, a smith, men of stout stomachs and high courages, toke vpon them to be capteins of this seditious companie. They laid the fault and cause of this exaction vnto John Morton archbishop of Canturburie, and to sir Reginald Bzake; because they were chiefe of the kings counsell. Such rewards haue they commonlie that be in great authoritie with kings and princes.

The capteins Flam-mocke and Joseph exhorted the common people to put on harnesse, and not to be asfeard to follow them in that quarrell, promising not to hurt anie creature, but onelie to see them punished that procured such exactions to be laid on the people, without anie reasonable cause, as vnder the colour of a little trouble with the Scots, which sith they were withydwone home they toke to be well quieted and appeased. So these capteins bent on mischief, (were their outward pretense neuer so finelie coloured) perswaded a great number of people to assemble together, and condescended to do as their capteins would agree and appoint. When these capteins praising much the hardines of the people, when all things were ready for their infortunate iourne, set forward with their armie, and came to Taunton, where they slue the prouost of Berin, which was one of the commissioners of the subsidie, and from thence came to Welles, so intending to go to London, where the king then sojourned.

When the king was aduertised of these doings, he was somewhat astonied, and not without cause; being thus troubled with the warre against the Scots, and this ciuill commotion of his subiects at one instant. But first meaning to subdue his rebellious subiects; and after to proceed against the Scots, as occasion should serue, he reuoked the lord Daubenie which (as you haue heard) was going against the Scots, and increased his armie with manie chosen and piked warriours. Also mistrusting that the Scots might now (hauing such opportunitie) inuade the reline againe, he appointed the lord Th. Howard erle of Surrie (which after the death of the lord Witham was made high treasurer of England) to gather a band band of men in the countie Palatine of Durham, that they with the aid of the inhabitants adjoining, and the borderers, might keepe backe the Scots if they chanced to make any inuasion. The nobles of the realme hearing of the rebellion of the Cornishmen, came to London, euery man with as many men of warre as they could put in a readinesse, to aid the king if need should be. In the which number were the earle of Essex, and the lord Montjoy, with diuerse other.

James Twichet lord Audelie cheefe captaine of the Cornish rebels.

In the meane time, James Twichet lord Audelie being confederate with the rebels of Cornwall joined with them, being come to Welles, and toke vpon him as their cheefe captaine to lead them against their naturall lord and king. From Welles they went to Salisbury, and from thence to Winchester, and so to Kent, where they hoped to haue had great aid, but they were deceiued in that their expectation. For the erle of Kent, George lord of Aburguenie, John Brooke, lord Cobham, sir Edward Poynings, sir Richard Gifford, sir Thomas Bourchier, John Deche, William Scot, and a great number of people, were not onely prest and readie to defend the countie, to keepe the people in due obedience, but bent to fight with such as would lift vp sword, or other weapon against their soueraigne lord: inasmuch that the Kentishmen would not once come nere the Cornishmen, to aid or assist them in any manner of wise.

Want of the Cornishmen take their heaues by night.

Which thing maruelouslie dismayed the hearts of the Cornishmen, when they saw themselves thus deceiued of the succours which they most trusted vpon, so that many of them (feearing the euill chance that might happen) fled in the night from their companie, and left them, in hope so to saue themselves. The captaines of the rebels, perceiving they could haue no helpe of the Kentishmen, putting their onely hope in their owne puissance, brought their people to Blacke heath, a foure miles distant from London, and there in a plaine on the top of an hill, they ordered their battels, either readie to fight with the king if he would assaile them, or else to assault the citie of London: for they thought the king durst not haue encountered with them in battell. But they were deceiued: for the king although he had power inough about to haue fought with them before their coming so nere to the citie; yet he thought it best to suffer them to come forward, till he had them farre off from their native countie, and then to set vpon them being destitute of aid in some place of aduantage.

The citie of London fore afraid of the rebels.

The citie was in a great feare at the first knowledge giuen, how the rebels were so nere incamped to the citie, euery man getting himselfe to harnesse, and placing themselves, some at the gates, some on the walles, so that no part was undefended. But the king deliuered the citie of that feare: for after that he perceived how the Cornishmen were all daie readie to fight, and that on the hill, he sent straight John Earle of Wrenford, Henrie Bourchier, earle of Essex, Edmund de la Pole, earle of Suffolke, sir Rafe ap Thomas, and sir Humfreie Stanleie, noble warriors, with a great companie of archers and horsemen, to entaile the hill on the right side, and on the left, to the intent that all bywaters being stopped and foreclosed, all hope of flight should be taken from them. And incontinentlie he himselfe, being as well incouraged with manie stomachs as furnished with a populous armie and plentie of artillerie, set forward out of the citie, and incamped himselfe in saint Georges field, where he on the first daie at night then lodged.

On the saturday in the morning, he sent the lord Daubenie with a great companie to set on them earlie in the morning, which first got the bridge at Wretford Strand, which was manfullie defended by certeine archers of the rebels, whose arrowes (as is reported) were in length a full cloth yard. While the earles set on them on euery side, the lord Daubenie came into the field with his companie, and without long fighting, the Cornishmen were overcome; and first they toke the lord Daubenie prisoner: but whether it were for feare, or for hope of fauour, they let him go at libertie, without hurt or detriment. There were slaine of the rebels which fought and resisted, aboue two thousand men (as Edward Hall noteth) and taken prisoners an infinite number, & amongst them the blacke smith, and other the cheefe captaines, which were shortly after put to death. When this battell was ended, the king wanted of all his numbers but thre hundred, which were slaine at that conflict.

Some affirme, that the king appointed to haue fought with them not till the mondaie, and preventing the time set on them on the saturday before, taking them vnprovidid, and in no arraie of battell; and so by that policie obtained the field and victory. The prisoners as well captaines as other, were pardoned, sauing the cheefe captaines and first beginners, to whom he shewed no mercie at all. The lord Audelie was dyuine from Newgate to the Towler hill in a coate of his owne armes, painted vpon paper reuerfed and all to foyne, and there was beheaded the foure and twentieth of June. Thomas Flammecke & Michaell Joseph were hanged, dyuine, and quartered after the maner of traitors, & their heads and quarters were pitched vpon stakes, and set vp in London, and in other places: although at the first, the king meant to haue sent them into Cornwall, to haue bene set vp there for a terror to all others. But hearing that the Cornishmen at home were readie to begin a new conspiracie, leaif he should the more irritate and prouoke them by that displeasing sight, he changed his purpose, for doubt to wray himselfe in more trouble than needed.

While these things were aduoying in England, the king of Scots being aduertised of the whole matter and rebellion of the Cornishmen, thought not to let passe that occasion: and therefore he estones invaded the frontiers of England, wasting the countie, burning towne, and murdering the people, sparing neither place nor person: and while his light horsemen were riding to forraie and despoile the bishoprike of Durham, and there burned all about, he with an other part of his armie did besiege the castell of Poatham. The bishop of Durham Richard For, being owner of that castell, had well furnished it both with men and munitions aforehand, doubting least that would follow which came now to passe. The bishop, after that the Scots made this inuasion, aduertised the king (as then being at London) of all things that chanced in the North parts; and sent in all post hast to the earle of Surrie, to come to the rescue. The earle being then in Dorsetshire, and hauing gathered an armie, vpon knowledge giuen to him from the bishop, with all diligence marched forward, and after him followed other noble men out of all the quarters of the North, euery of them bringing as many men as they could gather, for defense of their countie.

Amongst these, the cheefe leaders were, Rafe earle of Westmerland, Thomas lord Dacres, Rafe lord Peuill, George lord Strange, Richard lord Latimer, George lord Lumleie, John lord Scrope, Henrie lord Clifford, George lord Ogle, William lord Coniers, Thomas lord Darcie. Of knights, Thomas baron of Hiltten, sir William Persie, sir William Bulmer, sir William Salcoigne, sir Rafe Bigod, sir Kase Bowes, sir Thomas a Parre, sir Kase Ellec-ker, sir John Constable, sir John Kitchiffe, sir John Dauid, sir Thomas Strangweis, and a great number of other knights and esquires besides. The whole armie was little lesse than twentie thousand men, beside the naue, whereof the lord Brooke was admettall.

When the Scots had diuerse waies assaulted and beaten the castell of Roxham, but could make no batterrie to enter the same, they determined of their owne accord to raise the siege, and returne; and that so much the sooner in verie deed, because they heard that the earle of Surrie was within two daies iournie of them, with a great puissance. Wherefore king James raised his siege, and returned home into his owne realme. When the earle knew of the kings returne, he followed him with all hast possible, trusting fuerlie to ouertake him, and to giue him battell. When the earle was entered Scotland, he ouerthrew and besaced the castell of Caldecstreines, the tower of Hertenhall, the tower of Edington, the tower of Fulden: and he sent Roxrie king at armes to the captaine of Halton castell, which was one of the strongest places betwixt Berwike and Edenburgh, to deliuer him the castell. Which he denied to doe, affirming that he was sure of speedie succours.

The earle hereupon laid his ordinance to the castell, and continuallie beat it, from two of the clocke till five at night, in such wise, that they within rendered by the place, their liues onelic saued. The earle caused his minors to raise & ouerthrow the forresse to the plaine ground. The Scottish king was within a mile of the siege, and both knew it, and saw the smoke, but would not set one foot forward to the rescue. While the earle laie at Halton, the king of Scots sent to him Gachemont, and an other herald, desiring him at his election, either to fight with whole puissance against puissance, or else they two to fight person to person, requiring that if the victorie fell to the Scottish king, that then the earle should deliuer for his ranfome, the towne of Berwike, with the fishgarths of the same.

The earle made answer hereto, that the towne of Berwike was the king his maisters, and not his, the which he neither ought nor would laie to pledge, without the king of Englands assent; but he would gage his bodie, which was more pretious to him than all the townes of the world, promising on his honour, that if he took the king prisoner in that singular combat, he would release to him all his part of the fine and ranfome; and if it chanced the king to vanquish him, he would gladlie paie such ranfome as was conuenient for the degree of an earle, and thanked him greatly for the offer: for fuerlie he thought himselfe much honored, that so noble a prince would vouchsafe to admit so poore an earle to fight with him bodie to bodie. When he had rewarded and dismissed the heralds, he set his armie in a readinesse, to abide the coming of the king of Scots, and so stood all daie.

But king James not regarding his offers, would neither performe the one nor the other; fearing to cope with the English nation in any condition; and so thereupon fled in the night season with all his puissance. When the earle knew that the king was returned, and had bene in Scotland six or seven daies, being daile and nightlie vexed with continuall wind and raine, upon good and deliberate aduise returned backe to the towne of Berwike, and there dissolved his armie, tarrying there himselfe, till he might understand further of the kings pleasure. In the meane time there came an ambassadour to the li. of Scots from the li. of Spaine, one Peter Hialas, a man of no lesse learning than wit & policie, to moue & intret a peace betwene the two kings of England & Scotland [that their people might fall to their necessarie trades of aduantage with quietnesse, and friend with friend, husband with wife, father with children, and maisters with seruants dwell and accompanie: a dissolution and separation of whome one from another is procured by bloudie warre, wherein as there is no pittie, so is there is no pette, as one saith full trulie:

Nulla fides pietasque uiris qui castra sequuntur, Nulla salus bello.

Luc. lib. 19.

This Spanish ambassadour so earnestlie travelled in his message vnto the king of Scots, that at length he found him comformable to his purpose; and therefore wrote to the king of England, that it would please him to send one of his nobilitie or council, to be associat with him in concluding of peace with the Scottish king. The king of England was neuer dangerous to agree to any reasonable peace, so it might stand with his honour; and therefore appointed the bishop of Durham doctor For, to go into Scotland about that treatie which Peter Hialas had begun. The bishop (according to his commission) went honorablie into Scotland, where he and Peter Hialas at the towne of Jedworth, after long arguing and debating of matters with the Scottish commissioners, in freed of peace concluded a truce for certeine yeares; upon condition, that James king of Scots should conueie Perkin Warbecke out of his realme, seignories, and dominions.

About the same time, king Henrie received the ambassadours that were sent to him from the French king, and had bene staied at Douer, till the Cornish rebels were vanquished and subdued. Also the lord of Camphire, and other oratours of Philip archduke of Austrich, and duke of Burgognie came to him for the conclusion of amitie, and to haue the English merchants to resort againe to their countrie. Which request being verie agreeable to the quietnesse and wealth of his realme, and especiallie at that time, he did fauourable grant and agree vnto. And so did the Englishmen resort againe into the archdukes dominions, and were received into Antwerpe with general procession: so glad was that towne of their returne. Shortly after the concluding of the truce betwene England and Scotland, Perkin Warbecke being willed of the king of Scots to depart out of the Scottish dominions, sailed with his wife and familie into Ireland, there determining with himselfe either to repaire into Flanders to his first setter by the duches of Burgognie, or else ioine and take part with the Cornishmen.

But howsoever it came to passe, whilste he laie in Ireland, he had knowledge from the Cornishmen, that they were ready to renew the warre againe. Whereupon he minding not to let passe so fauourable an occasion, having with him foure small ships, and not aboue six score men, sailed into Cornewall; and there landed in the moneth of September, and came to a towne called Bodman, and there did so prouoke the wavering people, that with faire words and large promises, that he gathered to him aboue three thousand persons, which immediatlie called him their captaine, promising to take his part, and follow him to the death. When Perkin well encouraged, made proclamations in the name of king Richard the fourth, as sonne to king Edward the fourth. And by the aduise of his three counsellors, John Heron mercer a bankrupt, Richard Skelton a tailor, and John Astle a seruener determined first of all to assaie the winning of Excester.

When halting thither, he laid siege to it, and making ordinance to make batterrie, studied all waies possible how to breake the gates, and what with casting of stones, heaving with iron barres, and kindling of fire under the gates, he omitted nothing that could be devised for the furtherance of his purpose. The citizens, perceiving in what danger they stood, first let certeine messengers dole out by cords over the wall, that might certifie the king of their necessitie & trouble. And herewith taking unto them boldnesse of courage, determined to repell fire with fire, and caused fagots to be brought and laid to the inward parts of the gates, and set them all on fire; to the intent that the fire being inflamed on both sides the gates, might as well keepe out their enemies from entering, as shut in the citizens from fleeing out, and that they in the meane season might make trenches and rampires to defend their enemies in stead of gates and bulwarks. Thus by fire was the citie preserved from fire.

Then Perkin of verie necessitie compelled to forsake the gates, assaulted the towne in diverse weake and unfortified places, and set up ladders to take the citie. But the citizens, with helpe of such as were come forth of the countrie adjoining to their aid, so valiantlie defended the walles, that they slew about two hundred of Perkins souldiers at that assault. The king hauing aduertisement of this siege of Excester, hastied forth with his host, in as much speed as was possible, and sent the lord Daubeneie with certeine bands of light horsemen before, to aduertise all men of his coming at hand. But in the meane season, the lord Edward Courtenie earle of Deuonshire, and the valiant lord William saint Maure, accompanied with sir Edmund Carew, sir Thomas Trenchard, sir William Courtenie, sir Thomas Fulford, sir John Halewell, sir John Croker, Water Courtenie, Peter Edgecombe, William saint Maure, with all speed came into the citie of Excester, and holpe the citizens, and at the last assault was the earle hurt in the arme with an arrow, and so were manie of his companie, but verie few slaine.

When Perkin saw that he could not win the citie of Excester, sith he sawe it was so well fortified both with men and munitions, he departed from thence, and went unto Taunton, and there the twentieth day of September he mustered his men; as though he were readie to give battell: but perceiving his number to be diminished, by the secret withdrawing of sundrie companies from him, he began to put mistrust in all the remnant. In deed when the people that followed him, in hope that no small number of the nobilitie would come with him, saw no such matter come to passe, they felle auaie from him by secret companies. When the king heard that he was gone to Taunton, he followed after him with all speed. And by the way there came to him Edward duke of Buckingham, a young prince of great forwardnesse; and him followed a great companie of noble men, knights and esquiers, as sir Alexander Balam, sir Maurice Barkleie, sir Robert Came, sir John Cuisse, sir Robert Pointz, sir Henrie Vernon, sir John Portimer, sir Thomas Tremalle, sir Edward Sutton, sir Amise Paulet, sir John Birkenell, sir John Sapcotes, sir Hugh Lutterell, sir Francis Cheineie, and diuerse other.

At the kings approaching to the towne of Taunton, he sent before him Robert lord Brooke lord steward of his house, Giles lord Daubeneie his chiefe chamberleine, and sir Rice ap Thomas. But as some as Perkin was informed that his enemies were readie to give him battell, he that nothing lesse minded than to fight in open field with the kings puissance, dissembled all the daie time with his companie, as though nothing could make him afraid: and about midnight, accompanied with three score horsemen, he departed from Taunton in post to a sanctuarie towne beside Southampton, called Beaulieu, & there he and John Heron with other registered themselves as persons privileged. When as king Henrie knew that Perkin was thus fled, he sent after him the lord Daubeneie with five hundred horsemen toward the sea side, to apprehend him before he should get away. Although Perkin escaped (as I haue said) vnto sanctuarie, yet manie of his chiefe captiues were taken and presented to the king.

Also the horsemen that were sent, without any stop or staie came to saint Michaels mount, and there (as chance was) found the ladie Katharine Courtenie wife to Perkin, and brought hir straight to the king. At whose beautie and amiable countenance the king much marvelled, and thought hir a piece more meet for a prince, than for the meane souldiers, and sent hir incontinentlie vnto London to the queene, accompanied with a sort of sage matrones and gentlewomen, because she was but young. The common people that had followed Perkin, after that their chiefeleine was fled, threw auaie their armour as people amazed, and submitted themselves to the king, humbly beseeching him of merrie, which he most gentlie granted, and received them to his fauour. After this the king rood to Excester, and there not onelie commended the citizens, but also hartlie thanked them for doing so well their duties in defending their citie from their enemies. He also put there to execution diuerse Cornishmen, which were the authors and principall beginners of this new conspiracie and insurrection. Neuerthelesse, he shed marvellous clemencie also in pardoning a great number of the rebels.

For when king Henrie was come to Excester with a great armie, moued thereto (as you haue heard) by reason of the rebellion of Perkin Warbeck, who was fled before the kings coming, he staied a few daies about the examination of the said rebellion, and the executing of the chiefe and principall captiues. In the end, the multitude of the offenders being great, and most humbly craving for pardon, the king caused them all to be assembled in the churchyard of saint Peters, where they all appeared bare headed, in their shirts, and with halters about their necks. His grace was then lodged in the treasurerors house, lieng fast vpon the churchyard, and out of a faire and large window (made for the purpose) he toke the view of them, who shouted and cried out for pardon. At length, when the king had paused, he made a speech vnto them, exhorting them to obedience, and in hope he should thereby find them dutifull, he pardoned them all: whereat they all made a great shout, gaue the king thanks, and hurled auaie their halters. Yet neuerthelesse, some returned againe, and joined themselves with the Cornish people, which had not all submitted themselves, nor sought for pardon.]

Now while he remained at Excester, he considered with himselfe, that he had done nothing, if he could not get into his hands the chiefe head of this trouble and seditious businesse. Wherefore he caused the sanctuarie wherein Perkin was inclosed, to be intorned with two bands of light horsemen, to watch diligentlie, that Perkin should not escape by any meanes forth of that place vntaken: and withall attempted by faire promises of pardon and forgiveness, if Perkin would submit himselfe to him and become his man. Perkin perceiving himselfe so shut by, that he could no waie escape, of his owne free will came out of the sanctuarie, and committed himselfe to the kings pleasure. When the king had thus attained his purpose, he returned to London, and appointed certeine keepers to attend on Perkin, which should not (the breadth of a naile) go from his person; least he should conueie himselfe by any meanes out of the

the land [and set them troubles abroad by such practices as he had to fore] bled, for the advancement of himselfe to the estate of a king, by assuming vnto himselfe the name of a kings sonne, when in deed he was come of base parentage. But Iacke will be a gentleman, the long eared aile will be taken for a leopard, a the pelting pishie for a lion, as one saith:

After this, the king caused inquries to be made, of all such as had aided with men or monie the English rebels, so that diuerse persons as well in Shiremerethire as Denonshire were detoured of that offense which he intended for example sake should take some part of the punishments for their crimes, according to the qualitie thereof. And therefore he appointed Thomas lord Darcie, Amies Anglet knight, and Robert Sherborne deane of Beules (that was after bishop of Chichester) to be commissioners for assessing of their fines that were found culpable. These commissioners so bestired themselves, in tolling the costs and substance of all the inhabitants of both those shires, that there was not one person imbrued or spotted with the filth of that abominable crime, that escaped the paine which he had deserved: but to such yet as offended rather by constraint than of malice, they were gentle and fauourable, so that equitie therein was verie well and iustlie executed.

In this yeare all the gardens which had bene continued time out of mind, without more gate of London, were destroyed, and of them was made a plaine field for archers to shoot in. Also this yeare was a great drought, by reason whereof a load of haie, which was before sold at London at five shillings, was this yeare sold for ten or twelue more. Also this yeare, one Sebastian Cabato, a Genoas sonne, borne in Bristow, possessing himselfe to be expert in knowledge of the circuit of the world, and Islands of the same, as by his charts and other reasonable demonstrations he shewed, caused the king to man and vittell a ship at Bristow, to search for an Island which he knew to be replenished with rich commodities. In the ship diuerse merchants of London aduentured small stocks, and in the companie of this ship sailed also out of Bristow three or foure small ships fraught with light and grosse wares, as course cloath, caps, laies, points, and such other.

Sir Humtrie Gilbert knight, in his booke intituled, A discoverie for a new passage to Cataia, writeth thus: Sebastian Cabato, by his personall experience and trauell, hath described and set forth this passage in his charts, which are yet to be seene in the queenes maiesties priuie gallerie at Whitehall, who was sent to make this discoverie by king Henrie the seuenth, and entered the same first, affirming that he sailed verie farre westward, with a quarter of the north, on the north side of terra de Labrador, the eleuenth of June, untill he came to the septentrionall latitude of 67½ degrees, and finding the seas still open, said, that he might & would haue gon to Cataia, if the enuie of the maister and mariners had not bene. Nevertheless, he went verie farre, euen to a nation inhabited with people more like beasts than men, as appeareth in the yeare 1502, and the seuententh of this kings reigne, when the said traueler was returned, and presented himselfe to the kings maiestie.

In this yeare the warre had like to haue bene renewed betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland by a small occasion, as thus. Certaine pongmen of the Scots came arrived before Rosham castell, & beheld it wondrous circumpectie, as though they would haue bene of counsell to know what was done therein. The keepers not perceiuing any damage attempted against them for the first time, determined not to moue any question to them, or once to stirre out. But when they came againe the next day, and viewed it likewise, the keepers of the castell suspecting some euill meaning, demanded of them what their intent was, and why they viewed and aduised so the castell. The Scots answered them roughly with disdainfull words, so that the Englishmen fell to and replied with strokes; and after manie blowes giuen and receiued, diuerse Scots were wounded, and some slaine; and the residue overmatched with multitude of the Englishmen, fled as fast as their horses could carie them.

The Scottish king hereof aduertised, was highly displeased, and in all hast signified to king Henrie by his herald Marchmont, in what sort his people (to the breach of the truce) were abused and handled. King Henrie being not in will to breake with any of his neighbours, excused the matter, affirming that he was not of knowledge to the misdemeanors of those that had the castell in keeping; requiring the king of Scots not to thinke the truce broken for a nite thing done without his consent; promising in the word of a king to inquire of the truth, and if the offense were found to be begun on the partie of the keepers of the castell, he assured him that they should for no meed nor fauour escape due correction and punishment.

This answer (though it was more than reasonable) could not pacifie the king of Scots, till the bishop of Durham (that was owner of the castell of Rosham) who sore lamented, that by such as he appointed keepers there, the warre should be renewed) with sundrie letters written to the Scottish king, at length asswaged his displeasure, so that the said king wrote courteously to the bishop againe, signifying that because he had manie secret things in his mind, which he would communicate onelie with him touching this matter now in variance; therefore he required him to take the paine to come into his courtie, trusting that he should thinke his labor well bestowed. The bishop was glad, and sent word hereof to the king his master, who willed him to accomplish the desire of the Scottish king, which he took to be reasonable.

At his comming into Scotland, he was courteously receiued of the king himselfe at the abbey of Melrose. And there, after the king had (for a countenance) complained much of the vniust slaughter of his men late committed at Rosham: upon the bishops gentle answers therunto, he forgane the same, and after began to talke secretlie without witness alone with the bishop. And first he declared what causes moued him in times past to seeke amitie with the king of England: which now he desired much more to haue confirmed, for further maintenance & increase thereof. Which he doubted not but should sort to a fortunate conclusion, if the king of England would vouchsafe to giue to him in matrimonie his first begotten daughter the ladie Margaret, upon which point he purposed latelie to haue sent his ambassadores into England, which thing he would the sooner do if he knew the bishops mind therein to be ready to further his sute. The bishop answered but few words, saying that when he were returned to the king his maister, he would do the best in the matter that he could.

When the bishop was returned into England, and come to the king, he declared to him all the communication had betwene king James and him, from point to point in order. The king liked well thereof, as he to whom peace was euer a soueraigne solace and comfort. In this meane time Perkin Warbecke, disappointed of all hope to escape out of the Englishmens hands (which was the onelie thing that he most desired) found meanes yet at length to deceiue his keepers, & took him to his heels. But when he came to the sea coasts, and could not passe, he was in a marvellous perplexitie: for euerie byway, lane, and corner was laid for him, and such search made, that being brought to his wits end, and cut short of his pretended iournie, he came to the house of Bethlem, called the priozie of Shene beside Richmond in Southerie, and betooke himselfe to the prioz of that monasterie, requiring him for the honour of God, to beg his pardon of life of the kings maiestie.

The prioz, which for the opinion that men had conceiued of his vertue, was had in great estimation, pittying the wretched state of that castife, came to the king, and shewed him of this Perkin, whose pardon he humbly craved, and had it as freely granted. Incontinentlie after was Perkin brought to the court againe at Westminster, and was one day set fettered in a paire of stocks, before the doore of Westminister hall, and there stood a whole day, not without innumerable reproches, mocks and scorings. And the next daie he was caried through London, and set vpon a like scaffold in Cheape by the standard, with like gannes and stocks as he occupied the daie before, and there stood all daie, and read openlie his owne confession, written with his owne hand, the verie copie whereof here insueth.

And after I was led by my mother to Antwerpe for to learne Flemish, in a house of a coufine of mine, an officer of the said towne, called John Stienbecke, with whome I was the space of halfe a yere. And after that I returned againe to Turneie, by reason of warres that were in Flanders. And within a yere following I was sent with a merchant of the said towne of Turneie, named Berlo, to the mart of Antwerpe, where I fell sicke, which sickenesse continued vpon me fve moneths. And the said Berlo set me to boord in a skippers house, that dwelled beside the house of the English nation. And by him I was from thence caried to Barow mart, and I lodged at the signe of the old man, where I abode for the space of two moneths.

After this, the said Berlo set me with a merchant of Middleborow to seruite for to learne the language, whose name was John Strew, with whome I dwelt from Christmasse to Easter, and then I went into Portingall in companie of sir Edward Bramptons wife, in a ship which was called the quans ship. And when I was come thither, then was I put in seruite to a knight that dwelled in Lushborne, which was called Peter Wacs de Cogna, with whome I dwelled an whole yere, which said knight had but one eie. And bicause I desired to see other countries, I took licence of him, and then I put my selfe in seruice with a Britan, called Regent Mreno, which brought me with him into Ireland. Now when we were there arrived in the towne of Corke, they of the towne (bicause I was arraigned with some cloths of silke of my said maisters) came vnto me, & threatened vpon me that I should be the duke of Clarences sonne, that was before time at Dublin.

But forsomuch as I denied it, there was brought vnto me the holie euangelists, and the crosse, by the maior of the towne, which was called John Leweline, and there in the presence of him and others, I took mine oth (as the truth was) that I was not the foresaid dukes sonne, nor none of his bloud. And after this came vnto me an Englishman, whose name was Stephan Poitron, and one John Water, and laid to me in swearing great oths, that they knew well that I was king Richards bastard sonne: to whome I answered with like oths, that I was not. Then they aduised me not to be afeard, but that I should take it vpon me boldlie: and if I would so do, they would aid and assist me with all their power against the king of England; & not onelie they, but they were well assured, that the earle of Desmond & Kildare should do the same.

For they forced not what part they toke, so that they might be reuenged on the king of England: and so against my will made me to learne English, and taught me what I should do and saie. And after this they called me duke of Porke, second sonne to king Edward the fourth, bicause king Richards bastard sonne was in the handes of the king of England. And vpon this the said Water, Stephan Poitron, John Tiler, Hughbert Burgh, with manie others, as the foresaid earles, entered into this false quarell, and within short time others. The french k. sent an ambassadoz into Ireland, whose name was Loit Lucas, and maister Stephan Friham, to aduertise me to come into France. And then I went into France, and from thence into Flanders, & from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, & so into England.

When the night of the same daie ( being the fifteenth of June ) was come , after he had stood all that daie in the face of the citie , he was committed to the Tower , there to remaine under safe keeping , least hapilie he might euenes run awaie , and escape out of the land , to put the king and realme to some new trouble . For he had a wonderfull dexteritie and readinesse to circumuent , a heart full of ouerreaching imaginations , an aspiring mind , a head more willic ( I willic ) than witlic : hold he was and presumptuous in his behaviour , as forward to be the instrument of a mischief , as anie deuiler of wickednesse would wish ; a fend in the studie of commotions , making offer to reach as high as he could looke ; such was his inordinate ambition , wherewith he did swell as conueting to be a princes peer : much like the tode that would match the buil in drinking , but in the end she burst in peeces and neuer dranke more ; as the poet telleth the tale ( by the imitation of the fabler ) saieing :

cygnus aquare bibendo Rana bouem , supra nunquam bibit amplius alio.

In this yeare was an Augustine frier called Patrike in the parties of Suffolke , the which hauing a scholer named Rafe Willford ( a shoemakers sonne of London as Stow noteth ) had so framed him to his purpose , that in hope to worke some great enterprise , as to disappoint the king of his crowne and seat roiall , take vpon him to be the earle of Warwicke , inso much that both the maister and scholer hauing counselled betwene themselves of their enterprise , they went into Kent , & there began the young malice met to tell priuile to manie , that he was the verie earle of Warwicke , and latelie gotten out of the Tower , by the helpe of this frier Patrike . To which saieings when the frier perceiued some light credence to be giuen , he declared it openlie in the pulpit , and desired all men of helpe . But the danger of this seditions attempt was shortly remoued and taken awaie , the maister and scholer being both apprehended and cast into prison and atteinted .

The scholer was hanged on Shrouetuesdaie at saint Thomas Waterings , and the frier condemned to perpetual prison . For at that time so much reuerence was attributed to the holie orders , that to a prest ( although he had committed high treason against his soueraine lord ) his life was spared , in like case as to anie other offender in murder , rape , or theft , that had receiued anie of the thre higher holie orders . ( The chiefe cause ( saith Edward Hall ) of this fauour was this , because bishops of a long time and season did not take knowledge , nor intermix themselves with the search & punishment of such heinous and detestable offenses : by reason whereof they did not disgrace and depriue from the holie orders such malefactors and wicked persons , which without that ceremonie by the canon lawes could not be put to death .

Furthermore , what should a man saie , it was also bled , that he that could but onelie read ( yea although he vnderstand not what he read ) how heinous or detestable a crime so euer he had committed ( treason onelie excepted ) should likewise as affines & allies to the holie orders be faued , and committed to the bishops prison . And to the intent that if they should escape , and be againe taken , committing like offense , that their liues be no more to them pardoned : it was ordeined that murderers should be burnt on the bialme of the left hand with an hot iron signed with this letter M . and thieves in the same place with this letter T . So that if they , which were once signed with anie of these marks or tokens did reiterate like crime & offense againe , should suffer the paines and punishments which they had both merited and deser-ued . Which decre was enacted and established in a session of parlement kept in the time of this kings reigne , and taken ( as I coniecture ) of the French nation , which are wont , if they take anie such offender , to cut off one of his eares , as a sure token and marke hereafter of his euill doing . ]

Perkin Warbecke ( as before ye haue heard ) being now in hold , by false persuasions and great promises corrupted his keepers , Stranguis , Blewet , Ashwood , and long Roger , seruants to sir John Digbie lieutenant of the Tower . Inso much that they ( as it was at their arraignment openlie proued ) intended to haue slaine their maister , and to haue set Perkin and the earle of Warwicke at large . Which earle of Warwicke had bene kept in prison within the Tower almost from his tender yeares , that is to saie , from the first yeare of the king , to this sixtenth yeare , out of all companie of men & sight of beastes , inso much that he could not discerne a gosse from a capon , and therefore by common reason and open apparance could not of himselfe seeke his owne death and destruction . But yet by the dyist and offense of an other he was brought to his death and confusion .

For being made priuile of this enterprise deuised by Perkin and his complices , thereunto ( as all naturall creatures loue libertie ) he assented and agreed . But this craftie deuile and subtil imagination being reuealed , sorted to none effect , so that Perkin and John Awater sometime maior of Corkie in Ireland , one of his chiefe founders , and his sonne , were on the sixtenth daie of Nouember arreigned and condemned at Westminister . And on the thre and twentieth daie of the same moneth , Perkin and John Awater were draine to Tiburne , where Perkin standing on a little scaffold , read his confession ( as before he had done in Cheape side ) taking it on his death to be true . And so he and John Awater asked the king forgiveness , and died patientlie .

This was the reward of the feined glose and counterfeited comment of Perkin Warbecke , the which as by his false surmises in his life time had brought manie honourable personages to their deaths , and vndone manie an honest man : so now at his death he brought other of the same sort to their not altogether vnderferued punishment . And amongst others Edward Plantagenet the forenamed erle of Warwicke , which ( as the same went ) consented to breake prison , and to depart out of the realme with Perkin ( which in prisoners is high treason ) was the one and twentieth daie of the said moneth arreigned at Westminister before the earle of Drenford then high steward of England of the said treason , which ( whether it were by inticement and perswasion of other , or of his owne free will manie doubted , because of his innocencie ) confessed the fact , and submitted himselfe to the kings mercie ; and vpon his confession had his iudgement , and according therunto the eight and twentieth daie of Nouember in the yeare 1499 , was brought to the scaffold on the Tower hill , and there beheaded .

The same after his death sprang abroad , that Ferdinando king of Spaine would make no full conclusion of the matrimonie to be had betwene prince Arthur and the ladie Katharine daughter to the said Ferdinando , nor send him into England as long as this earle liued . For he imagined that so long as anie earle of Warwicke liued , England should neuer be purged of ciuill warre and priuie sedition ; so much was the name of Warwicke in other regions had in feare and gealouisie . The next yeare after there was a great plague , whereof men died in manie places be rie soze ; but speciallie and most of all in the citie of London , where died in that yeare thirtie thousand . yeare of this kings reigne his thirde son was christened and was named Edward. Also in this yeare was burned a place of the kings, called the manour of Shene situate nigh the Thames side, which he after builded againe sumptuoullie, and changed the name of Shene, and called it Richmond; because his father and he were earles of Richmond: or (as some note) for that so manie notable and rich iewels were there burnt. He also new builded Wainards castell in London, and repaired Crenelwich.]

The king, whether to avoid the danger of so great and perillous sicknesse, then raging, or to take occasion to commen with the duke of Burgonie, did personallie take his ship at Douer in the beginning of Maie, and sailed to Calis, whither the duke of Burgonie sent to him honourable personages in ambassage to welcome him into those parties, and to declare that the said duke would gladlie repaire personallie to his presence with such a number as the king should appoint, so that it were within no walled towne nor fortreffe. For hauing denied the French king to enter into anie of his fortreffes to talke with him, he would be loth now to giue a present to him to desire the like meeting. The king intertaining the ambassadors, and thanking the duke of his courteous offer, appointed the place at saint Peters church without Calis.

Upon tuesdaie in Whitsoneweke the archduke Philip came thither with a conuenient companie. The king and the queene with manie a lustie lord and ladie rode thither to welcome him. And when the king approached, the duke at his lighting offered to hold his stirrups, which the king in no wise would suffer to be done. When the king was descended from his horse, he and the archduke embraced each other with most princelie familiaritie, and then the queene and all the nobles saluted him. And after most louing interteiments, banquettings, mirth, and pastime thewed amongst them, there was communication of marriages, treating of further strengthening of leagues, requests of tolles in Flanders to be minished: with manie other things touching the commoditie and traffike of both their countries. And when all things were set in order, the two princes took their leave, and departed; the king to Calis, and the archduke to S. Omers. After his departing, there came as ambassadors from the French king, the lord Gronhouse gouernour of Picardie, and the lord Peruelliers bailiffe of Amiens, which declared to the king the getting of Millaine and taking of the duke. The king highlie pleased them, and rewarded them princelie at their departing.

Some after, when the death was slaked, the king returned againe into England about the end of Iune. Shortlie after there came to him one Casper Pons a Spaniard, a man of excellent learning and most ciuill behauiour, sent from Alexander the bishop of Rome to distribute the heauenlie grace (as he termed it) to all such as (letted by anie forceable impediment) could not come to Rome that yeare to the Iubile, which was there celebrate, being the yeare after the birth of our Sauour, 1500. This benenolent liberalitie was not altogether freelis giuen. For Alexander looking to the health of mens soules, thought to do somewhat for his owne priuat commoditie, & therefore he set a certeine pice of that his grace and pardon. And to the end that the king should not hinder his purpose, he offered part of his gaires to the king.

And to colour the matter with some fauourable pretext, and to make men the better willing, & more readie to giue franklie, he promised with that monie to make warre against the Turke. By this meanes the poye got a great masse of monie, which he had conueied ouer vnto him by such trustie messengers (doubt you not) as he had appointed; and yet nothing done against the Turkes, which in the meane season did much hurt to the christians. [For it was no part of his meaning (what colourable shew soeuer he made of tendering the succourlesse people) to impart anie portion thereof to so good a vie; but rather for the suppartation of him and his swarme, who before they will bate an ace of their gorgeous gallantnesse, the whole world shalbe consumed. Such is the collusion of the pope, such be the shamelesse shifts of him and his cleargie for the maintenance of their owne courtlie bzaierie, which is wicked banitie; farre passing the pompe of anie prince, were the same of neuer so rare magnificence; as he well noteth that said fable trullie:

immensis princeps non visus in orbe est, Cui tanti fastus tantaq; pompa fuit.

Ingredditur quando misere Babylon in urbes,

Cernitur hic plusquam regia pompa comes.

Huic equus est spumans ostrog insignis & auro, Alrisono cuius sub pede terra fremit, &c.]

About this time died thre bishops in England, John Porxon archbishop of Cantuarburie, Thomas Langton bishop of Winchester, and Thomas Rokeham archbishop of Yorke. After him succeeded Thomas Savage bishop of London, a man of great honour and worthinesse: in whose place succeeded William Warham, of whome before is made mention. And Henrie Deane bishop of Salisburie, was made archbishop of Cantuarburie, and Richard For was removed from Durham to the see of Winchester. Also this yeare two notable marriages were concluded, but not consummate till afterwards, as you shall heare in place conuenient. For king Henrie granted his daughter ladie Margaret to James the fourth king of Scots. And Ferdinando king of Spaine gaue his daughter ladie Katharine to Arthur prince of Wales, some and heire apparent to the king of England.

Among other articles of the marriage concluded with the Scottish king this was one, that no English men should be receiued into Scotland without letters commendatorie of their soueraigne lord, or safe conduct of his warden of the marches; and the same prohibition was in like maner giuen to the Scots. This yeare the ladie Katharine of Spaine was sent by hir father king Ferdinando with a puissant nauie of ships into England, where she arrived in the haue of Plimmouth the second daie of October then being saturday. Upon the twelue of Nouember she was conueied from Lambeth through London with all triumph and honour that might be deuised to the bishops palace, the streets being hanged, and pageants erected after the maner as is used at a coronation: which solemnitie Edward Hall describeth with the sumptuous thewes then glistering in the beholders eyes.

I passe ouer (saith he) the wise deuises, the proud speeches, the costlie works, the cunning portraiture, practised and set forth in seuen godlie beaunties, full pageants, created and set vp in diuerse places of the citie. I leaue also the godlie ballades, the sweet harmonie, the muscalle instruments, which sounded with heauenlie noise on euerie side of the streets. I omit further, the costlie apparell both of goldsmiths worke and imbroderie, the rich iewels, the masse chaines, the stirring hordes, the beautifull barbes and the glittering trappers, both with belles and spangels of gold. I pretermitt also the rich apparell of the princelie, the strange fashion of the Spanish nation, the beautie of the English ladies, the godlie demaure of the yong damoels, the amorous countenance of the lustie bachelers. I passe ouer also the fine ingrained clothes, the costlie furs of the citizens, hauing on scaffolds, raised from Gracechurch to Paules. Wher at should I speake of the odouriferous scarlets, the fine velvets, the pleasant furs, the masse chaines, which the maior of London with the senat, sitting on horsebacke at the little conduit in Cheape, ware on their bodies and about their neckes: I will not speake of the rich arras, the costlie tapestrie, the fine clothes both of gold and siluer, the curious beluets, the beautifult fatteries, nor the pleasant silkes which did hang in euerie street where she passed, the wine that ran continuallie out of the conduits, and the traueling of the streets needeth not to be remembred.]

Whilist this ladie sojourned for hir recreation in the bishops palace of London, being in the meane time visited of the king, the quene, and the kings mother, there was erected in the bodie of S. Paules church a long brydge made of timber, extending from the west doore of the church to the step at the entring into the quere, which was fir sot from the ground. On the said brydge of stage, such drectie before the confisorie of the church, was a place raised like a mount for eight persons to stand vpon, compassed round about with steps to ascend and descend, which was covered with fine red woofed, and in likewise were all the railles of the said stage. On the north side of this mount was a place decked and trimmed for the king and quene, and such other as they appointed to haue. On the south side of the same mount stood the maior and the magistrates of the citie.

When all things were prepared and set in order, vpon the fourtenth of Nouember then being Sundaye, the foresaid ladie was led to the said mount, and there prince Arthur openly espoused hir, both being clad in white, both lustie and amorous, he of the age of sixteen and more, and she of the age of eightene or thereabouts, the king and quene standing vntill on their stage. After the matrimonie celebrated, the prince and his wife went vp into the quere, and there heard a solemne masse song by the archbishop of Canturburie, associat with nineteene prelates mitred. And after the masse finished, the bryde was led homewards to the bishops palace by the duke of Yorke being then a goodlie yong prince, and the legat of Spaine. Next after followed the ladie Cicilie sister to the quene, suppoztng the traine of the spouse.

But to speake of all the solemne pompe, noble companie of lords and ladies, and what a sumptuous feast and plentifull was kept, with dancng and disgussng, words might sooner faile than matter words of rehearsall. Notwith euerie daie endeth and night inueth, and so when night was come, the prince and his beautiful bryde were brought and ioined together in one bed, where they laie as man and wife all that night. ¶ Now when the morning appeared, the prince, as his familiar scruiours, which had then neither cause nor reward to lie or faue, openly told the tale called for drinke, which he before times was not accustomed to do. At which thing one of his chamberleines maruelling, asked the cause of his drouth. To whom the prince answered merilie, saying: I haue this night bene in the middelt of Spaine, which is a hot region, and that iourne maketh me so drie: and if then haddest bene vnder that hot climat, thou wouldest haue bene drier than I.]

Shortlie after the king and the quene, with the new wedded spouses went from Batairds castell by water to Westmister, on whom the maior and communalte of London in barges gorgeously trimmed gaue their attendance. And there in the palace were such martiall seats, valiant iusts, vigozous turnes, and such fierce fight at the barriers, as before that time was of no man had in remembrance. Of this roiall triumph lord Edward duke of Buckingham was chiefe challenger, and lord Thomas Greie marquisse Dorset chiefe defender, which with their aids and companions bare themselves so valiantlie, that they got great praise and honour, both of the Spaniards, and of their owne countrymen. During the time of these iusts and triumphs, were receiued into London, an earle, a bishop, and diuerse noble personages sent from the king of Scots into England, for conclusion of the mariage betwene the ladie Margaret and him; which earle by prorie, in the name of king James his master, assied and contracted the said ladie. Which affiance was published at Paules crosse, the daie of the conuersion of saint Paule: in reioicing whereof Te Deum was song, and great fiers made through the citie of London.

These things being accomplished, the ambassadoys as well of Spaine as Scotland toke their leaue of the king, and not without great rewards returned into their countries. When the ambassadoys were departed, he sent his sonne prince Arthur againe into Wales, to keepe that countrie in good order; appointing to him wise and expert counsellors, as sir Richard Dole his kinsman, which was his chiefe chamberleine, also sir Henrie Wernon, sir Richard Cross, sir David Philip, sir William Udall, sir Thomas Englefield, sir Peter Newton knights; John Walleston, Henrie Marton, a doctor William Smith, president of his counsell, and doctor Charles; of the which two doctors, the one was after bishop of Lincoln, and the other bishop of Hereford.

This yeare John Shalu (who was maior of London) caused his brethren the aldermen to ride from the Guildhall vnto the water side, when he went to Westminster to be presented in the exchequer. He also caused the kitchens and other houses of office to be builded at the Guildhall, where since that time the maiors feasts haue bene kept, which before had bene in the grocers or tailors hall. About Easter, all the Greie friers in England changed their habit, for whereas of long time before they had vsed to weare bryowne russet of foure shillings, six shillings, and eight shillings the yarde; now they were compelled to weare russet of two shillings the yarde and not above, which was brought to passe by the friers of Grænewich. This yeare, the dike called Turnemill brake, with all the course of flet dike, were so scowred downe to the Thames, that boates with fish and felwell were rowed vp to Holborne brydge, as they of old time had bene accustomed: which was a great commoditie to all the inhabitants in that part of London. Also the tower nere to the Blacke friers was taken downe by the commandement of the maior. Also this yeare were brought vnto the king three men taken in the new found Islands, by Sebastian Gabato, before named in Anno 1468. These men were clothed in beasts skins, and eat raw flesh, but spake such a language as no man could vnderstand them, of the which three men, two of them were seene in the kings court at Westminster two yeares after, clothed like Englishmen, and could not be discerned from Englishmen.]

A few moneths before the mariage of prince Arthur, Edmund de la Pole earle of Suffolke, sonne to John duke of Suffolke, and ladie Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth, being bold and rash withall, was indicted of murther, for sleaing of a meane person in his rage and fure. And although the king pardoned him whome he might iustlie haue put to death for that offense; yet because he was brought to the barre before the kings Bench, and arraigned (which fact he toke as a great blemish to his honour) shortlie after vpon that displeasure he fled into Flanders vnto his aunt the ladie Margaret, the king not being ynnuie to his going ouer. Neuertheless, wher Margaret eldest daughter to king Henrie assied to James king of Scots.

Prince Arthur is sent into Wales,

The maiors feast first kept at Guildhall, Wollen cloth of two shillings the yarde. Dikes of London cleared.

Men brought from the new found Islands,

Edmund erls of Suffolke fled into Flanders.

ther he was perswaded by his friends thereunto, whom the king had willed to deale with him therein; or whether vpon trust of his innocencie: true it is that he returned againe, and excused himselfe to the king, so that he thought him to be guiltlesse of anie crime that might be objected against him.

But when the marriage betwixt the prince & the ladie Katharine of Spaine was kept at London, this erle either for that he had passed his compasse in excessive charges and sumptuousnesse at that great triumph and solemnitie, and by reason thereof was farre run into debt; either else through the procurement of his aunt the foresaid ladie Margaret; or pickt with some private enuie, which could not patientlie with open eyes behold king Henrie (being of the aduerser faction to his linage) so long to reigne in wealth and felicitie: in conclusion with his brother Richard fled againe into Flanders. This departure of the erle sore vexed the king, doubting of some new trouble to insue thereof.

The discontented mind of the erle of Suffolke.

The kings discontented mind of the erle of Suffolke.

But yet to vnderstand the full meaning of the said erle, the king vsed his old fetch: for immediately after the erle was fled, he appointed sir Robert Curson, whome he had advanced to the order of knight-hood, and made capitaine of Hammes castle, a valiant man and a circumspect, to dissemble himselfe one of that conspiracie; who went into Flanders, to espie what was done there by the ladie Margaret, and his nephew the erle of Suffolke. After that the said sir Robert Curson was thus gone into Flanders, the king to put him out of all suspicion with the said ladie Margaret and the erle, caused the said erle, and sir Robert Curson, and five persons more to be accused at Paules crosse, the first Sunday of Nouember, as enemies to him and his realme.

To be briefe, the king by his meanes, and other such diligent inquisition as he made, tried out such as he suspected, partly to be deuilers of mischefe against him, and partly to beare no sincere affection towards his person, so that he could readily name them: whereof a great part were within few daies apprehended and taken. And amongst them William lord Courtenie, some to the erle of Deuonshire, which married the ladie Katharine, daughter to king Edward the fourth; lord William de la Pole, brother to the foresaid erle of Suffolke, sir James Tirrell, & sir John Windam. Both the Williams were rather taken of suspicion, because they were so neere of kin to the conspirators, than for anie proued matter. But sir James Tirrell and John Windam, because they were traitors, and so attainted, the first daie of Daie after their apprehension, they were on the Towre hill beheaded.

Tirrell and Windam beheaded.

When the erle of Suffolke heard what fortune thus happened to his friends, as one in bitter despaire to haue anie good successe in his pretended enterprise, towards about all Germany and France, to purchase some aid and succour, if by anie means he might. But when he perceived no steadfast ground to catch anchor hold vpon, he submitted himselfe vnder the protection of Philip archduke of Austrich. But his brother Richard, being a politike man, so wisely ordered himselfe in this stormie tempest, that he was not intrapped either with net or snare. The king not yet out of all doubt of ciuill sedition, because a great number of well disposed persons partakers of this conspiracie, were fled into sundrie sanctuaries, decreed to haue all the gates of sanctuaries and places privileged shut and locked vp, so that none should issue out from thence to perturb and disquiet him.

And for that intent he wrote vnto pope Alexander, desiring him by his authoritie to adiudge all Englishmen, being fled to sanctuarie for the offense of treason as enemies to the christian faith, interdicting and prohibiting the refuge and priuilege of sanctuary to all such, as once had enioied the libertie and protection of the same, and after that fled out, and offenders returned againe. Which thing after that the pope had granted, turned to the great quietnesse of the king and his realme. For manie that had offended, for feare to fall into danger, returned to the due subiection of their prince; and other that were yet free from perill, durst not hazard themselves so boldlie as they durst haue done before, vpon hope of such starting holes.

When the king had thus settled things to his owne contentation and pleasure, there suddenly happened to him a lamentable chance. For that noble prince Arthur, the kings first begotten sonne, after he had bene married to the ladie Katharine his wife, the space of five moneths, departed out of this transitorie life, in his castle of Ludlow, and with great funeral obsequie was buried in the cathedral church of Worcester. His brother the duke of Yorke was deaied from the title of Prince by the space of a moneth, till to women it might appeare whether the ladie Katharine wife to the said prince Arthur was conceived with child or not. [It is reported that this ladie Katharine thought and feared such dolorous chance to come: for when she had embraced her father, and taken her leaue of her noble and prudent mother, and sailed towards England, she was continually so tossed and tumbled hither and thither with boisterous winds, that what for the rage of the water, and contrarietie of the winds, her ship was prohibited diuerse times to approach the shore and take land.]

In this eighteenth yeare, the twentieth fourth daie of Ianuarie, a quarter of an houre afore three of the clocke at after none of the same daie, the first stone of our ladie chapell within the monasterie of Westminster was laid, by the hands of John Skip abbat of the same monasterie, sir Reginald Bray knight of the garter, doctor Barnes maister of the colleges, doctor Wall chapleine to the kings maiestie, maister Hugh Oldham chapleine to the countesse of Darbie and Richmond the kings mother, sir Edward Stanhope knight, and diuerse others. Vpon the same stone was this scripture ingrauen: Illustrissimus Henricus septimus rex Anglia & Francia, & dominus Hibernia, posuit hanc petram in honore beatae virginis Mariae, 24. die Ianuarij, anno Domini 1502. Et anno dicti regis Henrici septimi, decimo octauo. The charges whereof amounted (as some report, vpon credible information as they saie) to fouretene thousand pounds.

Queene Elizabeth lieng within the Towre of London, was brought a bed of a faire daughter on Candlemasse daie, which was there christened and named Katharine; and the eleuenth of the same moneth the said queene there deceased, and was buried at Westminster, whose daughter also liued but a small season after her mother. King Henrie the seuenth being himselfe a brother of the tailors compaignie in London, as diuerse other his predecessors kings before him had bene (to wit Richard the third, Edward the fourth, Henrie the first, Henrie the fifth, Henrie the fourth, and Richard the second; also of dukes eleuen, earles eight and twentie, and lords eight and fortie) he now gaue to them the name and title of merchant tailors, as a name of worship to indure for ever. This yeare, about the later end of March, the prior of the Charterhouse of Shene was murdered in a cell of his owne house, by meanes of one Godwine, a monke of the same cloister, and his adherents artificers of London. place of Westminster created his onelie sonne Henrie prince of Wales, earle of Chester, &c: who afterward succeeded his father in possession of the regall crowne of this realme. Moreover, this yeare also, after the decesse of that noble queene, for hir vertue commonlie called good queene Elizabeth, departed out of this world also sic Reginald Bate knight of the garter, a verie father of his countrie, for his high wisdom and singular loue to iustice well woorthie to beare that title. If anie thing had bene done amisse contrarie to law and equitie, he would after an humble sort plainlie blame the king, and giue him good aduertisement, that he should not onelie reioyce in the same, but also be more circumspect in anie other the like case. Of the same vertue and faithfull plainnesse was John Foxton archbishop of Canturburie, which died (as is shewed aboue) two yeares before.

So these two persons were restrainers of the kings vnbisected libertie; whereas the common people ignorant altogether of the truth in such matters, and reported, that the counsell of those two woorthie personages corrupted the kings cleane and immaculate conscience, contrarie to his princelie disposition and naturall inclination; such is euer the error of the common people. About this time died Henrie the archbishop of Canturburie, whose raimie doctor William Warham bishop of London supplied. And to the see of London William Barnes was appointed, and after his death succeeded one Richard fitz James. This yeare also the lord Cassimire marquisse of Brandenburg, accompanied with an earle, a bishop, and a great number of gentlemen well apparelled, came in ambassage from the emperor Maximilian, and were triumphantlie receiued into London, and lodged at Croftes place.

Their message was for thre causes, one to comfort the king in his time of beauienesse for the losse of his wife. The second for the renewing of amitie, and the old league. The third (which was not apparant) was to moue the king to marie the emperours daughter, the lady Margaret, duchesse Dowager of Savoye. The two first took effect: for the king vpon Passen funday rode to Pauls in great triumph, the said marquisse riding on his left hand. And there the bishop made to the king an excellent consolatorie oration concerning the death of the queene. And there also the king openlie swore to keepe the new renewed league and amitie during their two liues. But the third request (whether the let was on the mans side, or on the womans) neuer foisted to anie conclusion.

The lady Margaret the kings daughter, affianced (as ya haue heard) to the king of Scots, was appointed to be conueied into Scotland, by the earle of Surrie: and the earle of Northumberland, as wariden of the marches, was commanded to deliuer hir at the confines of both the realmes. And so haue vpon, after hir coming to Berwik, she was conueied to Lamberton kitchie in Scotland, where the king of Scots, with the flower of all the nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, was readie to receiue hir: to whom the earle of Northumberland (according to his commission) deliuered hir. The said earle of Northumberland and that daie, what for the riches of his coat being goldsmithes worke, garnished with pearle and stone, and what for the gallant apparell of his henchmen, and haue trappers of his horse, beside foure hundred tall men well hoisted and apparelled in his colours, was esteemed both of the Scots and Englishmen more like a prince than a subiect.

From Lamberton, the foresaid lady was conueied to Edinburgh, and there the daie after, king James the fourth, in the presence of all his nobilitie, espoused hir, and feasted the English lords, and shewed iusts and other pastimes verie honourable, after the fashion of that countrie. And after all things were finished according to their commission, the earle of Surrie with all the English lords and ladies returned into their countrie. In this yeare the king kept his high court of parlement, in the which diuerse acts esteemed necessarie for the preservation of the common-wealth were established: and amongst other, it was enacted, that theues and murderers duellie conuicted by the law to die, and yet saued by their books, should be committed to the bishops custodie. After this, a subside was granted, both of the tempoialtie, and spiritaualtie, and so that parlement ended.

But the king now drawing into age, and willing to fill his chests with abundance of treasure, was not satisfied with this onelie subside, but deuised another meane how to enrich himselfe, as thus. He considered that the Englishmen little regarded the keeping of penall lawes, and pecuniall statutes, deuised for the good preservation of the common-wealth. Therefore he caused inquisition to be made of those that had transgressed anie of the same lawes, so that there were but few noble men, merchants, farmers, husbandmen, grafters, or occupiers, that could clerelie proue themselves faultlesse, but had offered in some one or other of the same lawes. At the first, they that were found guiltie were easilie fined. But after, there were appointed two maisters and suruisors of his forfeits, the one sir Richard Empson, and the other Edmund Dobleie.

These two were learned in the lawes of the realme, who meaning to satisfie their princes pleasure, and to see their commission executed to the vttermost, seemed little to respect the perill that might insue. Where vpon they being furnished with a sort of accusers, commonlie called promoters, or (as they themselves will be named) informers, troubled manie a man, whereby they wan them great hatred, and the king (by such rigorous proceedings) lost the loue and fauour which the people before time had borne towards him; so that he for setting them a worke, and they for executing of it in such extreame wise, ran vnto obloquie with the subiects of this realme.

On the thirtieth of Nouember was holden within the palace of the archbishop of Canturburie, at Lambeth, the sergeants feast, where dined the king and all his nobles. And vpon the same day, Thomas Oranger, newlie chosen shiriffe of London, was presented before the barons of the kings exchequer, there to take his oth, and after went with the maiors vnto the same feast, which saued him monie in his purse; for if that day that feast had not bene kept, he must haue feasted the maiors, aldermen, and others, woorthiefull of the citie. This feast was kept at the charge of ten learned men, newlie admitted to bee sergeants to the kings law, whose names were, Robert Widdell, William Crenill, Thomas Parow, George Edgore, John Hore, John Cutler, Thomas Eliot, Lewes Pollard, Gue Palmis, William Fairclaf. On the one and twentieth of Nouember at night, began a perillous fier at the signe of the painter vpon London bridge, nere to saint Magnus church; where six tenements were burned per the same could be quenched. On the seuenth of Ianuarie, were certeine houses consumed with fire against saint Butolphes church in Thames street. On the five and twentieth of Ianuarie began a parlement at Westminster, of the which was chosen speaker for the commons, maister Edmund Dobleie.

A new coine of siluer was ordeined of grotes and halfe grotes, which bare but halfe faces; and some peces of the value of twelue pence were then stamped, Stamped, though very few of that sort came abroad. In this yeare, alium, which manie yeares had bene sold for sir shillings an hundred, and lower, arose to five nobles an hundred, and after to foure marks, &c. Sir William Capell, who for this yeare was mayor, caused in euerie ward of London a cage with a paire of stocks, therein to punish vagabunds. Also he caused all Hunsditch to be ouerpaued, which manie yeares before lay full noisidie and perillousie for all travellers that way. About Christmas, the more part of the prisoners of the Barthallie in Southwarke brake out, and manie of them being shortlie after taken, were put to execution, speciallie those which had laine for felonie or treason. On the fiftenth of Aprill, a monie maker, one of the corners of the Tower, was drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged.

In this twentieth yeare (saith one of Crecster) the king (hauing some need of monie) was by his counsell advised (by way of beneuolence) to leule the same upon the whole realme, as well of the cleargie as of the laitie. And for the same, commissioners were assigned accordingly. For the cleargie, Richard Forster, sometime bishop of Crecster, but now of Windesster, a verie wise, graue, and trustie counsellor, was appointed chiefe commissioner, and had the chiefeest dealing therein. He at daies and times appointed, assembled the cleargie before him, and (according to the trust committed vnto him) he perswaded them by all the meanes he could, to be liberrall contributours to the king, considering his present need, and who (for their causes, & the safetie of all the common-wealth) was now to vse and imploie some monie.

The cleargie was of two sortis, the one shewing themselves as they were wealthie, kemele, & comelie; the other pretending that which was not, pouertie, barenesse, and scaritic: but both were of one mind, and denied all the waies they could to saue their purses. The first being called, alledged that they were daile at great charges and expences in keeping of hospitalitie, in maintaining themselves, their house and familie; besides extraordinaries which daile did grow and increase vpon them: and by that meanes they were but bare and poore, and prayed that they might be bozne withall, and pardoned for that time.

The other sort alledged, that their liuings were but small and slender, and scarce able to mainteine themselves withall, which compelled them to go bare, and to liue a hard and a poore life, and therefore (they hauing nothing) prayed that they might be excused. The bishop when he had heard them at full, and well considered thereof, verie wittlie, and with a pretie dilemma answered them both, saing to the first: It is true, you are at great charges, and are well beset in your apparell, well mounted vpon your faire palfreies, and haue your men waiting vpon you in good order; your hospitalitie is good, and your daillie expences are large, and you are for the same well repoyted amongst your neighbours; all which are plaine demonstrations of your wealth and abilitie, otherwise you would not be at such voluntarie charges. Then hauing stode to spend in such order, there is no reason, but that to your prince you should much more be well willing & readie to yeld your selues contri- butorie and dutifull, and therefore you must paie. To the other sort he said: Albeit your liuings be not of the best, yet good, sufficient, and able to mainteine you in better estate than you doe imploie it: but it appeareth that you are frugall and thristie men; and what others doe voluntarilie spend in apparell, house, and familie, you warilie doe keepe, and haue it to lie by you; and therefore it is good reason that of your store you should spare with a good will and contribute to your prince; wherefore be contented, for you shall paie. And so by this pretie dilemma he reduced them to yeld a good payment to the king.

The king after he had gotten a great masse of monie together, hauing pitie on the people, which oppressed with the sharpe proceedings of his graue officers, cried daily to God for vengeance, ment to haue depriued them of their offices (as some write) & that such monie as had bene violentlie craded, should haue bene restored and deliuered againe, if he had not bene prevented by death. And yet by his last will he commanded that it should be dilie and trulie perfoymed, but in the meane season many mens coffers were emptied. [¶ Thomas Knefworth mayor of London for this yeare, of his owine goods, builded the conduit at Bishops gate. He gaue to the fishmongers certeine tenements, for the which they be bound to find foure scholers that studie art; two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, euerie of them foure pounds the yeare. They be bound also to giue to twelue aged poore people of their companie, to euerie one of them at Bartholomew tide a winter garment for euere. Also to giue to the prisoners of Ludgate and Fleetgate euerie yeare fortie shillings, &c. The fift of Ianuarie in the night, the kings chamber was fired at Richmond, the which might not be quenched, till manie curtains, carpets, rich beds, and much other stufte was consumed.

In this verie season, and the yeare of our Lord 1506, Elizabeth queene of Castile died without issue male, by reason whereof the inheritance of Castile (because that kingdome is not partible) descended to ladie Jane hir eldest daughter by king Ferdinando, the which was married to Philip archduke of Austrie. Wherefore the yeare following, about the first day of Ianuarie, hauing a great nauiie prepared, he intitled now king of Castile, sailed out of Flanders with his wife towards Spaine; but by a mightie tempest of wind and foule weather, the whole nauiie was dispersed and sparkled abroad in diuerse places on the coasts of England. The kings ship with two other vessels were blowne by tempest on the west part of the realme, to the port of Wexmouth in Dorsetshire. The king being wearied with the tossing of the seas, as one not accustomed thereto, contrarie to the mind of his counsellors, came on land to refresh himselfe.

When it was knowne that strange ships were arrived in that place, there came thither a great number, as well of gentlemen as commons of the countrie, to beat them backe if they proued to be enimies. But when they perceiued that the king of Spaine was there diuinen on land by force of weather, sir Thomas Trenchard knight, chiefe of that companie, went with great humblenesse vnto him, and did what he could to haue him to his house, being not farre off, and so to cause him to stay, till such time as king Henrie might be certified of his arriual; to whome with all speed he sent diuerse posts to aduertise him of king Philips landing. In this meane while came people in from all sides, vpon knowlege of this strange princes comming. And among other there came sir John Carew, with a goodlie band of piket men. Which sir John and sir Thomas Trenchard intreated the king of Castile not to depart, vntill such time as he had spoken with the king.

The king of Castile excused him by necessitie of his weightie enterpryse: but when he perceiued that if he would proffer to go once abroad to his ships againe, he might be letted, and was like so to be; he thought good rather to assent to their humble request and so seeme to gratifie them; than by denieng it to procure their enill willes, and yet neuer the nearer of his purpose. When king Henrie was informed of his landing, he was right glad therof, and wrote vnto to Sir John Carew, and to Sir Thomas Trenchard, that they should intertaine him in the most honorable sort they could devise, till he might come himselfe in person to welcome him. Beside this, he sent the earle of Arundell with manie lords and knights to attend upon him. Which earle (according to the kings letters) received him with three hundred horses, all by torchlight, to the great admiration of the strangers.

King Philip seeing no remedie but that he must needs tarry, would no longer gaze after king Henric comming, but took his iourneie toward Windso:re castell, where the king late: and five miles from Windso:re the prince of Wales, accompanied with five earles, and diuerse lords and knights, and other to the number of five hundred persons gorgeously apparelled, received him after the most honorable fashion. And within halfe a mile of Windso:re, the king, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and a great part of the nobilitie of this realme, welcomed him, & so conueied him to the castell of Windso:re, where he was made companion of the noble order of the garter. After him came to Windso:re his wife queene Jane, sister to the princeesse Dowager, late wife to prince Arthur.

After the two kings had renewed & confirmed the league and amitie betwixt them, king Henric desired to haue Edmund de la Pole earle of Suffolke to be deliuered into his hands. To whom the king of Castile answered, that he verelie was not within his dominion: and therefore it laie not in him to deliuer him. In deed he was loth to be the author of his death that came to him for succour, and was received vnder his protection: yet upon the earnest request and assured promise of king Henric that he would pardon him of all erecutions and paines of death he granted to king Henric his desire: and so incontinentlie caused the said earle secretlie to be sent for. After this, to protract time till he were possessed of his prey, king Henric conueied the king of Castile vnto the cite of London, that he might see the head cite of his realme.

Then he led him from Wainbords castell by Cheape to Warking; and so returned by Watling street againe: during which time there was shot out of the Towre a wonderfull peale of ordinance. But he would not enter into the Towre, because as ye haue heard before: he had aduowed not to enter the fortress of anye foreign prince, in the which a garrison was maintained. From London the king brought him to Richmond, where manie notable feates of armes were p:formed both of tilt, turne, and barriers. In the meane season the erle of Suffolke, perceiving what hope was to be had in foreign princes, and trusting that after his life to him once granted, king Henric would graunte set him at his full libertie, was in manner contented to returne againe into his native countrie.

When all pacts and covenants betwixt the kings of England and Castile were appointed, concluded, and agreed, king Philip took his leave of king Henric, promising to him most hearty thanks for his high charge and honorable entertainment. And being accompanied with diuerse lords of England, he came to the cite of Oxford, and so to Salisbury in Cornwell, and there taking ship sailed into Spain, where he arrived after he had being thirtie yeares of age. The king of Castile, concerning, of countenance amiable of bodye some what grosse, quickie witted, bold and brave hearted. The tempest that he suffered on the sea was huge, and somewhat also upon the land, inasmuch that at the violence of the wind blew downe an eagle of brass, being set to shew out which part the wind blew, from a pinnacle or spire of Pauls church, and in the falling, the same eagle brake and battered an other eagle that was set up for a signe at a towerne doore in Cheape side.

Whereupon men that were giuen to gesse things that should happen by marking of strange tokens, deemed that the emperour Maximilian, which gaue the eagle, should suffer some great misfortune: as he did shortly after by the losse of his sonne, the said king Philip. And verelie these prodigious accidents are not to be omitted as matter of course; for they haue their weight, and shew their truth in the issue. Examples in this booke be diuerse, among which one is verie memorabile, mentioned in the thirtie ninth yeare of Henric the first. At what time the duke of Po:ke making an oration to the lords of the parliament, for the iustifying of his title to the crowne, it chanced that a crowne which hong in the middle of the nether house (to garnish a branch to set lights vpon) without touch of man or blast of wind suddenly fell downe. About which season also fell downe the crowne which stood on the top of Dover castell. Which things were construed to be signes that the crowne of the realme should some waie haue a fall; and so it came to passe.

And because the events of these foreshewes had their truth, as manie more of the like nature; it shall not be amisse here to ad: by waie of digression; what hath bene obserued in former ages by foren writers in and about such foretokens. The content of the heauen and of men, pronounced to Italie their calamities to come: for that such as made profession to haue iudgement either by science or diuine inspiration in the things to come, assured with one voice that there were in preparing, both more great mutations and more strange and horrible accidents, than for manie worldes before had bene discerned in anye part or circuit of the earth. There were scene in the night in Pouille three suns in the undrest of the firmament, but manie clouds about them, with right fearefull thunders and lightnings. In the territories of Aretze, were visible scene passing in the aue, infinite numbers of armed men vpon mightie horses, with a terrible noise of drums and trumpets. The images & figures of saints did sweat in manie parts of Italie.

In euerie place of the countrie were brought forth manie monsters of men and other creatures, with manie other things against the order of nature concurring all at one time, but in diuerse places: by means wherof the people were caried into incredible feares, being already amazed with the brute of the French powres & furie of that nation, with which according to the testimonie of histories they had sometime run ouer all Italie, sacked and made desolate with fire and sword the cite of Rome, and subdued in Asia manie provinces; and generally no part of the world which had not felt the vertue of their armes. But albeit these iudgements are oftentimes fallible, and rather conuictures vncertaine, than effects happening: yet the accidents that vnto on, brought to them, in the spirits of fraile men, an abhorrent faith, credit, & religion. So that there is in force the most matter of moment to be obserued, howe soeuer the world lieth asleep in the lap of security, is touched with no feare of change. But alas the Heathen could see the contrarie, and therefore said:

Quem mortis metum non habet, nulla Vixit superbi, sed vixit in vana gloria Exultat in vana, facit vana, facit vana.

But to returne to our former story. Shortly after the departing of king Philip, the king of England began to suspect Sir George Burrell lord of Abingdon, and Sir Thomas Greene of Oweres parson, as partakers in the beginning of the conspiracy with the earle of Suffolke; and so upon that suspicion they were commanded to the Towler. But shortly after, when they had bene tried and surged of that suspicion, he commanded them both to be set at libertie. But sir Thomas Grene fell sicke before, and remained in the Towler, in hope to be restored to his health as well as to his libertie but by death he was prevented. [And here because it is good to see the content of histories in the report of accidents, it shall not be amisse to repeat the entier relation of a late writer stranger touching this casuallie which befell to king Philip, in such sort to be cast vpon the English coast; as also the promise of the said king to deliver the duke of Suffolke into the hands of king Henrie, with the cause (as it is supposed) why the king desired to haue him within his owne reach.

to Spaine.

King Philip was imbarked to saile out of Flanders into Spaine with a great armie by sea; and to reduce his going to a more facilitie and safetie (for he feared least his father in law by the aid of the French would hinder his passage) he practised the Spanishe subtilties, and agreed with him to leaue vnto him the managing and policie of the most part of affaires, and that they shuld take in common the title of king of Spaine, according to the example in the quenes time: and lastlie, that the reuenues and tributes shoud be diuided in an order certeine & indifferent. By reason of which accord, his father in law, notwithstanding he was not assured of the obseruation, sent him into Flanders manie ships to furnish his voyage: with the which, hauing imbarked his wife, and Ferdinand his second sonne, he took his course into Spaine with forward winds, which, within two daies turning cleane contrarie, after his nauie had runne a dangerous fortune, and made a wearie resistance against the furie of the sea, his ships were cast vpon sundrie coasts of England and Britaine; his owne person with two or three ships being diuen with manifest perill vpon England into the haven of South Hampton.

Whereof Henrie the seventh then king of that nation being aduertised, sent to him with speed manie barons to do him honour, and desire him to come to his court, then at London: a request which Philip could not denie, the king of Englands demand being no lesse honourable, than his owne estate full of necessitie and nakednesse. Anno Reg. 22.

This yeare the king began to be diseased of a certeine infirmittie, which thise euerie yeare, but specially in the springtime sore bered him. And because for the most part the harme that chanceth to the prince, is parted with his subiects, the sweating sicknesse, which (as ye haue heard) in the first yeare of the king first afflicted the people of this realme, now assailed them againe; howbeit by the remedie found at the beginning of it, nothing the like number died thereof now this second time, as did at the first time till the said remedie was inuented. equall to the pestilence insued, by the working of the maisters of the forfeitures, and such informers as were appointed thereto. By whose meanes manie a rich & wealthe person by the errormie of the lawes of the realme were condemned and brought to great losse and humberance.

A great part of which their bndomings proceeded by the inconuenience of such vnfashionable officers, as by the abuse of erigents outlawed those that neuer heard, no; had knowledge of the lates commented against them, of which hard and sharpe dealing (the harme that thereof insucth considered) if the occasion might be taken awaie by some other more reasonable forme and order of law deuised, whereby the parties might haue personal warning, it would both preserve manie an innocent man from vnder-
serued beration, and danger of vnmerefull losse of goods; and also rebound highlie to the commendation of the prince, and such other as chanced to be reformers of that colourable law, where they be called onelie in the counties without other knowledge gi-20
uen to them or theirs at their dwelling houses.

But now to returne. Such maner of outlawries, old recognisances of the peace, and god abearings, escapes, riots, & innumerable statutes penall, were put in execution, and called vpon by Cempson and Dobleie; so that euerie man, both the spirituallie and tempozallie, hauing either lands or substance, were inuited to that plucking banquet. For these two rane-30
ning wolues had a gard of false perjured persons appertaining to them, which were impanelled in euerie quest. Learned men in the law, when they were required of their aduise, would say; So agree is the best counsell that I can giue you. By this vnder-40 meanes, these couetous persons filled the kings coffers, and enriched themselves. And at this vncertainable and extort doing, noble men grudged, meane men kicked, poore men lamented, preachers openlie at Bowles crosse and other places exclaimed, rebuked, and detested. Howbeit the good king in his last daies conserued and pardoned his poore subiects of such vnc-50 charitable pokes and ponderous burdens as they were laden withall.

Sir Gilbert Talbot knight, and Richard Bere abbat of Classeburie, and doctor Robert Sherborne deane of Poules, were sent as ambassadoys from the k. to Rome, to declare to Pius the thirde of that name newlie elected pope in place of Alexander the first deceased, what joy and gladnesse had altered the kings heart for his preferment. But he taried not the con-60 uincing of those ambassadoys, for within a moneth after that he was installed, he rendered his debt to nature, and so had short pleasure of his promotion (not beguiling the hopes which the cardinals conceived of him at the time of his creation, the six & twentieth day after his election, which was in short time to die. This popes name was Francis Piccolomini cardinal of 70
Sienna, in whom was no expectation of long life, both for his extreame age, and present sicknesse: a cardinall sure of vnspotted report, and for his other conditions not vnworthy that degree; who to reuelo the memorie of Pius secundus his uncle, took vpon him the name of Pius the thirde.

He succeeded Alexander the first, who went to supper in a vineyard nere the Vatican to reioice in the delight & pleasure of the fresh aire, & was suddenlie caried for dead to the bishops palace; his sonne also communicating in the same accident, but with better fortune. For the day folowing, which was the rightenth day of August, the dead corps of the pope (according to custome) was borne into the church of saint Peter, blacke, swolne, and most deforme; most manifest signes of poison. But Valentines, at by the vigour and strength of his youth, and readie helpe of strong medicines and counterpoisons, had his life saved, remaining notwithstanding oppressed with long and grievous sicknesse: it was assuredly believed that the accident proceeded of poison, the discourse whereof (according to common report) was in this sort.

The duke Valentinois, who was to be present at that supper, had determined to poison Adrian cardinal of Cornette, reserving that time and place to execute his bloudie resolution: for it is most certaine that in his father and him were naturall customes to use poison, not onelie to be revenged of their enemies, or to be altered of suspicions; but also upon a wicked courtinesse, to despoile rich men of their goods, whether they were cardinals or courtiers, although they had never done them wrong, as hapned to the cardinal saint Ange, who was verie rich. This manner of rage they would use also against their greatest friends & familiars, and such as had bin their most faithfull servants, such as were the cardinals of Capua and Spomeno: a recompense unworthie the merits of good men, and not disagreeable to the disposition of such a father and sonne, whereof the one made all things lawfull by vile dispensation; and with the other nothing was dishonest therein was opportunitie to his purposes. The duke Valentinois sat before certaine flagons with wine infected with poison, which he gave to a servant that knew nothing of the matter, commanding that no person should touch them.

A common meaneent preiudiciall to his maister, as the ignorance of the servant was the instrument in the evil that hapned both to the father and son. Such is the assistance of God, who in the execution of his judgements raiseth one murderer to kill another, & breaketh the bands of the fire upon the head of him that first kindled it: for the pope comming by adventure somewhat before supper, and overcome with the brought and immoderate heat of the time, called for drinke. And because his clone provision was not yet brought from the palace, he that had the infected wine in charge, thinking it to be recommended to his keeping for a wine most excellent, gave the pope to drinke of the same wine which Valentinois had sent, who arriving while his father was drinking drinke also of the same wine, being but tust that they both should tast of the same cup which they had brued for the destruction of others. All the towne of Rome ran with great gliaoness to saint Peters about the dead bodie of the pope, their eyes not satisfied to see and destroyed a serpent, who with his immoderate ambition and poisoned infidelitie, together with all the horrible examples of crueltie, luxurie, and monstrous concutinesse, selling without distinction both holie things and prophane things, had infected the whole world.

And yet was he accompanied with a most rare, & almost perpetuall prosperitie euen from his yong age, to the end of his life; desiring alwaies great things, and obtaining most often that he desired. An example of much importance, to confound the arrogancie of those men, who presuming to know and see perfectly with humane eyes the depth of Gods judgements & assurance, that what happeneth either good or ill to mortall men, proceedeth either of their merits or faults: as though we saw not daillie manie good men withoutlie tormented, & wicked persons above their desertings live in ease and honour: wherein who makes an other interpretation, derogates the iustice and power of God, the greatnesse of which being not to be contented within any scripts or tearmes preter. knoweth how well and largely to discern in an other time and place the iust from the uniuist, and that with rewards and eternall punishments. In the meane time he potozeth out his vengeance upon the imaginers of mischance in this life, so providing, as that they are caught in their owne snares, and overtaken with such destruction as they had prepared for others, according to that saien of the Psalmist:

*Effudit puteum, foudaque eduxit ab imo, Et miser in latebras incidit ipse suas.
In verticem ipsius recurrit Pernicies, reciduntque fraudes.*

*Eub. Hist. & G.
Buch in Psal. 7.*

10 At the same time died Giles lord Daubencie the kings chiefe chamberleine, whose office Charles, barard sonne to Henrie last duke of Summerset occupied and enioied; a man of good wit, and great experience. Some after, the king caused Gudebald duke of Urbine to be elected knight of the order of the garter, in like maner as his father duke Frederike had bene before him, which was chosen and admitted into the order by king Edward the fourth. Sir Gilbert Talbot, and the other two ambassadors being appointed to keepe on their iourne unto pope Julius the second, elected after the death of the said Pius the third, bare the habit and collar also unto the said duke Gudebald; which after he had received the same, sent sir Balthasar Castilio, knight, a Spaniard borne, as his orator unto king Henrie, which was for him installed, according to the ordinances of the order.

The lord Daubencie died.

Anno Reg. 23. Gudebald duke of Urbin in Italie made knight of the garter.

30 This yeare that worthy prelate Thomas Savage archbishop of Porke departed this life at his castell of Catwood: a man beside the worthinesse of his birth highlie esteemed with his prince for his fast fidelitie and great wisdome. He bestowed great cost in repairing the castell of Catwood and the manor of Scrobie. His bodie was buried at Porke, but he appointed by his testament, that his hart should be buried at Sparclefield in Weshire, where he was bozne, in a chapell there of his foundation, joining to the south side of the church, meaning to haue founded a college there also, if his purpose had not bene prevented by death. After him succeeded doctor Wenzbridge in the archbishops see of Porke, being the fiftie and first archbishop that had sat in that see.

Thomas Savage archbishop of Can- turburie deceased.

50 About this same time Leues the French king, the twelfe of that name (who succeeded Charles the eighth that died at Amboise the night before the eighth daie of Aprill, of a catarrhe, which the physicians call an apoplexie, the same rising in him with such abundance, as he beheld a match played at tennisse, that in few hontes he ended at the same place his life: during the which, he had with greater importunitie than vertue troubled the whole world with great apparance of danger to kindle flames new fires of inuouation and troubles) married his eldest daughter named Clare, unto Francis de Chalots Dolphin of Viennne, and duke of Angolessine, which ladie was promised unto Charles the king of Castile: whereupon by ambassadors sent to and fro betwixt king Henrie and the said king of Castile, a marriage was concluded betwixt the said king of Castile, and the ladie Marie, daughter to king Henrie, being about the age of ten yeares. For conclusion of which marriage, the lord of Baroio, & other ambassadors were sent into England from the emperor Maximilian which with great rewards returned.

William Wolone mercer maior of London this yeare deceased, and forthwith sir Laurence Ailmer draper was chosen and sworn, and went home in a grate cloake, with the sword borne before him, on the eight and twentieth daie of March. Item he took his oath at the Tower, and kept no feast. William Capell was put in suite by the king for things by him done in his maioraltie. Also Thomas Kneifworth that had bene maior of London, and his shrifles, were sent to the kings Bench, till they were put to their their fines of soaretene hundred pounds. In the mo-neth of June, the cite of Howich was sore perished, & nere consumed with fier, that began in a frenche mans house named Peter Johnson, a surgian, in the parish of saint George.

Stephen Ceninges merchant tailor, maior of London, founded a free grammar schole at Wol-frunchampton in Stafforshyre, with conuenient lodgings for the maister and vther, in the same place where he was borne. He gaue lands sufficient for the maintenance, leauing the ouersight thereof to the merchant tailors in London, who haue hitherto lustlie dealt in that matter, and also augmented the building there. Maister Nichols, who married the onellie daughter and heire of the aforesaid Stephen Ceninges, gaue lands to mainteine the pauements of that towne. Also, John Lenson esquier, about Anno 1556, gaue lands, whereof foure pounds should be dealt euerie yeare, on good fridaie, to the poze people of Wolfrunchampton, and six and twentie shillings eight pence pcecelie, towards the reparation of the church there.

Moreover, about Anno 1566, sir John Ligh a preest, which had serued in that church there, the space of threescore years, for five pounds, six shillings eight pence the yeare, without anie other augmentation of his living, who would neuer take anie benefice, or other preferment, gaue twentie pounds, to purchase twentie shillings the yeare lands, the same to be gi-uen pcecelie for euer to the poze of Wolfrunchampton upon good fridaie, & twelue pounds thirtene shillings foure pence, to purchase a marke a yeare lands, the same to be giuen to the poze of Chiffall, in the countie of Salop, where the said Ligh was borne.
This man liued nigh one hundred years. He bestowed besides his owne labour which was great (in bearing of stones, &c.) aboue twentie pounds on the high waies about that towne of Wolfrunchampton.

This towne of Wolfrunchampton, is now corruptly called Wolnerhampton: for in Anno 996, in king Ethelreds time (who wrote himselfe Rex Ang-lorum & princeps Northumbriorum Olympiade tertia regni sui, for so he wrote the count of his reigne then, which was the sixteenth yeare) it was then called Hampton, as appeareth by an old charter written by the notarie of the said king Ethelred, which charter I haue sene and read. And for that a noble woman named Wulftrune a widow, sometime wife to Althelme duke of Northampton, did obtaine of the said king to giue lands vnto the church there which she had founded, the said towne take the addition of the same Wulftrune, for that charter so nameth hir Wulftrune, and the towne Hampton.

In this yeare was finished the goodlie hospitall of the Sauoie nere vnto Charing crosse, which was a notable foundation for the poze, done by king Henrie the seauenth, vnto the which he purchased and gaue lands for the relieuing of one hundred poze people. This was first named Sauoie place, by Peter earle of Sauoie, father to Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, about the nine and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the thirde, who made the said Peter erle of Richmond. This house belonged since to the duke of Lancaster, and at this time was conuerted to an hospitall, still retaining the first name of Sauoie.
King Henrie also builded thre houses of Francis-cane friers, which are called obseruants, at Richmond, Grenewich, and Newmarke; and thre other of the familie of Franciscane friers which are called conuentuals, at Canturburie, Newcastell, and Southampton.]

¶ This yeare was Thomas Russell made bishop of Durham by Henrie the seauenth, touching whose place of birth (being at Cirencester now Cicerter) and himselfe, I will not refuse to set downe what Leland (about the yeare 1542) hath written, not being unfit here to be recorded. Cirencester (saith he) in Latine called Corinium standeth on the river Churne.

There haue bene thre parish churches, whereof saint Cleilles church is cleane doone, being of late but a chapell. Saint Laurence yet standeth, but it is no parish church. There be two poze almes women endued with land. There is now but one parish church in all Cirencester that is verie faire, the bodie of which church is all new worke, to the which Kathall bishop of Durham (borne and brought vp in Cirencester) promised much, but (preuented by death) gaue nothing. One Anne Aneling aunt to doctor Rithall by the mothers side, gaue one hundred markes to the building of that church. King Henrie the first made the hospitall of saint Johns at Cirencester. Thus saith Leland.

This man thus borne at Cirencester in Glocestershire, and made bishop of Durham, was after the death of king Henrie the seauenth, one of the pri-uie counsell to king Henrie the eighth, in whose court he was so continuallie attendant, that he could not steale anie time to attend the affaires of his bishop-ricke. But yet not altogether carelesse (though not so much as he ought to haue bene) of the place and cause from whence and for which he receiued so great reuenues, as came vnto his hands from that se. He repaired the third part of Aine bridge next vnto the south, which he might well doe, for he was accepted the richest subject through the realme. To whom remainings then at the court) the king gaue in charge to write a booke of the whole estate of the kingdome, because he was knowne to the king to be a man of sufficiencie for the discharge thereof, which he did accordinglie.

Afterwards, the king commanded cardinall Wolseie to go to this bishop, and to bring the booke awaie with him to deliuer to his maiestie. But see the mishap! that a man in all other things so proud-dent, should now be so negligent: and at that time most forget himselfe, when (as if after fell out) he had most need to haue remembered himselfe. For this bishop hauing written two bookes (the one to answer the kings command, and the other intreating of his owne priuate affaires) did bind them both after one sort in vellame, iust of one length, breadth, and thick-nesse, and in all points in such like proportion answering one an other, as the one could not by anie ex-speciall note be discerned from the other: both which he also laid by together in one place of his studie.

Now when the cardinall came to demand the booke due to the king: the bishop vnadvisedlie commanded his seruant to bring him the booke bound in white vellame lieng in his studie in such a place. The seruant doing accordinglie, brought forth one of those bookes so bound, being the booke intreating of the state of the bishop, and deliuered the same vnto his maister, who receiuing it (without further consideration or looking on) gaue it to the cardinall to beare vnto the king. The cardinall hauing the booke, went from the bishop, and after (in his studie by himselfe) vnderstanding the contents thereof, he greatlie reioised, hauing now occasion (which he long sought for) offered vnto him to bring the bishop into the kings disgrace.

Wherefore he went forthwith to the king, deliue-red the booke into his hands, and hailelie informed the king of the contents thereof, putting further into the kings head, that if at anie time he were destitute of a masse of monie, he should not need to seke further therefore than to the cofers of the bishop, who by the tenor of his owne booke had accomplished his proper riches and substance to the value of a hundred thow

thousand pounds. Of all which when the bishop had intelligence (what he had done, how the cardinall vsed him, what the king said, and what the world reported of him) he was stricken with such græfe of the same, that he thortlie through extream sorrow ended his life at London, in the yeare of Christ 1523. After whose death the cardinall, which had long before gaped after the said bishoppe, in singular hope to attaine thereunto, had now his wish in effect: which he the more easilie compassed, for that he had his nets alwaies readie cast, as assuring himselfe to take a trout: following therein a prophane mans cautelous counsell, and putting the same in practise; who saith:

Cassus ubi j. vult, semper tibi pendet hamus, Quo minime credis gurgite piscis erit.

The sicknesse which held the king daile more and more increasing, he well perceived that his end drew nere, and therefore meaning to doe some high pleasure to his people, granted of his free motion a generall pardon to all men, for all offences done & committed against anie his lawes or statutes; theues, murderers, & certeine other were excepted. He paied also the fees of all prisoners in the gaoles in and about London, abiding there onelie for that dutie.
He paid also the debts of all such persons as laie in the countres of Ludegate for fourtie shillings, & banders; and some he releued that were condemned in ten pounds. Verbpow were processions generallie vs-ed euerie daie in euerie citie and parish, to praise to almightie God for his restoring to health and long continuance of the same. Nevertheless, he was so afflicted with his long maladie, that nature could no longer susteine his life, and so he departed out of this world the two and twentieth of Aprill, in his palace of Bridgman, in the yere of our Lord 1509. His corpe was carried with all funerall pompe to Westminster, and there buried by the good quene his wife in a deuoutous chapell, which he not long before had caused to be builded.

He reigned thre and twentie yeares, and more than seven moneths, and liued two and fiftie yeares.
He had by his quene Elizabeth foure sonnes, and four daughters, of the which thre remained alieue behind him. Henrie his second son prince of Wales, which after him was king, Margaret quene of Scots, and the ladie Marie promised to Charles king of Castile. He was a man of bodie but leane and spare, albeit mightie and strong therewith, of personage and stature somewhat higher than the meane sort of men, of a wonderfull beautie and faire complexion, of countenance merie and smiling, especial-lie in his communication, his eyes graie, his teeth single, and haire thin, of wit in all things quicke and prompt, of a princelie stomack and haucie courage. In great perils, doubtfull affaires, and matters of importance, supernaturall and in manner diuine; for he ordered all his doings aduisebly and with great deliberation.

Besides this, he was sober, moderate, honest, courteous, bounteous, and so much abhorring pride and arrogancie, that he was euer sharpe and quicke to them that were noted with that fault. He was also an indifferent and byright iusticer, by the which one thing he allured to him the hearts of manie people, and yet to this seueritie of his he ioined a certeine mercifull pitie, which he did extend to those that had offended the penall lawes, and were put to their finis by his iustices. He did vse his rigour onelie (as he said himselfe) to dant, bying low, and abate the high minds and stout stomachs of the wealthie and bold people, nourished by in seditious factions and small rebellions, rather than for the greedie desire of monie; although such as were scourged with amercements cried out, and said it was rather for the respect of gaine, than for anie politike prouision. Indeed he left his coffers well stuffed, for he was no waistfull consumer of his riches by anie inordinat meanes.

To conclude, he had asmuch in him of gifts both of bodie, mind and fortune, as was possible for anie potentate or king to haue. His politike wisdom in gouernance was singular, his wit alwaie quicke and readie, his reason pitie and substantiall, his memorie fresh and holding, his experience notable, his counsels fortunate and taken by wise deliberation, his speech gracious in diuerse languages, his person (as before ye haue heard) right comelie, his naturall complexion of the purest mixture, leagues and confederations he had with all christian princes. His mightie power was dread euerie where, not onelie within his realme but without. Also his people were to him in as humble subiection as euer they were to king; his land manie a daie in peace and tranquillitie, his prosperitie in battell against his enemies was marvellous, his dealing in time of perils and dangers was cold and sober, with great hardinesse.
If anie treason were conspired against him, it came out wonderfullie. His buildings most goodlie, and after the newest cast, all of pleasure.

And so this king liuing all his time in fortunes faueur, in high honour, wealth and glozie, for his noble acts and prudent policies is worthie to be regi-stred in the booke of fame, least time (the consumer of all worthie things) should blot out the memorie of his name here in earth, whose soule we trust liueth in heauen, enioyng the fruition of the godhead, & those pleasures prepared for the faithfull. [In memorie of whome, his manifold vertues, with the fortunat successe of his affaires, and the gracious descent of his loines, as they procured a famous report in nations farre and nere; so haue some at the contemplation of his princelinesse, and euerie waie crowned with felicitie, made memorials of his magnificence; to the immortalitie of his high praise and unblemishable renowme: among whome (for the truth of the report iustifiable by the contents of this historie) one commeth to mind, which may well serue for an epitaph:]

a doctor of diuinitie professed in Orford, studious of propheties, as by the title of the works which he wrote it may appeare; John Persuall a Chartreux monke; Thomas Spaillozie a Welchman borne, he wrote (I wrote not what) of king Arthur, and of the round table; John Kouffe borne in Warwicksheire, a diligent searcher of antiquities, wherupon few libraries were any where to be scene in England and Wales, where he made not search for the same, and wrote sundrie treatises of historிக்கall arguments. He deceased at Warwike the fourteenth of Januarie in the yeare 1491, and was buried in our ladie church there.

Thomas Scrope, otherwise surnamed Bzableie, descended of the noble familie of the Scropps, professed sundrie kinds of religions, as that of the order of saint Benet, and saint Dominike, and likewise he became a Carmelite, and last of all he fell to and preached the gospel in haire and sackcloth, till he understood himselfe to be in the displeasure of Mal-den and other, that could not alwaie with such singularity in him or other, founding (as they toke it) to the danger of bringing the doctrine of the Romish church in misliking with the people; for then he withdrew himselfe to his house againe, and there remained twentie yeares, leading an anchors life, but yet after that time he came abroad, and was advanced to be a bishop in Ireland, and went to the Roades in ambassage, from whence being returned, he went barefooted by and downe in Dorsetholke, teaching in townes and in the countrie abroad the ten commandments, he liued till he came to be at the point of an hundred yeares old, & departed this life the fiftieth day of Januarie in the yeare of our Lord 1491, and was buried at Lestholke in Suffolke.

John Donneis a diuine and an Augustine frier in Dorwich, wrote certeine rules of grammar, and other things printed by Richard Winson; Gesserie surnamed the Grammarian; John Alcocke bishop of Elie, changed a nunnrie at Cambridge into a college named Iesus college, about the yeare of Christ 1496. The chiefe cause of suppressing the nunnrie is noted to be, for that the abbesse and other of the conuent liued dissolute liues; Stephan Hawes a learned gentleman, and of such reputation, as he was admitted to be one of the priue chamber to king Henrie the seventh; William Buntre, so called of a towne in Dorsetholke where he was borne, by profession a Carmelite frier in Burnham, a great diuine; William Gallion an Augustine frier in Lin, and at length became prouinciall of his order.

Robert Fabian a citizen and merchant of London, an historiographer, he was in his time in good estimation for his wise doine and wealth in the citie, so that he bare office and was shiriffe in the yeare 1493; William Celling, borne beside Feurtham in Kent, a monke of Canturburie; Thomas Bourcher descended of the noble linage of the earles of Essex, was first bishop of Elie, and after removed from thence to Canturburie, succeeding John Kemp in that archbishops see, at length created by pope Paule the second a cardinall; Philip Bomierd a Dominicke frier, a diuine; John Wyles a doctor of both the lawes, ciuill and canon, he studied in Drenford in the college of Wasen nose, schollie founded in the daies of this king Henrie the seventh by William Smith bishop of Lincolne; Richard Wirborne bishop of Chichester, and employed in ambassage to diuerse princes, as a man most meet thereto for his singular knowledge in learning and eloquence.

Robert Widius vicar of Thakested in Essex, and a prebendarie canon of Welles, an excellent poet; Peter Kenighall a Carmelit frier, but borne of worshipfull linage in France, hauing an Englishman to his father, was student in Drenford, and became a notable preacher; John Pozton first bishop of Elie, and after archbishop of Canturburie the fiftie and fourth in number that ruled that see, he was advanced to the dignitie of a cardinall, and by king Henrie the seventh made lord chancellor, a worthy counsellor and a modest, he was borne of worshipfull parents in Cheshire, & departed this life in the yeare of our Lord 1500; Henrie Medvall chapleine to the said Pozton; Edmund Dudleie borne of noble parentage, studied the lawes of this land, and profited highlie in knowledge of the same, he wrote a booke intituled Arbor rei publice, the tree of the common wealth: of this man ye haue heard before in the life of this king, and more (God willing) shall be said in the beginning of the next king, as the occasion of the historie leadeth; John Bokingham an excellent scholcman; William Blackeneie a Carmelit frier, a doctor of diuinitie, and a rickomancer.

Henrie the eight, sonne and successor to Henrie the seuenth.

After the death of the noble prince Henrie the seuenth, his sonne Henrie the eight began his reigne the two and twentieth daie of April in the yeare of the world 5475, after the birth of our saviour 1509, and in the eighteenth yeare of his age, in the sixteenth yeare of Maximilian then being emperour, in the eleventh yeare of Helens the twelfth that then reigned in France, and in the twentieth yeare of king James the fourth as then ruling ouer the Scots. Whose stile was proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet in the citie of London, the thre and twentieth daie of the said moneth, with much gladnesse and reioysing of the people. And the same daie he departed from his manour of Richmond, to the Towre of London, where he remained close and secret with his counsell, till the funerals of his father were finished.

Although this king now comming to the crowne, was but young (as before is said) yet hauing bene in his first yeares trained up in learning, did for respect of his owne suertie and good gouernement of his people, prudentlie (by the aduise of his grandmother the countesse of Richmond and Derby) elect & choise forth of the most wise and graue personages to be of his priuie counsell, namelie such as he knew to be of his fathers right deere and familiar friends, whose names were as followeth. William Warham archbishop of Cantuarburie and chancelor of England, Richard For bishop of Winchester, Thomas Howard earle of Surrie, and tresuro of England, George Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, and lord steward of the kings household, Charles Summerst lord chamberleine, sir Thomas Louell, sir Henrie What, doctor Thomas Routhall, and sir Edward Poynings.

These graue and wise counsellors, fearing least such abundance of riches and welth as the king was now possessed of, might moue his young yeares vnto riotous forgetting of himselfe (for vnto no king at any time before, was less greater or the like riches, as well in readie coine, as in iewels and other mouables, as was left to him by his father) they therefore his said counsellors travelled in such prudent sort with him, that they got him to be present with them when they sat in counsell; so to acquaint him with matters pertaining to the politike gouernment of the realme, that by little and little he might applie himselfe to take vpon him the rule and administration of publike affaires, with the which at the first he could not well indure to be much troubled, being rather inclined to followe such pleasant pastimes as his youthfull young yeares did more delite in, and therefore could be verie well contented, that other graue personages should take paines therein.

The same daie also that the king came to the Towre, the lord Henrie Stafford brother to the duke of Buckingham was arrested, and committed to the Towre; and the same daie also doctor Routhall was named bishop of Ducham. The five and twentieth daie of April was proclaimed, that the kings grace satisfied all the pardons granted by his father, and also pardoned all such persons as were then in lute for any offence whatsoeuer it was; treason, murder, and felonie onlie excepted. And now, whereas the performance of the deceased kings will was thought right expedient with all speed to be performed, a proclamation was also set forth and published thorough the realme, that if any man could proue himselfe to be hurt, and deppriued of his goods wrongfullie by the commissioners of the forfeitures, he should come and present his plaint to the king, being readie to satisfie euery one of all iniuries so incured.

After this proclamation was notified abroad, all such as had bene constrained either by right or by wrong (as Polydor saith) to paie any thing for any forfeitures of lawes and customes by them transgressed, came flocking to the court, & there declared their greifs, in that sort they had wrongfullie bene compelled (as they furnished) to paie this or that summe. The counsell heard euery mans complaint, and such as were found to haue paid any thing without plaine prooue of iust cause, they toke such order for them, that they had their monie againe. Which being once knowne, it was a strange thing to see how thicke other came in; yea euen those that had bene wrongfullie fined & punished for their disorderlie transgressions, making earnest sute for restitution, feining and forging manie things to make their cause seeme good, and to stand with equitie.

And the better to be heard in their sute, they made friends as well with bribes and large gifts as otherwise, leauing no waies vnausted to compasse their desires. Which greedines in such multitude of suiters, brought the commissioners, and others that had belf in the forfeitures into danger, and did themselves no good: for the counsell perceiuing that it was not possible to satisfie them all, refused to heare any further complaints or sutes for restitution: but thought it best to commit those to prison, by whom the complainants pretended themselves to haue bene wronged. And here vpon was sir Richard Empson knight, and Edmund Dudley esquier, great counsellors to the late king attached, and brought to the Towre, thereby to quiet mens minds, that made such importunate sute to haue their monie againe restored, which in the late kings daies they had bene compelled to

disburse, thorough the rigorous proceedings, as they alleged, of the said two counsellors, and others.

Trulie great exclamation was made against them, as often happeneth; that where any thing is done contrarie to the liking of the people, those that be dealers vnder the prince, and by his commandement proceed in the execution thereof, run in hatred of the multitude. But how so ever it was, their apprehension and committing to prison was thought by the wise to be procured by the malice of them that in the late kings daies were offended with their authority. Shortly after (as Edward Hall saith) were apprehended diuerse other persons, that were called promoters, as Canbie, Page, Sifith, Derbie, Wright, Simson, and Stodon; of which the more part ware papers, and stood on the pillorie. [And (as an other saith, who termeth them ringleaders of false quecks in London) they rode about the citie with their faces to the howles faces, and papers on their heads, and after they had bene set on the pillorie in Cornehill, they were brought againe to Newgate, where they died all within feauen daies after for verie shame.]

Edw. Hall, in
Hen. 8. fol. j.

The corps put into a charriot sumptuously
garnished.

The order of the pompe and mourners.

When all things were prepared ready for the funerals of the late king, his corps with all sumptuous pompe and solemne ceremonies, was conueied from Richmond to saint Georges field; where the clergy of the citie met it: and at the bridge the maior and his brethren with manie commoners all clothed in blacke likewise met it, and gaue their attendance on the same thorough the citie, to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, where was song a solemne dirige and masse, and a sermon made by the bishop of Rochester John Fisher. The next daie the corps was had to Westminster, and there the daie following, put into the earth with all due solemnities as apperteined. [Notwithstanding this breste remembrance of king Henries solemne funerall, might seeme sufficient in the iudgement of some, without further amplification; yet because it is good in others opinion (and those not of meanest wit) to set downe things of state at large, if conuenient helps thereto maie be had: therefore you shall haue the whole solemnitie of the said roiall funerall, as it is found recozded by Edward Hall.

After that all things (saith he) necessarie for the interment and funerall pompe of the late king, were sumptuously prepared and done: the corps of the said deceased king was brought out of his private chamber into the great chamber, where he rested thre daies, and euerie daie had there dirige and masse song by a prelat mitred. From thence he was conueied into the hall, where he was also thre daies, and had like seruice there; and so thre daies in the chappell. And in euerie of these thre places, was a hearse of war garnished with baners, and nine mourners giuing their attendance all the seruice time: and euerie daie they offered, and euerie place hanged with blacke cloth. Upon Wednesdaye the ninth daie of Maie, the corps was put into a charriot, couered with blacke cloth of gold, bratone with five great counterfers all couered with blacke velvet, garnished with cushions of fine gold: and ouer the corps was an image of representation of the late king, laied on cushions of gold, and the said image was apparelled in the kings rich robes of estate, with a crowne on the head with ball and scepter in the hands: the charriot was garnished with baners and pencels of the armes of his dominions, titles and genealogies.

When the charriot was thus ordered, the kings chappell, and a great number of prelates set forward praieing. Then followed all the kings seruants in blacke, then followed the charriot: and after the charriot nine mourners, and on euerie side were caried long torches & that, to the number of six hundred, & in this order they came to saint Georges field, from Richmond. There met with them all the prelates and clerks and religious men within the citie & without, which went for most before the B. chappell. The maior and his brethren with manie commoners all clothed in blacke, met with the corps at London bridge, and so gaue their attendance on the same thorough the citie. And in good order the companies passed thorough the citie, whereof the streets on euerie side were set with long torches, and on the stals stood young children holding tapers; & so with great reverence the charriot was brought to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, where the bodie was taken out and caried into the quire, and set vnder a goodlie hearse of war garnished with baners, pencels, and cushions, where was song a solemne dirige and a masse with a sermon made by the bishop of Rochester. During which time, the kings household and the mourners reposed them in the bishops palace.

The next daie the corps in like order was remaned towards Westminster: sir Edward Hobard bearing the kings baner on a counter trapped in the armes of the deceased king. In Westminster was a curious hearse, made of nine principals, all full of lights, which were lighted at the coming of the corps, which was taken out of the charriot by six horses and set vnder the hearse: the image of the representation lieng vpon the cushion on a large pall of gold. The hearse was double railed; within the first railles sat the mourners, and within the second railles stood knights bearing baners of faunts, and without the same stood officers of armes. When the mourners were set, Cartier king at armes, cried: for the soules of the noble prince king Henrie the seauenth late king of this realme: then the quire began Placem, and so song dirige: which being finished, the mourners departed into the palace, where they had a bold, and so reposed for that night. The next daie were thre masses solemnelie song by bishops, and at the last masse was offered the kings baner and counter, his coat of armes, his sword, his target, and his helme: and at the end of masse the mourners offered by rich palles of cloath of gold and handekim: and when the quire sang, Libera me; the bodie was put into the earth.

Then the lord treasurer, lord steward, lord chamberleine, the treasurer and comptroller of the kings household, brake their staves and cast them into the graue. Then Cartier cried with a loud voice: Vive le roy Henrie le huitiesme, roy d'Angleterre, & de France, sire d'Ireland. Then all the mourners, and all other that had giuen their attendance on this funerall obsequie, departed to the palace, where they had a great and a sumptuous feast. Wonder it were to write of the lamentation that was made for this prince amongst his seruants, and other of the wildest sort; and the soie that was made for his death by such as were troubled by rigour of his law: yet the toward hope which in all points appeared in the young king did both repaite and comfort the beaute hearts of them, which had lost so wise and sage a prince: and also did put out of the minds of such as were related by the said kings death, all their old grudge and rancor, and confirmed their new soie by the new grant of his pardon.

After that the funerals of the said late king were once ended, great preparation was made for the coronation of the new king; which was appointed on Midsummer daie next ensuing. During the time of which preparation, the king was aduised by some of his counsell to take to wife the ladie Katherine, late wife to his brother prince Arthur, least the hauing so great a dowrie as was appointed to him, might mar-out of the realme, which should be to his hinderance. The king being hereto perswaded, espoused the said ladie Katharine the third daie of June, the which marriage was dispensed with by pope Iulie, at the sute of hir father king Ferdinando. On the eleventh daie of this month of June, the king came from Grenewich to the Tower ouer London bridge and so by Grace church, with whome came manie a gentleman richlie appareled, but speciallie the duke of Buckingham, which had a gowne all of goldsmiths worke, verie coslie.

On fridaie the two and twentieth day of June, the king with the quene being in the Tower of London, made foure and twentieth knights of the Bath. And the morow following, being saturdaye the foure and twentieth of June, his grace with the quene departed from the Tower through London, the streets being hanged with tapestrie and cloth of arras, verie richlie; and a great part of the south side of Cheape with cloth of gold, so was some part of Cornhill. The streets were railed & barred on the one side, from ouer against Grace church to Breadstreet in Cheape side, where euerie occupation stood in their liues in order, beginning with base and meane occupations, and so ascending to the worshipfull crafts. Highest and lastlie stood the maio: with the aldermen. The goldsmiths stals vnto the end of the Old change, being replenished with virgins in white, with branches of white war: the priests and clerkes in rich copes, with crosses and censers of siluer, with censling his grace and the quene also, as they passed. The features of his bodie, his goodlie personage, his amiable visage, princelie countenance, with the noble qualities of his roiall estate, to euerie man knowen, needeth no reherfall, considering that (for lacke of cunning) I cannot expresse the gifts of grace and of nature that God indued him with all.

Yet partlie to describe his apparell, it is to be noted, his grace ware in his hypermost apparell, a robe of crimsin veluet, furred with ermins, his iacket or coat of raised gold, the placard imbodered with diamonds, rubies, emerauds, great pearles, and other rich stones, a great bauderike about his necke of great balasses. The trapper of his hourse damaske gold, with a deepe purple of ermins. His knights and esquiers for his bodie in crimsin veluet; and all the gentlemen, with other of his chappell, and all his officers and household seruants were appareled in scarlet. The barons of the five portes bare the canopie or cloth of estate. For to recite vnto you the great estates by name, the order of their going, the number of the lords spirituall & temporall, knights, esquiers, and gentlemen, and their coslie and rich apparell of severall deuises and fashions, who toke by his hourse best, or who was richest besene; it would aske long time, and yet I should omit manie things, and faile of the number, for they were verie manie: wherefore I passe ouer. But this I dare well saie, there was no lacke or scarcitie of cloth of tisse, cloth of gold, cloth of siluer, boderie, or of goldsmiths worke: but in more plentie and aboundance than hath bene seene or read of at anie time before, and thereto manie and great numbers of chaynes of gold, & bauderikes both massie and great.

Also before the kings highnesse rode two gentlemen richlie appareled, and about their bodies ouerthwart, they bare two robes, the one of the duchie of Guen, and the other for the duchie of Normandie, with hats on their heads powdered with ermins, for the estate of the same. Next followed two persons of god estate, the one bearing his cloke, the other his hat, appareled both in goldsmiths worke and boderie, their hourses trapped in burned siluer, drawn oner with copes of greene silke and gold, the edges and borders of their apparell being fretted with gold of damaske. After them came sir Thomas Brandon master of the kings hourse, clothed in tisse, bodered with roses of fine gold, and ouerthwart his bodie a great bauderike of gold, great and massie, his hourse trapped in gold, leading by a raine of silke; the kings spare hourse trapped bard wise, with harnesse bodered with bullion gold, curiously wrought by goldsmiths. Then next followed the nine children of honor: vpon great courcers, appareled on their bodies in blue beluet, powdered with floure belices of gold, & chaynes of goldsmiths worke, euerie one of their hourses trapped with a trapper of the kings title, as of England and France, Gascoigne, Guen, Normandie, Anglou, Cornewall, Wales, Ireland, &c: wrought vpon beluets, with imboderie, and goldsmiths worke.

Then next following in order, came the quenes retinue, as lords, knights, esquiers, and gentlemen in their degrees, well mounted, and richlie appareled in tisse, cloth of gold, of siluer, tinsels, and beluets imbodered, fresh and goodlie to behold. The quene then by name Katharine, sitting in hir litter borne by two white palfries, the litter covered and richlie appareled, and the palfries trapped in white cloth of gold; hir person appareled in white satin imbodered, hir haire hanging downe to hir backe of very great length, beautifull and goodlie to behold, & on hir head a coronall set with manie rich orient stones. Next after, sir honorable personages on white palfries all apperelled in cloth of gold, and then a chariot covered, and the ladies therein all appareled in cloth of gold. And another sort of ladies, and then another chariot, then the ladies next the chariot, and so in order, euerie one after their degrees in cloth of gold, cloth of siluer, tinsels, and beluet, with imboderies. Euerie complement of the said chariots, and the draught harnesses were powdered with ermins mixt with cloth of gold: & so with much joy & honour they came to Westminster, where was high preparation made, aswell for the said coronation, as also for the solemne feasts and iusts therevpon to be had and done.

The morow following being sundaie, and also Whitsommer daie, this noble prince with his quene at time conuenient, vnder their canopies borne by the barons of the five portes, went from the said palace to Westminster abbaye vpon cloth, called bulgarlie cloth of raie; the which cloth was cut and spotted by the rude and common people, immediatlie after their repaire into the abbaye; where, according to the sacred obseruance & ancient custome, his grace with the quene were annointed and crowned by the archbishop of Canturburie, with other prelates of the realme there present, and the nobilitie, with a great multitude of commons of the same. It was demanded of the people, whether they would receiue, obeye, and take the same most noble prince for their king: Who with great reuerence, loue, and desire, said and cried; Yea yea. After the which solemnitie and coronation finished, the lords spirituall and temporall did to him homage, and returned to Westminster hall with the quenes grace, euerie one vnder their canopies; where, by the lord Sparshall & his tipped stanes was made rowne, and euerie lord, and other noble men, according to their tenures, before claimed and viewed, seene and allowed by the lords, and other of his graces counsell, entred into such rowne and office that daie, to execute their seruices accordinglie.

The kings estate on the right hand, & the quenes on the left hand, the cupbord of nine stages, their noble personages being set: first, at the bringing of the first course, the trumpets sounded. And in came the duke of Buckingham, mounted vpon a great courser, richlie trapped and imbodered, and the lord Stewart in likewise on an hourse trapped in cloth of gold, riding riding before the seruice, which was sumptuous, with manie subtilties, strange deuises, with severall pos- ses, and manie deintie dishes. At the kings feet vnder the table were certeine gentlemen; and in like wise with the quene, who there continued, during that long and roiall feast. What should I speake of wythe of the sumptuous, fine, and delicate meats pre- pared for this high and honorable coronation, prou- ded for aswell in the parties beyond the seas, as in manie and sundrie places within this realme, where God so abundantlie hath sent such plentie and for- son? Of the honorable order of the seruices, the cleane handeling and breaking of meats, the orde- ring of the dishes, with the plentifull abundance: So that none of anie estate being there did lacke, nor no honorable or worshipfull person went unfeasted.

Sir Robert
Dimmoche
the kings champion.

The second course being serued: in at the hall dome entered a knight, armed at all points, his baces rich tissue embroidered, a great plume and a sumptu- ous of ostrich feathers on his helmet, sitting on a great courser, trapped in tissue, and embroidered with the armes of England, and of France, and an herald of armes before him. And passing through the hall, he presented himselfe with humble reuerence before the kings maiestie, to whom Cartier king of heralds cried and said with a loud voice; Sir knight from whence come you, and what is your pretense? This knights name was sir Robert Dimmoche, champli- on to the king by tenure of his inheritance, who an- swered the said king of armes in effect after this man- ner: Sir, the place that I come from is not materi- all, nor the cause of my repaire hither is not concer- ning anie matter of anie place or countrie, but one- lie this: and therewithall commanded his herald to make an Oyes. Then said the knight to the king of armes; Now shall ye heare the cause of my coming and pretense. Then he commanded his owne herald, by proclamation to saie; If there be anie person, of what estate or degree soeuer he be, that will saie or moue, that king Henrie the eight is not the rightfull inheritor and king of this realme, I sir Robert Dimmoche here his champion, offer my gloue, to fight in his quarrell with any person to the utterance. Which proclamation was made in sundrie places of the hall: and at euerie time his gantlett cast downe, in the maintenance thereof.

The manner of the same knights tenure.

After these severall proclamations done, and of- fers made, the said knight or champion effrones re- paired to the kings presence, demanding drinke; to whom the kings grace sent a cup of gold with wine, whereof after this knight had drunke, he demanded the couer of the said cup, which to him also was deli- uered: that done he departed out of the hall, with the said cup and couer as his owne. The manner of his tenure is this, that at the coronation of the king, he shall go to the armorie, and there take the kings best harnesse same one, the best and rich baces sauing one, then of the plumes or other things for the garnish- ing of his creast or helme; and so to the stable, there taking the next courser or horse to the best, with like trappers, & so furnished, to enter (as afore) and his of- fice done, to haue all these things with the cup of gold and couer to his owne vse. After the departure of the said champion, the king of armes with all the heralds and other officers of armes, made procla- mations in severall places of the hall, crieng lar- gesse. Wherelic I passe ouer this high and long solem- nitie of this honorable coronation and feast, more ho- norable than of the great Cesar, whom manie hi- storographers so highlie set out and magnifie.

Sir Stepha Geninges maior of London.

Now when the tables were voided, the wafers were brought. Then sir Stepha Geninges that time maior of London, whom the king before he sat downe to dinner had dubbed knight, which began the carles table that daie, arose from the place where he sat, to serue the king with ipocras in a cup of gold: which cup, after his grace had dronken thereof, was with the couer giuen vnto the said sir Stepha, like as other his predecessors, maiors of the said citie, were wont to haue at the coronation of the king. Then after the turnap laied, and that the kings grace and the quene had walshed, euerie of them vnder their cloths of estate, the tables being auoided, went vnto their chambers. For the more honour and in- nobling of this triumphant coronation, there were prepared both iusts and turneis to be done in the pa- lace of Westmister, where, for the kings grace and the quene, was framed a faire house, couered with tapestrie, and hanged with rich clothes of arras, and in the said palace was made a curious founteine and ouer it a castell, on the top therof a great crobunc imperiall, all the imbatelling with roses and pome- granats gilded.

Under and about the said castell, a curious vine, the leaues and grapes thereof gilded with fine gold, the walles of the same castell coloured white & greene losengis, and in euerie lofing either a rose or a pome- granat, and a sheafe of arrowes, or else a and is gil- ded with fine gold, with certeine arches and turrets gilded, to support the same castell. And the targets of the armes of the defendants, appointed for the said iusts, thereupon sumptuouslie set. And out at seue- rall places of the same castell, aswell on the daie of the coronation, as on the said daies of the iusts & tur- neies, out of the mouthes of certeine beastes or gar- gels did run red, white, and claret wine. The enter- priuers of these iusts, was Thomas lord Howard, heire apparant to the earle of Surrie, sir Edward Howard admerall his brother, the lord Richard bro- ther to the Marques Dowset, sir Edmund Howard, sir Thomas Kaneuet, and Charles Brandon esquier. The trumpets blew to the field, the fresh yong ga- lants and noble men gorgeously apparelled, with curious deuises of cuts and of embroideries, as well in their coates as in trappers for their horses, some in gold, some in silver, some in tinfels, and diuerse o- ther in goldsmithes worke, goodlie to behold.

These first entred the field, in taking vp & turning their horses, netlie and freshlie. Then followed a de- uise (caried by strength of men and other prouision) framed like a castell, or a turret, wrought with fine cloth of gold: the top whereof was spied with roses and pomegranats, hanging downe on euerie side of the said deuise; wherein was a ladie, bearing a shield of chistall named Pallas. After whom the said lord Howard with his companions followed, armed at all points, their baces and bards, or trappers, were of greene veluet, beaten with roses and pomegra- nats of gold, broded with fringes of damaske gold. The said deuise or turret, being brought before the king, the ladie Pallas presented the said persons, whom she named hir scholers, to the kings highnes, beseeching the same to accept them as hir scholers, who were desirous to serue him, to the increafe of their honours; which said scholers had about them on foot to the number of an hundred persons, freshlie ap- paralled, in beluets of sundrie colours, with hols & bonets according to the same. And further, the said ladie desired the king, that it might please his grace, that hir said scholers might be defendants to all comers, which request was granted.

Then came in an other band of horsemen, fresh- lie and well apparelled in cloth of gold, in silver, in goldsmithes worke, & broderie, to the number of three score, with trappers according to their garments, with great bauderikes, collars, and chaines of gold about their necks and tranuerse their bodies, euerie man with a coife of gold on his head, and a great plume plume of feathers thereupon, some of one colour and some of another, entering before into the field with drums and fifes a great number, euerie man taking by his horse in his best manner, as well for their ladies, as also for laud or praise to be giuen them. After whome followed a good number of footmen, in beluets and other filkes, cut and embroidered, with hose to the same accordinglie, and bonets and other furniture, after a fresh and lustie fashion. Next to them came on horsebacke eight persons, whose names were, sir John Pechie, sir Edward Peuell, sir Edward Guildford, sir John Carre, sir William Parre, sir Giles Capell, sir Ormish Dun, and sir Riouland, armed also at all points, with shields of their owne armes, with rich plumes, and other deuises on their head peeces, their baces and trappers of russe, cloth of gold, silver and veluet; and next before them a gentleman on horsebacke, in a coat of blue veluet, embroidered with gold, and his horse trapped in the same lute, with a speare of gold on his thigh, and the same presented to the quene: saieing, that it was informed those knights of his companie, how that dame Pallas had presented sir of hir scholars to the king, but whether they came to learne, or to teach feats of armes they knew not.

He further declared, that his knights were come to do feats of armes, for the loue of ladies. Therefore he besought hir grace, to licence those knights to proue themselves against dame Pallas scholars: and that in case hir scholars brake more speares on the said knights, by the view of the iudges, and the report of the heralds, than the same knights should do on them; then the said scholars of Pallas knights to haue the speare of gold for their prize. And if the knights brake more speares than dame Pallas scholars, the said knights to haue the chustall shield. The which request to them granted, the iusts began, where euerie man did acquite himselfe well and valiantlie: but who had the prize of other, I know not. The night coming on, the iusts ended. The next daie approached the foresaid defenders, scholars to Pallas on horsebacke, armed with cape a pie, the one side of their baces and bards of their horses white veluet, embroidered with roses of gold and other embroidered; the other side greene veluet embroidered with pomegranats of gold, euerie one of them on his head pece had an heare of flat gold of damaske, and so presented themselves before the king readie to tournee.

Then immediatlie on the other part came in the foresaid eight knights, readie armed, their baces and bards of their horse greene satin, embroidered with fresh deuises of bryamble branches, of fine gold curiously wrought, powdered all over. And after them a great number of hounes blowne, by men apparelled in greene cloth, with caps and hosen of like lute, as foresters or keepers; & a pagent made like a parke, paled with pales of white and greene, wherein were certeine fallow deare, and in the same parke curious trees made by craft, with bushes, fernes, and other things in likewise wrought, goodlie to behold. The which parke or deuise, being brought before the quene, had certeine gates thereof opened, the deare ran out therof into the palace, the greihounds were let slip and killed the deare: the which deare so killed, were presented to the quene and the ladies by the foresaid knights.

Crochman, which the daie before brought in the speare of gold, there declared, that the same knights were seruants to Diana, and being in their pastime of hunting, newes were brought unto them, that dame Pallas knights were come into those parts, to do deeds of armes: wherefore they had left their hunting and chase, and repaired also thither, to encounter with the knights of Pallas, and so to fight with them for the loue of ladies, to the utterance: saieing, that if Pallas knights vanquished the other, or made them to leaue the field, then they to haue the deare killed, and the greihounds that slue them. And in case Dianas knights ouercame the other, they to haue their swords, and none other thing more. Whereupon the quene and ladies sent to the king to haue his aduise and pleasure in this behalfe. His grace conceiuing that there was some grudge and displeasure betwene them, thinking if such request were to them granted some inconuenience might insue, would not thereunto agree: so that for the appraising thereof it was awarded, that both parties should tournee together, giuing but some certeine strokes, which done they departed: and so these iusts brake vp, and the prizes giuen to euerie man after his deserts.]

The king pardoned the lord Henrie brother to the duke of Buckingham, committed to the Tower (as ye haue heard) vpon suspicion of treason: but when nothing could be proued against him, he was set at libertie, and at the parlement after created earle of Wiltshire. Also this yeare the king ordeined fiftie gentlemen to be speares, euerie of them to haue an archer, a demilance, and a costrell; and euerie speare to haue three great horses to be attendant on his person, of the which band the earle of Essex was lieutenant, and sir John Pechie capteine. This ordinance continued but a while, the charges was so great; for there were none of them, but they and their horses were apparelled and trapped in cloth of gold, silver & goldsmithes worke. This yeare also was a great pestilence in the towne of Calis, so that the king sent one sir John Pechie with three hundred men to tarry there vpon the defense of that towne till the sickness was ceased. Furthermore, this yeare the king summoned his parlement in the moneth of Nouember, to begin in the moneth of Januarie next ensuing: whereof sir Thomas Inglesfield was chosen speaker.

At this parlement sir Richard Empson knight, and Edmund Dubleie esquier late counsellors vnto king Henrie the seauenth, were atteinted of high treason. They were charged with manie offenses committed in the late kings daies, as partlie before ye haue heard; who being brought before the court, as they were graue and wise personages, and both of them learned and skillfull in the lawes of the realme: so had they bitterance verie readie thereby to deliuer the conceits of their minds with singular dexterity, speciallie in a case of importance; in so much that when the said parties were conuented before the assemble of the lords, they alleged for themselves right constantlie (in their owne defenses) much good and sufficient matter, of whome Empson (being the elder in yeares) had these words.

A speech vttered by Empson to the lords of the counsell to find fauour.

I know (right honorable) that it is not vnknowne to you, how profitable and necessarie lawes are for the good preseruatioun of mans life: without the which neither house, towne, nor citie can long continue or stand in safetie. Which lawes here in England, thorough negligence of magistrates, were partlie decayed, and partlie quite forgotten and woyme out of vse; the mischance whereof dailie increasing, Henrie the seauenty a most graue and prudent prince wished to suppresse, and therefore appointed vs to see, that such lawes as were yet in vse might continue in their full force; and such as were out of vse might againe be reuiued and restozed to their former state; & that also those persons which transgressed the same, might be punished according to their demerits. Wherein we discharged our duties in most faithfull wise, and best maner we could, to the great advantage & commoditie (no doubt) of the whole commonwealth. Wherefore we most humble beseech you in respect of your honours, courtelie, goodnesse, humanitie, and iustice, not to decreie any greuous sentence against vs, as though we were worthe of punishment, but rather to appoint how with thankfull recompense our paines & trauell may be worthilie considered.

Manie of the counsell thought that he had spoken well, and so as stood with great reason: but yet the greater number (supposing that the reuiving of those lawes had proceeded rather of a couctous meaning in the king and them, than of anie zeale of iustice, and hauing also themselves felt the smart lastelic before for their owne offenses and transgressions) had conceiued such malice towards the men, that they thought it reason, that such as had bene dealers therein, were worthe to lose their heads, in like sort as they had caused others to lose their monie. Whereupon, their accusalls were mainteined, and manie od matters narrowlic sought out against them, as by two severall indiments framed against sir Richard Empton (the copies wherof I haue seene) it may well appeare.

In the one he is charged, that to win the fauour and credit of the late king, not weieing his honoz nor the prosperitie of him, or wealth of his realme, he had (in subuersion of the lawes of the land) procured diuerse persons to be inuolued of diuerse crimes and offenses surmised against them, and thereupon to be committed to prison, without due proces of law; who not suffered to come to their answers, were kept in durance, till they had compounded for their fines, to their great importable losses, and vtter impouerishment. Also diuerse untrue offices of intrusions and alienations, made by fundrie the late kings liege people, into manors, lands, and tenements were found; it being untrue like alleged, that they held the same of the king in capite. And when such persons as were thus viced, offered to trauesse those offices, they could not be admitted thereto, in such due and lawfull forme as in such cases the law pouldeth, till they had compounded to paie great fines and ransomes.

Whereupon the kings wards, after they had accomplished their full age, could not be suffered to sue their liverys, till they had paid excessive fines and ransomes, unto their great annoyance, losse, and disquieting, and to no lesse contempt of the said king. And further, whereas diverse persons had bene occupied, as well at the sute of their adversaries, as of the said late king; they could not be allowed to purchase their charters of pardon out of the chancerie, according to the law of the realme. till they were bounden to answer halfe the issues and profits of all their lands and tenements by the space of two yeares, which the king refused to his use, by the said Richard Campions procurement, who informed him that he might lawfullie take the same, although be knew that it was contrary to the lawes and customes of the realme. Wherevpon the people, bredd and molested by such hard dealings, sore grudged against the said late king, to the great perill and danger of his person and realme, and subuersion of the lawes and ancient customes thereof.

Also it was alleged against the said Emplon, that he had sent forth precepts directed unto diuerse persons, commanding them, vpon great penalties, to appeare before him, and other his associates, at certaine daies and times within his house in St. Aldes parish, in a ward of London, called Farringdon without: where they making their appearances, according to the same precepts, were impleaded against him and other his said associates, of diuerse murders, felonies, outlawries, and of the articles in the statute of pryolours contained; also of willfull escapes of felonies, and such like matters and articles appertaining to the ples of the crowne, and common lawes of the realme. And that done, the said persons were committed to diuerse prisons, as the Fleet, the Tower, and other places, where they were detained, till they had fined at his pleasure, as well for the commoditie of the said late king, as for the singular aduantage of the said sir Richard Emplon.

Moreouer, whereas the said Empton, being recorder of Countreie, and there sate with the maiors and other iustices of the peace, vpon a speciall gaol deliuerie within that citie, on the monday before the feast of saint Thomas the apostle, in the first hundred yeare of the late kings reigne, a prisoner that had bene indicted of felonie, for taking out of a house in that citie, certaine goods to the value of twentie shillings, was arraigned before them. And because the iurie would not find the said prisoner guiltie, for want of sufficient euidence (as they after alleged) the said sir Richard Empton, supposing the same euidence to be sufficient, caused them to be committed to ward, wherein they remained foure daies together, till they were contented to enter bond in fortie pounds a pece, to appeare before the king and his counsell, the second returne of the tearme then next ensuing, being Quindena Hilarij. Whereupon they keeping their daie, and appearing before the said sir Richard Empton, and other of the kings counsell, according to their bonds, were adiudged to paie or verie of their eight pounds for a fine, and accordingly he made payment thereof, as they were then thought well worthy so to do. But now this matter so long past, was still kept in memorie, and so earnestly sought were to enforce it to the bittermost against the said Empton, that in a sessions holden at Countreie now in this first yeare of this kings reigne, an indictment was framed against him for this matter, and thereof he was found guiltie, as if therein he had committed some great and heinous offense against the kings peace, his crowne and dignitie.

Thus haue I thought good to shew what I find hereof, to the end ye may perceiue how glad men were to find some colour of sufficient matter, to bring the said sir Richard Empson, and maister Edmund Dupleie, within danger of the lawes; whereby at length they were not onlie condemned by act of parliament, though malice of such as might seme to seeke their destruction for priuat grudges; but in the end also, they were arraigned: as first the said Edmund Dupleie in the Cuiuslibet of London, the seventeenth of Iulie; and sir Richard Empson at Northampton in October next ensuing: and being there condemned, was from thence brought backe againe to the Tower of London, where he remained till the time of his execution: as after ye shall heare.

An. Reg. 1.

This yere the plague was great, and reigned in diuerse parts of this realme. The king kept his Christmas at Richmond. The twelue of Januarie, diuerse gentlemen prepared to iust, and the king and one of his priuie chamber called William Compton, secretlye armed themselves in the little parke of Richmond, & so came into the iustes, unknowne to all persons. The king neuer ran openlie before, and did exceeding well. Maister Compton chanced to be sore hurt by Edward Penill esquier, brother to the lord of Abregauennie, so that he was like to haue died. One person there was that knew the king, and cried; God saue the king: and with that, all the people were affrighted, and then the king discovered himselfe, to the great comfort of the people. The king some after came to Westminster, and there kept his shrouetide with great banquettings, danlings, and other iollie pastimes.

And on a time the king in person, accompanied with the earles of Essex, Wilshire and other noble men, to the number of twelue, came suddenly in a morning into the quenes chamber, all apparelled in short coates of Renti Kendall, with hodes on their heads & hosen of the same, euerie one of them his bow and arrowes, and a sword and a buckler, like outlawes, or Robin Hoods men. Whereat the quene, the ladies, and all other there were abashed, as well for the strange sight, as also for their sudden coming, and after certeine dances and pastime comming, they departed. On Shrouelundaie the same yere, the king prepared a goodlie banquet in the parliament chamber at Westminster, for all the ambassadors, which then were here out of diuerse realmes and countries. The banquet being readie, the king leading the quene, entered into the chamber, then the ladies, ambassadors, and other noble men followed in order.

The king caused the quene to keepe the estate, and then sate the ambassadors and ladies, as they were marshalled by the k. who would not sit, but walked from place to place, making cheare to the quene and the strangers: suddenly the king was gone. And shortly after, his grace, with the earle of Essex, came in apparelled after the Turkie fashion, in long robes of bandeikin, powdered with gold, hats on their heads of crimfin veluet, with great rolles of gold, girded with two swords called cimeteries, hanging by great bauberiks of gold. Then next came the lord Henrie earle of Wilshire, and the lord Fitzwater, in two long gownes of yellow sattin, trauesed with white sattin, and in euerie band of white was a band of crimfin sattin after the fashion of Russia or Kuland, with furred hats of graie on their heads, either of them hauing an hatchet in their hands, and boots with pikes turned by.

And after them came sir Edward Howard then admerall, and with him sir Thomas Parre, in dublets of crimfin veluet, voided low on the backe, and before to the chanel bone, lased on the breasts with chaires of siluer, and ouer that short cloakes of crimfin sattin, and on their heads hats after dancers fashion, with feathers in them: they were appareled after the fashion of Russia or Spauce. The torchbearers were apparelled in crimfin sattin and greene, like shoes, their faces blacke: and the king brought in a mummerie. After that the quene, the lords, & ladies (such as would) had plaied, the said mummers departed, and put off the same apparell, and some after entered into the chamber in their vsuall apparell. And so the king made great cheere to the quene, ladies and ambassadors. The supper or banquet ended, and the tables voided, the king in communication with the ambassadors, the quene with the ladies took their places in their degrees.

Then began the danling, and euerie man took much heed to them that danced. The king perceiuing that, withdrew himselfe suddenly out of the place, with certeine other persons appointed for that purpose. And within a little while after there came in a drum and a fife apparelled in white damaske & greene bonnets, and hosen of the same sute. Then certeine gentlemen followed with torches, apparelled in blue damaske, purfelled with amts greie, fashioned like an albe, and hods on their heads, with robes and long tipets to the same of blue damaske, in visards. Then after them came a certeine number of gentlemen, whereof the king was one, apparelled all in one sute of short garments, little beneath the points, of blue veluet and crimfin, with long sleeves, all cut and lined with cloth of gold. And the better part of the garments were powdered with castels and sheafes of arrowes of fine duckiet gold; the upper parts of their hosen of like sute and fashion, the nether parts were of scarlet, powdered with timbrels of fine gold, on their heads bonnets of damaske, with siluer flat twoun in the stole, & thereupon wrought with gold, and rich fethers in them, all with visors.

After them entered six ladies, whereof two were apparelled in crimfin sattin and purple, embroidered with gold, and by binets ran flour delices of gold, with marvellous rich & strange tiers on their heads. Then two ladies in crimfin and purple, made like long slops embroidered and fret with gold after antique fashion: and ouer that garment was a short garment of cloth of gold scant to the knee, fashioned like a tabard all ouer, with small double rolles, all of flat gold of damaske, fret with frised gold, and on their heads scarfs and wappers of damaske gold, with flat pipes, that strange it was to behold. The other two ladies were in kirtels of crimfin & purple sattin, embroidered with a binet of pomegranats of gold, all the garments cut compasse wise, hauing but demie sleeves, naked downe from the elbowes, and ouer their garments were bochets of pleasants, rolled with crimfin veluet, and set with letters of gold like characts, their heads rolled in pleasants and tipets like the Egyptians, embroidered with gold. Their faces, necks, armes, and hands, covered in fine pleasants blacke: some call it Lumbardines, which is marvellous thin; so that the same ladies seemed to be Rigers or blacke Mozes. Of these foresaid six ladies, the ladie Marie, sister vnto the king was one, the other I name not. After that the kings grace and the ladies had danced a certeine time, they departed euerie one to his lodging.

In this yere also came ambassadors, not onelie from the king of Arragon and Castile, but also from the kings of France, Denmarke, Scotland, and other places, which were highlie welcomed, and noble interteined. It happened on a daie, that there were certeine noble men made a wager to run at the ring and parties were taken, and which partie attained or took awaie the ring offered with certeine courses, should win the wager. Whereof the kings grace hearing, offered to be on the one partie with six companions. The ambassadors hearing thereof, were much desirous to see this wager tried, and speciallie the ambassadors of Spaine, who had neuer scene the king in harness. At the daie appointed, the king was mounted on a goodlie courser, trapped in purple veluet cut, the inner side whereof was wrought with flat gold of damaske in the stole, and the veluet on the other side cut in letters: so that the gold appeared as though it had bene embroidered with certeine reasons or poesies. And on the veluet betwene the letters were fastened castels and sheafes of arrowes of duckiet bucket gold, with a garment, the sleeves compassed ouer his harness, and his bases of the same wooke, with a great plume of feathers on his head piece, that came downe to the arlon of his saddle, and a great companie of fresh gentlemen came in with his grace richlie armed and decked, with manie other right gorgeoussie appareled, the trumpets before them goodlie to behold, whereof manie strangers (but speciallie the Spaniards) much reioised; for they had neuer seene the king before that time armed.

On the other side came in another band of gentlemen freshlie appareled, and pleasant to behold, all appareled in cloth of gold, checkered with flat gold of damaske, & powdered with roses; and so euerie man ran: but to conclude, the pise was giuen unto the king. Euerie man did run twelue courses, the king did beare away the ring five times, and attained it three. And these courses thus finished, the Spanissh ambassadours desired to haue some of the badges of hemises, which were on the kings trapper. His grace therof knowing, commanded euerie of them to take thereof what it pleased them, who in effect took all or the more part; for in the beginning they thought they had bene counterfeit, and not of gold; as they were. On that day then next following in the second yeare of his reigne; his grace being young, and willing not to be idle, rose in the morning verie earlie to fetch maie of greene boughs, himselfe fresh & richlie appareled; and clothed all his knights, squiers and gentlemen in white sattin, and all his gard and pomen of the crowne in white sarcenet: and so went euerie man with his bow and arrowes thoting to the wood, and so repaired againe to the court, euerie man with a greene bough in his cap.

Now at his returning, manie hearing of his going on maiching, were desirous to see him shot, for at that time his grace shot as strong and as great a length as anie of his gard. There came to his grace a certeine man with bow and arrowes, and desired his grace to take the muster of him, and to see him shot; for at that time his grace was contented. The man put the one fot in his bosome, and so did shot, and shot a verie good shot, and well towards his marke: whereof, not onelie his grace, but all other greatlie marvelled. So the king gaue him a reward for his so doing; which person afterwards of the people, and of them in the court, was called, Fot in bosome. The same yeare in the feast of Pentecost, holden at Greenwich, that is to say, the thurdaie in the same wooke, his grace with two other with him, chalenged all commers, to fight with them at the barriers with target, and casting the speare of eight fot long; and that done, his grace with the said two aides to fight euerie of them twelue strokes with two handed swordes, with and against all commers, none excepted being a gentleman; where the king behaued himselfe so well, and deliuered himselfe so ballantlie by his hardie prowesse and great strength, that the praise and laud was giuen to his grace, and his aides: notwithstanding that diuerse and strong persons had assailed him and his aides.

From thence the whole court removed to Windsor, then beginning his progresse, & exercising himselfe daile in shooting, singing, dancing, toffling, casting of the barre, plaing at the recorders, flute, virginals, in setting of songs, and making of ballads; he did set two full masses, euerie of them five parts, which were song oftentimes in his chappell, and afterwards in diuerse other places. And when he came to Oking, there were kept both lutes and turnies: the rest of this progresse was spent in hunting, hawking, and shooting. & Doctor Colet drane of Poules erected a free schole in Poules church yard in London, and committed the ouersight thereof to the masters and wardens of the mercers, because himselfe was borne in London, & was sonne to Henrie Collet mercer, sometime lord maior of the citie of London. On the summer night, the king came privately into Cheape, in one of the cotes of his gard; and on saint Peters night, the king and quene came riding roiallie to the kings bed in Cheape, there to behold the watch of the citie.

Now when the said progresse was finished, his grace, the quene, with all their whole traine, in the moneth of October following, removed to Greenwich. The king not minded to see young gentlemen dierper in martiall seates, caused a place to be prepared within the park of Greenwich, for the quene and the ladies to stand & see the fight with battle arcs that should be done there, where the king himselfe armed, fought with one Giot a gentleman of Armaine, a tall man, and a good man of armes. And then after they had done, they marched alwaies two and two together, and so did their seats and enterprises euerie man verie well. Albeit, it happened the said Giot to fight with sir Edward Howard, which Giot was by him striken to the ground. The morow after this enterprise done, the king with the quene came to the Tower of London. And to the intent that there should no displeasure nor malice be borne by anie of those gentlemen, which fought with the or against other; the king gaue unto them a certeine summe of gold, valued at two hundred markes, to make a banket among themselves withall. The which banket was made at fishmongers hall in Thames street, where they all met to the number of foure and twentie, all appareled in one sute of luerie, after Armaine fashion; that is to say, their urther garments all of yellow sattin, yellow hosen, yellow shoes, girdles, scabbards, and bonnets with yellow feathers, their garments and hosen all cut & lined with white sattin, and their scabbards bound about with sattin. After their banket ended, they went by torchlight to the Tower, & presented themselves before the king, who took pleasure to behold them.

From thence the eight day of November, his grace removed to Richmond, and willed to be declared to all noble men and gentlemen, that his grace with two aides, that is to wit, maister Charles Brandon, and maister Compton, during two daies would answer all commers; with speare at the first one daie, and at turnie with swordes the other. And to accomplish this enterprise, on the thirtieth day of November, his grace armed at all pieces with his two aides entered the field, their bases and trappers were of cloth of gold, set with red roses, wrought with gold of broderie. The counterpart came in freshlie appareled, euerie man after his deuise. At these lutes the king brake more fraues than anie other, & therefore had the pise. At the turnie in likewise, the honour was his. The second night were diuerse strangers of Armitkan the emperours court and ambassadours of Spaine with the king at supper. When they had supped, the king willed them to go into the quenes chamber, who so did.

In the meane season, the king with diuerse other, appareled in Armaine jackets of crimson and purple sattin, with long quartered sleeves, and hosen of the same sute, their bonnets of white velvet, wrapped in flat gold of damaske, with visards and white plumes, came in with a munnerie; and after a certeine time that they had plaied with the quene and the strangers, they departed. Then suddenly entered sir mair Strels richlie appareled, plaing on their instruments; and then followed fourtene persons, gentlemen, all appareled in yellow sattin, cut like Armaine, braving to ches. After them came sir disigul sed in white sattin and greene, embroidered and set with letters and castels of fine gold in bullion, the garments were of strange fashion, with also strange cuts, euerie cut knit with points of fine gold, and tassels of the same, their hosen cut and tied in likelike, their bonnets of cloth of siluer wond with gold. The first of these fir was the king, the earle of Essex, Charles Brandon, fir Edward Howard, fir Thomas Lancet, and fir Henrie Guilford.

Then part of the gentlemen bearing torches departed, and shortly returned, after whom came in fir ladies, apparelled in garments of crimson sattin embroidered and trauced with cloth of gold, cut in pomegranats and pokes, fringed after the fashion of Spaine. When the said fir men danced with these fir ladies: and after that they had danced a season, the ladies take off the mens visors, whereby they were known: whereof the quene and the strangers much passed the king, and ended the pastime. It is to be noted, that at this time the quene was great with child, & shortly after this pastime, she take hir chamber at Richmond, for the which cause the king kept his Christmase there. And on Newyears daie the first daie of Ianuarie the quene was deliuered of a prince to the great gladnesse of the realme, for the honour of whose fiers were made, and diuerse vessels with wine set for such as would take thereof in certain streets in London, and generall processions thereupon to laud God. As touching the preparation of the princes christening, & ouerpass, which was honorable done, whose godfathers at the font were the archbishop of Canturburie, and the earle of Surrie, & godmother the ladie Katharine countesse of Deuonshire, daughter to king Edward the fourth: his name was Henrie.

Against the twelue daie of the Epiphanie at night, before the banket in the hall at Richmond, was a pageant deuised like a mounteine, glistering by night as though it had bene all of gold and set with stones, on the top of which mounteine was a tree of gold, the branches and bonghes filled with gold, spreading on euerie side ouer the mounteine with roses and pomegranats, the which mounteine was with vices brought vp towards the king, and out of the same came a ladie apparelled in cloth of gold, and the children of honour called the henchmen, which were freshly disguised, and danced a morrice before the king; and that done, reentered the mounteine, which then was drawen backe, and then was the wastail of banket brought in, and so brake vp Christmase. Shortly after and before the quenes churching, the k. rode to Walsingham. The quene being churched or purified, the king and the remoued from Richmond to Westminster, where was preparation for solemne iusts in the hono: of the quene; the king being one, and with him thre aides: his grace being called Cure loial, the lord William erle of Deuonshire called Bon voloire, fir Thomas Lancet named Bon espoir, fir Edward Penill called Valiant desire, whose names were set vpon a goodlie table, & the table hangd in a tree curiously wrought, and they were called Les quarter cheualiers de la forest saluigne, these foure to run at the tilt against all comers, with other certeine articles compized in the said table.

A place in the palace was prepared for the king and quene, richlie hangd, the inner part with cloth of gold, & the outer with rich cloth of arras. These iusts began the thirtieth daie of Februarie. Now after that the quene with hir traine of ladies had taken their places, into the palace was conueied a pageant of a great quantitie, made like a forest with rockes, hills, and dales, with diuerse sundrie trees, floures, hartornes, fernes, and grasse, with fir foresters standing within the same forest, garnished in cotes and hoods of greene beluet, by whom laie a great number of speares; all the trees, hearbs, and floures of the same forest were made of greene beluet, greene damaske, & silke of diuerse colours, as sattin & sarcenet. In the midst of this forest was a castell standing made of gold, and before the castell gate sat a gentleman freshly apparelled, making a garland of roses for the pise. This forest was drawen as it were by strength of two great beasts, a lion and an antelop; the lion flozshed all ouer with damaske gold, the antelop was wrought all ouer with siluer of damaske, his beames or hories and tuskes of gold.

These beasts were led with certeine men apparelled like wild men, or woodhoules, their bodies, heads, faces, hands, and legs couered with greene silke floshed: on either of the said antelop and lion sat a ladie richlie apparelled, the beasts were tied to the pageant with great chaines of gold, as hories be in the cart. When the pageant rested before the quene, the forenamed foresters blew their hories, then the deuise or pageant opened on all sides, and out issued the foresaid foure knights armed at all peeces, euerie of them a speare in his hand on horsebacke with great plumes on their heads, their bases and trappers of cloth of gold, euerie of them his name embroidered on his base and trapper. On the other part with great noise as well of trumpets as of drums entered into the field, the erle of Essex, the lord Thomas Howard with manie other cleane armed, their trappers and bases all of crimson satin embroidered with branches of pomegranats of gold and posies; with manie a fresh gentleman riding before them, their footmen well apparelled: and so the iusts began and endured all that daie.

The morrow, being the thirtieth of Februarie after dinner, at time conuenient, the quene with the ladies repaired to see the iusts, the trumpets sounded, and in came manie a noble man and gentleman richlie apparelled, taking vp their horses; after whom followed certeine lords apparelled, they and their horses in cloth of gold and russet tinsel: knights in cloth of gold and russet beluet; and a great number of gentlemen on foot in russet sattin and yelowe, and yeomen in russet damaske and yelowe, all the nether part of euerie mans hosen scarlet and yelowe caps. Then came the king vnder a pavilion of cloth of gold and purple beluet embroidered, and powdered with y. and k. of fine gold, the compasse of the pavilion a bone embroidered richlie, and balanced with flat gold, beaten in wire, with an imperiall crowne in the top of fine gold, his bases and trappers of cloth of gold, fretted with damaske gold, the trapper pendant to the taile. A crane and chafon of Steele, in the front of the chafon was a goodlie plume set full of mulers or trembling spangles of gold. After followed his thre aides, euerie of them vnder a pavilion of crimson damaske and purple, powdered with y. and k. of fine gold, balanced and fringed with gold of damaske: on the top of euerie pavilion a great k. of goldsmiths worke.

The number of the gentlemen and yeomen attending on foot, apparelled in russet and yelowe, was an hundred thre score and eight. Then next these pavilions came twelue children of honour, sitting euerie of them on a great courser richlie trapped and embroidered in severall deuises and fashions, where lacked neither borderie nor goldsmiths worke, so that euerie child and horse in deuise and fashion was contrarie to other, which was goodlie to behold. Then on the contrarie part entered fir Charles Brandon, first on horsebacke in a long robe of russet sattin, like a recluse or religious person, and his horse trapped in the same sute, without drum or noise of mindrellie, putting a bill of petition to the quene, the effect whereof of was, that if it would please hir to licence him to run in hir p[re]sence, he would do it gladielie; and if not, then he would depart as he came. After that his request was granted, then he put off his said habit, and was armed at all peeces with rich bases and h[or]se also richlie trapped, and so did run his h[or]se to the tilt end, where diuerse men on foot app[ar]elled in russet sattin waited on him.

Next after came in alone yong Henrie Guilford esquier, himselfe and his h[or]se in russet cloth of gold and cloth of siluer, closed in a deuise, or a pageant made like a castell or a turret, wrought of russet saycenet florence, wrought and set out in gold with his word or posie, and all his men in russet sattin & white, with hosen to the same, and their bonets of like colours, demanding also licence of the queene to run; which to him granted, he took place at the tilts end. Then came next the marquisse Dorset and sir Thomas Bullen like two pilgrims from saint James, in taberds of blacke veluet, with palmers hats on their helmets, with long Jacobs staves in their hands, their h[or]se trappers of blacke veluet, their taberds, hats, and trappers set with scalop shels of fine gold, and strips of blacke veluet, euerie strip set with a scalop shell, their seruants all in blacke sattin with scalop shels of gold in their breast. Some after came in the lord Henrie of Buckingham earle of Arllthrice, himselfe and his h[or]se app[ar]elled in cloth of siluer, embrodered with his posie or word, and arrows of gold in a posie, called La maison du refuge, made of crimson damaske brodered with roses & arrows of gold, on the top a greihound of siluer, bearing a tree of pomegranats of gold, the branches whereof were so large that it ouersp[er]ed the pageant in all parts.

Then entered sir Giles Capell, sir Rowland with manie other knights richlie armed and app[ar]elled. And thus began the iusts, which was valiantlie achieved by the king and his aids, among whom his grace attained the p[ri]ze. These iusts finished, euerie man withdrew, the king was disarmed, and at time convenient he and the queene heard euensong, and that night all the ambassado[rs] supped with the king and had a great banket. After supper, his grace with the queene, lords & ladies came into the White hall with in the said palace, which was hanged richlie, the hall was scaffolded and railed on all parts. There was an enterlude of the gentlemen of his chapel before his grace, and diuerse fresh songs: that done, his grace called to him a great man, or a lord of Ireland called Donnell, whom in the p[re]sence of the said ambassado[rs] he made knight: then the minstrels began to plaie, the lords & ladies began to danse. Now in the midst of this pastime, when all persons were most attentiu to behold the danfing, the king was suddenlie gone, unknown to the most part of the people there, unless it were of the queene and certeine other. Within a little while after his departing, the trumpets at the end of the hall began to sound.

The great Donnell made knight.

A pageant deuised to run upon wheeles.

Then was there a deuise or a pageant upon wheeles brought in, out of the which pageant issued out a gentleman richlie app[ar]elled, that shewed how in a garden of pleasure there was an arbor of gold, where in were lords and ladies, much desirous to shew pastime to the queene & ladies, if they might be licensed so to do: who was answered by the queene, how she & all other there were verie desirous to see them and their pastime. Then a great cloth of arras that did hang before the same pageant was taken away, and the pageant brought more nere. It was curiously made and pleasant to behold, it was solemne and rich; for euerie post or pillar thereof was couered with frised gold, therein were trees of bathorne, cglantine, roffers, vines, and other pleasant flowers of diuerse colours, with gilliflowers, and other hearbs all made of sattin, damaske, siluer and gold, accordinglie as the naturall trees, hearbs, or flowers ought to be.

In this arbor were six ladies, all app[ar]elled in white sattin and greene, set and embrodered full of b. and b. of gold, knit together with laces of gold of damaske, and all their garments were replenished with glittering spangles gilt ouer, on their heads were bonets all opened at the four quarters, overfrised with flat gold of damaske, the orrellets were of rolles, w[re]thted on lampas dauche holow, so that the gold shewed through the lampas doucker; the fassis of their head set full of new deuised fashions. In this garden also was the king and five with him app[ar]elled in garments of purple sattin, all of cuts with b. and b. euerie edge garnished with frised gold, and euerie garment full of posies, made of letters of fine gold in bullion as thicke as they might be, and euerie person had his name in like letters of malle gold. The first Cure loial, the second Bon volaire, the third Bon espoir, the fourth Valiant desire, the fifth Bon foy, the sixth Amour loial, their hosen, caps, and coats were full of posies, with b. & b. of fine gold in bullion, so that the ground could scarce appeare, & yet was in euerie void place spangles of gold. When time was come, the said pageant was brought forth into p[re]sence, and then descended a lord and a ladie by couples, and then the minstrels which were disguised also danced, and the lords and ladies danced, that it was a pleasure to behold.

In the meane season the pageant was conueied to the end of the palace, there to stae till the dances were finished, & so to haue receiued the lords & ladies againe; but suddenlie the rude people ran to the pageant, and rent, tare, and spoiled the pageant, so that the lord steward nor the head officers could not cause them to absteine, except they should haue foughten and d[is]auen blood, and so was this pageant broken. When the king with the queene and the ladies returned to his chamber, where they had a great banket, and so this triumph ended with much gladnes. At this solemnitie a shipman of London caught certeine letters, which he sold to a goldsmith for three pounds fourtene shillings & eight pence; by reason whereof it appeared that the garments were of a great value. After this great toy came a sorrowfull chance, for the yong prince which was borne upon shew peares day last past, upon the two and twentieth daie of february, being then the euen of saint Spathe, departed this world at Richmond, and from thence was caried to Westminster and buried. The king like a wise prince took this dolorous chance wonderous wifelle; and the more to comfort the queene he dissembled the matter, and made no great mourning outwardlie: but the queene, like a naturall woman, made much lamentation; howbeit, by the kings good perswasion and behauiour, hir sorrow was mitigated, but not thortlie.

In the moneth of february this yeare came ambassado[rs] from the king of Arragon and Castile, to require an aid of fiftene hundred archers to be sent to the same king, hauing at that time war against the Moors, enemies of the christian faith. The king hearing their message gentlie granted their request. And because the lord Thomas Marcie a knight of the garter, made humble sute to the king to be generall of the crue that should be thus sent into Spaine, the king upon trust of his approued ballancie granted his desire. There were appointed to go with him the lord Anthony Creic brother to the marquisse Dorset, Henrie Guilford, Weston Browne, and William Sidneie esquiers of the kings house, sir Robert Constable, sir Roger Hastings, and sir Rafe Elderton, with other gentlemen to be capitains.

An. Reg. 23.

In this second yeare, the king being forth on his progresse, heard euerie daie moze & moze complaints of Empton and Dndlete, for forth and aduanced no doubt by the dyft of their deable enemies. Wherefore, he sent writs to the shiriffes of London, to put them to execution, and so the seventeenth daie of August, they were both beheaded at the Tower hill, and both their bodies and heads buried, the one at the White friers, and the other at the Blacke friers. The king about this season was much giuen to plaie at tennis, and at the dise, which appetite certeine craftie persons about him perceiuing, brought in Frenchmen and Lombards to make wagers with him, & so lost much monie; but when he perceiued their craft, he eschued their companie and let them go.
